PUBLISHED AT WASHINGTON, BY JOHN C. RIVES.—TERMS $3 FOR THIS SESSION.

32D CONGRESS, 1ST SESSION.

SATURDAY, JULY 10, 1852.

NEW SERIES...No. 107.

The twenty-fifth amendment, the next in order, was then read, as follows:

"For additional compensation for increasing the transportation of the United States mail between New York and Liverpool, in the Collins line of steamers, to twenty-six trips per annum, at such times as shall be directed by the Postmaster General, and in conformity to his last annual report to Congress, and his letter of the 15th of November last to the Secretary of the Navy, commencing said increased service on the 1st of January, 1852, at the rate of $33,000 per trip, in lieu of the present allowance, the sum of $236,500: Provided, That it shall be in the power of Congress, at any time after the 31st day of December, 1854, to terminate the arrangement for the additional allowance herein provided for, upon giving six months' notice."

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair would state, that there are several other provisions in this amendment, and thinks they should be read through. The amendment may be divided, but it should be read through.

Mr. JONES. I suppose we might dispense with reading the whole now, as the amendment will be taken up by paragraphs.

The CHAIRMAN. By unanimous consent it can be done.

No objection was made, and the further reading of the amendment, at present, was dispensed with.

Mr. JONES. I move to amend the paragraph read, by striking out all after the word "fifty-two," in the ninth line, to the word "provided," in the twelfth line.

Mr. Chairman, this provision for increasing the trips of the Collins line of mail-steamers, from twenty to twenty-six trips per annum, and the compensation from $19,250 to $33,000 per trip, being an increase of $473,000 per annum, was passed by the Senate, and sent here as an amendment. That amendment was referred to the Committee on Ways and Means and reported back to this House, with a recommendation that it be agreed to.

I am, sir, a member of that committee; and it is not known to this House, or to the country, who of that committee recommended a concurrence in this amendment.

Mr. POLK. Will the gentleman state their names?

Mr. JONES. I will state that I was one of the minority who opposed that report. I am not at liberty to state gentlemen's position in the committee room. They are upon the floor, and can state their own position.

Mr. Chairman, it has always been my understanding, that when there was a Democratic party majority in this House, as well as in the country, that one of the cardinal features of that party creed was, a strict construction of the Constitution of the United States; and that the powers of this Government should be limited to clearly-expressed grants, and to those necessary to carry into effect those grants of power—not that they may be convenient and expedient. If I have read the recent platform of the Whig party, as adopted at Baltimore, they have come upon this great Democratic principle, and adopted it as the first one in their creed.

Then, sir, I ask them all to point me to that provision in the Constitution, which authorizes the passage of this law? I ask them, in the first place, to show me where the power is in the Constitution to establish mail lines to transport the mails beyond the limits of the country? I ask them to show me the necessity for the establishment of this line, in order to carry out the power to raise and support a navy? I ask them to show me the power and necessity to establish this line, in order to regulate the commerce between this country and foreign countries? I ask them to show me the authority and the necessity of establishing this line under the war power of the country? If they have the power under any one of these provisions of the Constitution, I ask them where it is?

I have read that Constitution with care, and I cannot myself find any authority for the establishment of such lines, and the appropriation of money for such purposes.

Mr. Chairman, I opposed this scheme when the bill was passed through here the last night of the session, to put this bill in motion. I voted against the appropriation, with the provision afterwards inserted in the appropriation bill, to give life, power, and vitality to this contract with Mr. Collins, and other steam companies.

But, sir, I am no prophet, nor do I pretend to possess the spirit of prophecy; but I do predict that this system will go on, until it will arrest the attention of the people of the country; and mark me! that when it shall swell the expenditures of this country to millions of dollars, as it assuredly will, in my opinion, the tax-paying portion of the country will be roused to their interest, and it will become the issue, the great element, upon which Congressional and Presidential elections will turn; and when it shall come, it requires no spirit of prophecy to tell which side will triumph in the contest.

My five minutes have nearly expired, and I will close my remarks by submitting estimates of the expenditures and receipts from these lines, compiled from the report made to the Senate by Hon. THOMAS J. RUSK:

Mr. GENTRY. I desire, Mr. Chairman, to avail myself of this opportunity to acquit myself of a duty with which I have been charged. There are no opportunities to present petitions publicly in the House. I have a petition here, signed by some thirty or forty merchants, lawyers, and distinguished citizens of the State of Tennessee, expressive of a desire that this Collins line shall receive such patronage from Congress as may be necessary to continue its existence and its usefulness. It is due to these gentlemen I should make known their wishes in that regard. I have been requested, also, by a gentleman who takes a deep interest in the success of this amendment of the Senate, and who admits himself to be interested in this matter—a gentleman in whose veracity I have great confidence—to say, that if this appropriation be not passed, the line must be necessarily discontinued, and the company will petition Congress to be exonerated from their contract. I should regret such a result, sir; but after mature reflection on the subject, and with every willingness to come to the conclusion I ought to vote for the amendment of the Senate, I have not been able to conclude such would be a proper vote, and therefore I shall vote against it.

Mr. TAYLOR. Is it in order to submit an amendment to the amendment?

The CHAIRMAN. It is not in order.

Mr. MEADE. I propose to amend the original amendment before the question is taken on striking out.

The CHAIRMAN. That amendment is not in order.

Mr. MEADE. I propose to amend the amendment of the Senate, which it is proposed to be stricken out.

Mr. TAYLOR. That is precisely what I wish to do.

Mr. MEADE. The Chair ruled that to be in order this morning, not more than an hour and a half ago, in relation to an amendment I proposed.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair thinks such a proposition is not in order. It is in order to move to amend where the proposition is to strike out the entire amendment; but not where the proposition is to strike out a portion of it. The Chair thinks the question must now be taken on the amendment of the gentleman from Tennessee, [Mr. JONES.]

Mr. MARSHALL, of Kentucky. Do I understand the Chair to say it is not within the competency of the gentleman to amend the part proposed to be stricken out?

The CHAIRMAN. So the Chair states in this instance. The distinction the Chair makes is this: If the proposition be to strike out the whole section or subdivision, it is in order to perfect the section or subdivision before taking the question on striking out; but this is a motion to strike out the amount appropriated—$10,000. To illustrate: The Chair thinks it would not be in order to amend that by substituting other sums before the question is taken.

Mr. JONES, of Tennessee. With the permission of the House, I will withdraw that amendment. It is not my intention to exclude debate on this subject.

Mr. STEPHENS, of Georgia. I move, if it be in order, to strike out the entire amendment, so that debate may be stopped.

Mr. ORR. I propose to perfect the amendment before the question is taken on striking out.

Mr. MEADE. Is the motion of the gentleman from Georgia in order?

The CHAIRMAN. It is in order.

Mr. MEADE. Do I understand it is to strike out the whole amendment of the Senate?

The CHAIRMAN. It is to strike out one clause of the Senate amendment.

Mr. JONES. I called for the division of the Senate's amendment. Let us take the question on that division of the paragraph. If it be rejected it is the same as struck out. It is not perfecting or amending a paragraph if it is stricken out. Certainly not.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair thinks a call for the division of the question does not supersede a motion to strike out a portion of the amendment.

Mr. OLDS. I inquire whether it be in order to amend the motion of the gentleman from Georgia by moving to strike out and insert?

Mr. OLDS. I inquire whether it be in order to amend the motion of the gentleman from Georgia by moving to strike out and insert?

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair has for the present yielded the floor to the gentleman from South Carolina, [Mr. ORR.]

Mr. OLDS. I wish to make the inquiry of the Chair whether, when the vote is taken to strike out, a motion cannot be made to insert also?

Mr. MEADE. I rise to a question of order. When I got up to move an amendment, the Chair pronounced that amendment to be out of order. Subsequently the gentleman from Tennessee, with the unanimous consent of the committee, withdrew his amendment. I presume, under the ordinary practice and courtesy of the committee, I would be entitled to move my amendment in exclusion of any member who might have subsequently obtained the floor. I was standing upon the floor at the time.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair thinks the gentleman who first addressed it, under the circumstances, is entitled to the floor.

Mr. MEADE. I asked the gentleman to withdraw his amendment that I might be enabled to move an amendment to the clause under consideration. In obedience to that request, he did withdraw his amendment. Under such circumstances, I think I am entitled to the floor.

The CHAIRMAN. Such confusion, the Chair will say, arises by gentlemen addressing each other, and not the Chair. If gentlemen would, in all cases, address the Chair, it would not be misled. In this instance, the Chair did not so understand the gentleman from Virginia. But if that was the position he occupied, he is entitled, in precedence, to offer his amendment. It is a question of fact of which the Chair is not advised.

[Cries of "That is so!" "That is so!"]

Mr. ORR. But another gentleman was recognized by the Chair, and made a motion, after which I obtained the floor. Can we go behind this?

Mr. MEADE. It is to the amendment of the gentleman from Georgia, as well as the motion of the gentleman from South Carolina. I rise to a point of order under the statement I have submitted. My objection goes back to the motion of the gentleman from Georgia.

The CHAIRMAN. As the Chair understands the facts, the gentleman from South Carolina is entitled to the floor. If he is mistaken he regrets it.

Mr. STEPHENS. Is an amendment to my amendment in order?

The CHAIRMAN. An amendment to amend the provision to strike out is in order prior to taking the question on the motion to strike out.

Mr. STEPHENS. I submit the pending question is to concur in the Senate's amendments, which is one question. We are now only considering one part, which I move to strike out; and the only question, if the Chair will look at it a moment, is exactly the same as the one presented by the amendment of the gentleman from Virginia, [Mr. MEADE.] I move to amend the amendment of the Senate, by striking out a part. The gentleman from South Carolina [Mr. ORR] moves to strike out some of the words proposed by me to be stricken out which is an amendment in the third degree.

Mr. ORR. My proposition is to perfect the part proposed to be stricken out.

Mr. STEPHENS. The gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. JONES] moved to strike out certain words. The gentleman from Virginia then made a motion to strike out some of these words, which the Chair decided not to be in order. The Chair will perceive this is identically the same proposition, because the question now before the committee is to concur in the entire amendment of the Senate.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Georgia will recollect that the Chair based his decision on this ground: The proposition of the gentleman from Tennessee was only to strike out the appropriating words of the subdivision, and in lieu thereof to substitute others. The Chair decided that a proposition to amend by substituting other appropriating words was not in order, stating, at the same time, if it were a proposition to strike out an entire subdivision, a motion to perfect the subdivision prior to taking the vote would be in order. The Chair thinks this is that very question. The gentleman from Georgia proposes to strike out the entire subdivision covering the appropriation to the Collins line. The Chair thinks that it is in order to perfect that subdivision—to modify it in accordance with the views of the committee prior to taking the question on the motion to strike out.

Mr. JONES, of Tennessee. One word. The gentleman from Georgia will see that his object cannot be effected by the motion he has submitted. It will not stop debate, because, if it fails, amendments can then be offered.

The latter part of rule 53 reads:

"A motion to strike out and insert shall be deemed indivisible; but a motion to strike out being lost, shall preclude neither amendment nor a motion to strike out and insert."

Mr. STEPHENS. My object barely was to get a test vote upon this question, by cutting off debate. If we once get a test vote, the committee will permit the appropriation to be voted on or not. I do not want the whole of this day consumed in its discussion; but a test vote now on the Collins line.

Mr. JONES. That is what we all want.

Mr. STEPHENS. Then let us have it.

Mr. ORR. If the question of order is settled, I claim the floor.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman is entitled to the floor.

Mr. MEADE. I will appeal to the gentleman from Georgia [Mr. STEPHENS] to withdraw his amendment, for this reason: A great many will vote against his amendment to strike out, because they may not be opposed to it, although they will be in favor of the amount already under contract.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair will state to the gentleman from Virginia, [Mr. MEADE,] that the gentleman from South Carolina [Mr. ORR] is entitled to the floor upon his amendment.

Mr. ORR. I propose to amend the amendment, commencing at the ninth line, by striking out all after the words "at the rate of," and inserting the following: "$19,250 per trip, for said six additional trips."

Some years ago, Collins and his associates applied to the Congress of the United States to make a contract with them for carrying the mails between New York and Liverpool. That contract was entered into, and they were to be paid—according to the terms of the contract—$385,000 per annum for that service, being $19,250 per trip, twenty trips to be made annually. They further stipulated that they would construct five steam-vessels, of a particular description, with which the service was to be performed. They proceeded to the fulfillment of the contract, but never built but four of the vessels. Congress, however, at their urgent solicitation, waived the forfeiture of their contract, which had been wrought by their failure to perform it in all of its stipulations, and still continued to pay them the sum of $385,000. About the 1st of last November, Collins and his associates, who had applied to Congress originally to make this contract with the Postmaster General, again applied to that officer, and requested that the number of trips shall be increased from twenty to twenty-six. The number of trips were increased to twenty-six, as they desired; for this Government has never failed to yield to their solicitations, and when they became satisfied that their interests would be promoted by making a trip every two weeks, giving greater facilities for transporting passengers and freights, the increased number of trips was cheerfully accorded to them. My amendment proposes to pay them the sum of $19,250 for that increased service. That will give them an additional compensation of $115,500, making the entire sum which will be paid to them annually for this mail service, $500,000. This is carrying out the contract in all fairness and justice, and they have no right to ask anything more at the hands of this Congress. I put the question to every gentleman on this floor, if my proposition does not deal with this company justly? Ay, sir, is it not generous to them? And how can the vote be justified, by which you allow Collins and his associates $33,000 of your constituents' money per trip, when they contracted to do it for $19,250, giving thereby a bonus, in addition to the original contract of $457,500 annually? Let me warn gentlemen, that those who practice such profligacy with the people's money, will be called to a strict account at the ballot-box.

But gentlemen tell us this line of steamers will be discontinued unless you make this enormous appropriation. I, for one, am perfectly willing to release them from the forfeiture which will be incurred under their bond if they desire to renounce or abandon the existing contract; but, in my judgment, the line will not be discontinued. From the evidence before this House it is reduced to a certainty that instead of requiring $33,000 per trip for transporting the mail between Liverpool and New York, you can have that service done for $10,000, $12,000, or $15,000. The Cunarders, it seems, receive but $14,000, according to one statement, and the highest estimate is only $16,000. This is the line owned by British citizens, and that Government, always profligate of the money levied by taxation on the toiling millions, pays but $14,000 per trip to Cunard. I ask, what is there in the elements of this line of Collins & Co. which requires the American Congress to pay $33,000 for a service which is done by other persons who have no more skill, enterprise, or industry than Americans, at $14,000? Is there any propriety—any justice in this? These $500,000 will, in my judgment, pay an enormous compensation for the services they render; and I undertake to say here, when the figures are made out at the Post Office Department, you will find that the entire sum arising from the postage upon mail matter carried by these steamers will not yield more than $200,000 or $250,000; and you are now asked to pay $858,000 for transporting a mail annually, when the postages on all mail matter carried by it is less than $250,000; or you pay out to keep up the line $600,000 more than it brings to you. Is such a policy defensible in any legislature?

The friends of the Collins line tell us that the present amount is inadequate, and you must give them more. Well, what is the effect of it? If the $19,250 is a fair compensation, the excess now demanded is merely a bounty to that company; and what is the effect of it? You prohibit any competition—prohibit the running of any other steamers between the ports of New York and Liverpool. You destroy the private enterprise of your own people in starting new vessels, because this line possesses all the advantages of a new one, and the bonus of $858,000 additional. So that private enterprise would have to compete with the Cunard line, all the lines of sailing vessels, and the Collins line too, sustained to the amount of nearly a million a year by the Government. Will this Government adopt such an unjust policy as to favor, by bounties, a few of its citizens, and prohibit the competition of the great mass in the act of conferring its bounties? Are Collins and his associates better than all other Americans? What entitles them to the bounty of this Government over all others of their fellow-citizens?

Mr. CLINGMAN. I wish to offer a few words, but I do not believe that I can explain the reasons upon which I base my vote in the five minutes allotted to me. My course on this question will be different from that of many persons with whom I usually act; and yet I do not agree with many of the arguments used in favor of this appropriation by its friends, and it is therefore the more necessary that I should state the reasons for my votes. In doing this briefly, I come first to the point made by the gentleman from South Carolina, [Mr. ORR.] I think he will find that he is mistaken in relation to the comparative amount of the compensation to the two rival establishments. If he takes into consideration the difference in size between the steamers of the Collins line and the English line, he will find that if we give them $33,000 a trip, that we only pay them as much compensation per ton—I mean for each ton that crosses the Atlantic—as the English company get. This arises from the fact that the four Collins ships have in the aggregate as much tonnage as the seven English, and that one ship of the former by crossing fifty-two times carries as much as a Cunarder at eighty-five trips, being the whole number of crossings of the Atlantic by each line, if this proposed increase should take place. But I do not propose to rest my vote upon that consideration mainly. When Great Britain commenced, she originally gave the Cunarders, I believe, £85,000. That amount has been more than doubled, because it was found necessary to enable them to run the line as proposed; and so far as the precedent goes, there is no reason why Collins & Co. should not ask us to increase their compensation also. But Great Britain, in my judgment, very unwisely began to sustain a line in this mode so as to enable it unfairly and injuriously to compete with the private enterprise of the two countries. I agree with gentlemen in all that they have said upon that subject. I think it is an injurious policy for the Government to sustain lines of steamers to compete with our private mercantile marine, and thus underwork and drive them out of business. But Great Britain began the system and our Government followed the example. Whether this was originally right or not is a question of much doubt. But if our Government went into the matter with a view of counteracting the policy of Great Britain, which was operating prejudicially to us as a nation, and disastrously to our merchants, then it was justifiable in so doing. By thus letting her see that we will not permit her to reap any advantage by such a departure from sound principles, we may be able to put an end to the system. To accomplish this, I should like very much for this House to instruct the Executive, or request him rather, to enter into negotiations with the Government of Great Britain and other Governments, so as to provide, by treaty, that no ship sustained in part by a Government appropriation, shall be allowed to enter the ports of either country with cargoes of merchandise or passengers. I am willing to come to that issue at once. I believe it will be wise policy for us to adopt a system by which private individuals only may be allowed to transport passengers and freight. Perhaps it may be as well to provide that the mail shall be carried by the lowest bidder, opening the competition to the whole world, so as to reduce the compensation so low as barely to cover actual cost, thus preventing undue advantage to the mail-ships. But the main point which presses upon me is this: We have gone into a contest with the Government of Great Britain, whether wisely or not I need not say. The question now is, whether we shall not vote as much money for the service performed, by taking into account the entire amount of tonnage, as the British Government does, and thus put our own people on an equal footing with the foreigners. I believe the abandonment of this line would operate unfortunately upon public opinion throughout the world. The value of national character can hardly be estimated in money. It is well known to everybody, that the most inferior consul we have now abroad, has more weight with all foreign Governments, than a minister of the first class had thirty or forty years ago. Why is this? It is because our country has a standing abroad which it did not formerly possess. This is due partly to the achievements of our soldiers in the late war with Great Britain—partly to the brilliant and difficult conquest of Mexico, and our numerous and striking victories upon the ocean—partly to our immense and rapidly increasing mercantile marine—partly to the success of our inventors at the Exhibition at London, and especially, in a most eminent degree, to the achievements of this Collins line. Let it be remembered that its ships are the largest, swiftest, handsomest, and best that have floated on the ocean since the dawn of creation.

Now, I believe it would not be wise policy to abandon this line at this time. It would tend rather to lower the position of our country abroad, in the opinion of the civilized world. It ought never to be realized that we are to be beaten in anything. This would be an injury greater than ten times the money saved could compensate. There is another reason, too, for the course I recommend. It is not determined yet whether such steamers will answer all the purposes of war vessels. Officers in the Navy differ about it. One man will tell you that they will not do, while three others will tell you that they will answer for all war purposes. I am willing to sustain this line for two years longer, its ships being the best yet built, and then we will be able, perhaps, to decide whether they will answer a good purpose or not, in time of war. If they cannot stand heavy broadsides, they may, at least, be valuable as transport ships, being safe from capture, by reason of their great speed. We may be enabled, too, by taking this course, to compel Great Britain to abandon the system, if it is an unwise one, as I regard it, thus to interfere with private enterprise.

I maintain that sound policy would, undoubtedly, require us to disband our Army and Navy, if all other nations would do the same thing. But we are compelled to keep up military establishments just to meet their efforts. For a similar reason, we ought to compete with them in this matter, and I am willing to do it for the next two years, as this amendment proposes. As we have gone into the system, I am not willing to abandon it, until we give it a fair trial, at least. All that gentlemen have said about the tariff, has nothing to do with this question. The cotton factories referred to, have been protected forty years at a high rate, and are even now receiving a benefit of thirty per cent. protection. But the principles of the cases are altogether dissimilar. It is proposed to sustain this line because it has to compete with one which the British Government supports out of its Treasury. But this is not the case with the manufacturing establishments. They are built up and supported entirely by private enterprise, and we may well require our establishments to meet them on equal terms, without bounties. But I have no hesitation in saying, that if the fact were otherwise, that if Great Britain were to give money from her Treasury to her manufacturing establishments, to enable them to undersell our workmen, that then I would be for interfering in some mode. But such is not the fact. So, on the other hand, if the Collins line had only to compete with the private enterprise of Great Britain, I would not vote to sustain it. Undoubtedly the friends of a protective tariff ought to go for this measure. For if their doctrine be right, that we ought, in some mode, to aid our own manufacturers in their competition with foreign labor, merely because it is foreign labor, then with much more reason ought they to go for sustaining this enterprise, competing as it does, not only with a foreign establishment, but also with one pensioned and supported by the Government expressly to enable it to break down all competition.

Mr. POLK. I desire to offer an amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. At this time an amendment is not in order. The question before the committee being the amendment offered by the gentleman from South Carolina, [Mr. ORR.]

Mr. ORR. I call for tellers on my amendment.

Tellers were ordered; and Messrs. STANTON, of Tennessee, and HENDRICKS were appointed; and the question being put, the tellers reported—ayes 61, noes 76.

So the amendment was not agreed to.

Mr. MEADE. Mr. Chairman, I move that the words "thirty-three" be stricken out in the ninth line, and the words "twenty-five" inserted in lieu thereof. If this were a question whether we should pay this sum, or that, or another, for merely the transportation of the mails across the Atlantic, I should vote against any appropriation. I do not base my support of any compensation upon any right of Congress to make appropriations to individuals or companies for the promotion of commerce, or for the transportation of mails across the high seas. The first question which addresses itself to my mind is, has Congress the right to maintain a Navy? And the next is, whether it be politic to increase our marine and naval force in this way? That is altogether a question of economy, and it rests with Congress to say whether they will increase their naval force in this way, or in some other—a question entirely of economy, and nothing else. We should first determine whether it would be politic or wise in us, in view of the vast increase of the steam naval force of other great maritime Powers of the world, to provide, also, for strengthening this particular arm of our defense.

Having determined that question in the affirmative—having determined that prudence and a wise foresight on our part require an increase of our steam navy, then the question occurs, in what way shall that increase be made? Now, sir, I was informed by a former Secretary of the Navy some years ago, that in case of any difficulty with France or Great Britain, that either of those Powers could, within fifteen days, assemble from thirty to forty war steamers at the mouth of the Mississippi; while at that time, I believe, we were provided with about half a dozen of very indifferent steam vessels. I came to the conclusion then, and subsequent reflection has confirmed me in the opinion, that it is necessary that we should, to a greater extent, be provided with this means of defense. Inasmuch as we are not immediately in want of war steamers; inasmuch as there is no necessity to put more in commission at this time, I should content myself with making adequate provision for cases of emergency hereafter; and the inquiry should be, how can this be done most economically and with due regard to efficiency?

Now, sir, in regard to the constitutional power. We can exercise it in several different ways. We can construct vessels and provide materials for their construction, and yet we may have no immediate use for them. We may, if we choose, build vessels and lend them to individuals, upon condition that they shall keep them in repair, and in readiness for the use of the Government when occasion shall require. There are various modes by which we can provide for an increase of our naval strength. One is by paying an annual compensation to those who shall build and keep in good condition such vessels as will answer for war steamers, and be subject at all times to the call of the Government. I say it is not a question of a constitutional character; it is one addressed entirely to our discretion. I am willing to increase to a reasonable extent the compensation to these steamers, but I am not willing to go to the extent contemplated by this amendment. I am willing to give these steamers $25,000 for each round trip they may make; and though it may be urged that these steamers are not fit for the purposes of war, about which there seems to be a variety of opinions—yet, sir, it cannot be denied they were constructed under the superintendence of one of our naval officers, with directions to see that they were so constructed as to answer the purposes of the Government, in case the Government should hereafter have occasion for them. It is, therefore, now too late to make that objection.

Mr. POLK. It is a little remarkable, Mr. Chairman, that a representative of a portion of the American people should feel impelled to address an American Congress, and remind them of their duty to their nationality. It is strange, sir, that men who are presumed to embody the wisdom of the land should have to be reminded and advised that they are pandering to British power—that they are forgetting American interests, and that they are losing sight of that grandeur and greatness which attaches to this Government. Am I, sir, to remind older men—men who have been indulging in politics for years, that we owe a sacred and glorious duty to our country? Are they willing to perform this duty, sir, in the matter at issue before us? May I stand upon the floor of the American Congress, and find men who are willing to measure our greatness by the circumference of a dollar—a dollar sir!—measure American prosperity, American greatness, by a round dollar—and thus to pander to British interests, to bow the pliant knee, and say to the power that assailed us at Lexington, that flashed the first gun from Bunker's Hill—that fought us upon sea and upon land in 1812—that has been jealous of our prosperity and greatness ever since—"Good mother, won't you carry our mails for us?" Why, sir, I scorn, I despise this anti-American feeling and sentiment. I regard it as one of those miserable pretenses which contribute to a cultivation of popular humbug, without having any sort of rhyme, or sense, or reason in it; and the men who stand to-day battling upon these principles, upon which gentlemen oppose this amendment, are behind the age. They are behind the progress of the country; they know nothing of its power or its influence, and are contributing to a combination of foreign policy designed to overshadow us.

My colleague from Tennessee [Mr. JONES] says, we have no constitutional power to carry the mails beyond our own limits. Sir, how are we to send any mails, then, beyond our limits? Are we to appropriate our money to foreign Powers to take charge of our mails, indispensable to be carried abroad to our foreign consuls and ministers? If the doctrine should obtain that this Government has no constitutional power to appropriate money by which we may transmit our mails beyond the limits of our country, why, we must cast ourselves into the arms of European Powers. The argument is fallacious.

But the gentlemen, in my opinion, who are for withholding aid from the Collins line—who are for striking down that line—are but contributing to the British policy. In regard to this and other American lines; they are in effect giving sanction to the disingenuous efforts of that Government, through a rotatory or sliding scale of freights, to break down all the American lines. With the view to show the means resorted to by that Government to break down the American line of steamers running from New York to Havre, and the points on the North sea, I will quote from Mr.

Livingston's memorial to Congress, in which is embraced a few extracts from English advertisements:

"The usual rate of freight from Havre to New York by steamers, before your memorialists' vessels were put on the line, was $40 per ton. The Cunard vessels, as the annexed extracts from their advertisements show, have reduced the rate as low as ten dollars per ton, and in order to carry out their plan, they transport French goods in small steamers from Havre to Liverpool. This reduction, too, is only made when one of your memorialists' vessels, the Humboldt or the Franklin, is about to leave Havre.

[EXTRACTS.]

Cunard advertisement, Havre, August, 1850.

"Shippers are advised that the rate of freight to the United States is $40 per ton."

The same rate for September, 1850."

Cunard advertisement, Havre, October 9, 1850.

"Shippers are advised that the rate of freight by this line [the Cunard] will be $30 per ton."

Cunard advertisement, Havre, November 4, 1850.

"Shippers are advised that the rate of freight after the 9th November, will be $40 per ton."

"The Franklin returned to Havre in December.

Cunard advertisement, Havre, December 2, 1850.

"Shippers are advised that for the month of December, up the 4th of January inclusive, the rate of freight will be $10 per ton."

And with little variation this course has been pursued throughout the year.

In the advertisement of the Cunard line of the last date, occurs a still more striking proof of the hostile character of the opposition of this company:

"Shippers are advised that goods for the American boats [the Collins line] leaving Liverpool in December, will be transported by the Cunard steamers from Havre to Liverpool free of all charge to the shippers."

"It thus appears that, not satisfied with the attempt to turn the whole course of the freight to their own boats by taking it at a ruinous rate, in order that nothing may be left for the boats of your memorialists, they offer to transport to Liverpool whatever may remain FREE OF CHARGE, thus also creating the erroneous impression on the minds of those engaged in the French trade, that both the English and American steamers from Liverpool were united against the Havre line.

"If any further doubt can be entertained as to the real nature of this competition, and its implacable hostility to this branch of our trade, it will be removed by the statement which your memorialists hold themselves ready to prove: that the agents of the Cunard line have deliberately avowed their purpose to break down and destroy the business of your petitioners, and utterly drive them from the line; that they have insultingly recommended your petitioners to take their boats off the Havre line, and send them to Bremen, engaging not to oppose them there—only, however, on the condition that they would not stop at Southampton; in other words, being willing to allow us the free use of the British Channel, provided we would not touch on either shore, but resolved that the United States Government should have no direct line of mail steamers from New York to Havre.

"This tells its own story; and this, in our judgment, should prompt every member of Congress who has at heart the welfare of the Republic, and the honor and pride of our country, zealously to labor to sustain all our existing lines of ocean steamers, but especially the lines between this port and Havre, and this port and Liverpool—both of which come in direct competition with the great Cunard line, which has so long monopolized the trade between this city and Europe, and been supported almost entirely by a tax upon American commerce, for the special benefit of the English Government. It is a line worthy of all praise, and has been conducted with an energy worthy of its projectors, and of the Government of Great Britain. But it is, in fact, a national not a private enterprise. Its object and its aim are to strengthen the British nation at the expense of the United States, and not to make money for individuals. And, under these circumstances, it is folly—nay, worse than folly—it is madness, to ask of our merchants to sustain so unequal a contest. Our Government must come to the rescue, and that right quickly, or it must result in the triumph of Great Britain, and the disgrace of the United States, by the withdrawal of the Havre and Collins steamers, and their sale to some European Governments for war steamers, if not to the British Government itself, through some of its numerous companies.

"This is plain and startling language; but it is not less true than plain and startling. Our merchants cannot contend against the omnipotency of the British Treasury; and if our Government will not open its eyes to the vital consequences of neglecting its imperative duty in this regard, there is no alternative but to submit to the consequences, humiliating as they are."

Such is the British effort to break down our lines of steamers—an effort to which gentlemen by their action here are contributing immensely.

What is the British policy in regard to her own steamers? She now pays to foster her line from Liverpool to New York, £171,364, or $856,820 annually. But this is not the whole truth in regard to what she pays:

"In truth, you cannot tell what is allowed by the British Government to the Cunard line. Do you know what is allowed for the line which they have established from Havre to Liverpool, which carries goods without charge at the time when a Cunard vessel is about to sail from Liverpool and an American steamer from Havre, until the American steamer has left the port of Havre, and then charges freight and raises the price across the ocean more than double? Can you tell what allowance is made to the Cunard line by the British Admiralty for this purpose? Can you tell what allowance is made for the Antwerp line, which has been just established in connection with the Cunard line, in order to break down your commercial intercourse with Europe?"

Doubtless that Government pays a much larger sum than is apparent in any document we have yet seen upon the subject. Her policy is an insidious one. She moves secretly and stealthily to the accomplishment of her purpose.

The capacity of the Collins steamers for war purposes has been contested on this floor. The gentleman from Alabama, [Mr. Houston,] the chairman of the Committee on Ways and Means, says that Commodore Skinner knows all about it. I would like to know if the chairman of the Committee on Ways and Means, as we are upon the deficiency bill, can tell if Commodore Skinner was ever on board a steamer in his life?

Mr. HOUSTON. Do you want an answer?

Mr. POLK. I do, sir.

[Here the hammer fell.]

Mr. DEAN moved that the committee rise.

The motion was agreed to.

The committee accordingly rose, and the Speaker having resumed the chair, the chairman reported that the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union had had under consideration the state of the Union generally, and particularly the Senate amendments to the deficiency bill, and had come to no resolution thereon.

Mr. STANTON, of Kentucky. I have a bill in my hand from the Committee on Public Buildings, "making appropriations for the public buildings and grounds, and for other purposes." I ask the unanimous consent of the House to report that bill, in order that it may be referred to the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union and printed.

There being no objection, the bill was received, read a first and second time by its title, referred to the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union, and ordered to be printed.

On motion by Mr. CLINGMAN, the House then adjourned until to-morrow at 11 o'clock.

PETITIONS, &c.

The following petitions, memorials, &c., were presented under the rule, and referred to the appropriate committees:

By Mr. THOMAS M. HOWE: Proceedings of a meeting of captains and owners of steamboats, held at the city of Pittsburg, indorsing the proceedings of a steamboat convention, held at Louisville, on the 7th of June, 1852.

By Mr. ROBBINS: The petition of John U. Laddenslager and 14 others, citizens of the county of Philadelphia, Pennsylvania, asking Congress to so modify the act passed September 28, 1850, as to give to each person intended to be benefited thereby, not less than one hundred and sixty acres of land.

By Mr. AVERETT: The petition of James Rangleley, praying for indemnity for French spoils prior to 1801.

By Mr. BERNHISEL: The petition of the Governor and Legislative Assembly of the Territory of Utah, asking Congress to provide for the construction of a line of electromagnetic telegraph from some point on the Mississippi or Missouri river, via Great Salt Lake City, to San Diego, San Francisco, or Astoria, on the coast of the Pacific.

By Mr. STRATTON: The petition of William Robinson and 45 others, citizens of Atlantic county, New Jersey, praying that the bounty land act of 1850 be so amended as to give one hundred and sixty acres of land to each person serving in the war of 1812.

By Mr. HENDRICKS: The petition of 220 citizens of the county of Shelby, State of Indiana, praying the passage of the House bill introduced by Mr. STANLY, entitled "A bill to authorize the Secretary of the Treasury to deposit with the several States the fourth installment of the deposits of the public money directed to be made with said States by an act approved June 23, 1836."

IN SENATE.

FRIDAY, July 9, 1852.

Prayer by the Rev. LITTLETON F. MORGAN.

Mr. ATCHISON called the Senate to order, and caused a letter to be read which he had received from the President pro tempore, requesting him to preside this day in the absence of the President.

PERSONAL EXPLANATION.

Mr. BORLAND. I would ask the indulgence of the Senate for a few minutes, to make a personal explanation.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. If there be no objection, the Senator can proceed.

Mr. BORLAND. I ask permission of the Senate to make a personal explanation, which is due alike to others and myself, and which a sense of propriety will not permit me to delay.

In a speech upon the deficiency bill, delivered by me here, on the 27th of May, and since published in pamphlet form, I presented statements of the receipts and expenditures of the several Administrations of the Government, from 1789 to 1851. Those statements appear in two tables, marked A and B, on the 16th, or last page of the pamphlet speech. As the facts which these statements exhibit have been deemed of some value, in the present aspect of public affairs, and as that value is dependent upon their accuracy, I have, at the suggestion of a respected friend, carefully revised them since their publication. I am thankful to that friend for the suggestion upon which I have done so; for it has enabled me to discover an error, which I have now risen, at the first available moment, to correct.

This error will be found in the table B, of expenditures. Under the head of "military service," the annual average of expenditure of Mr. Polk's administration is set down at $23,053,600 24; and that of the present Administration at $15,676,609 45.

Upon examination, it is found that these respective amounts are too large; and that they have been made so, in the calculations, by inadvertently adding into the column, the two next columns of "Pensions and Indian Department." Deducting these amounts from their improper association, and the true annual average of Mr. Polk's administration, for "Military Service," is $20,122,220 46; and that of the present Administration is $12,057,174 65.

The correction thus made in that column of the table necessarily carries a reduction of the amounts set down to the same Administrations, respectively, in the column headed "Expenditures exclusive of public debt," which, for Mr. Polk, is set down at $36,708,601 39; but should be $33,777,221 61; and for Mr. Fillmore, is set down at $40,177,030, but should be $36,557,595 20. And reduces, also, the corresponding amounts in the column headed "Total expenditures," which, for Mr. Polk, is set down at $43,897,916 51, but should be $40,966,536 73; and for Mr. Fillmore is set down at $55,442,481 00, but should be $51,823,846 20.

These corrections extend to pages 13 and 14 of the pamphlet speech, where deductions from the tabular statements will be found. Thus, in the last paragraph of page 13, the sum of $23,053,600 must be reduced to $20,122,220; and $15,676,609 to $12,057,174. In the second paragraph, on page 14, $3,416,762 must be reduced to $2,780,373. In the fourth paragraph of the same page, $40,886,237 must be reduced to $38,321,880; and in the same paragraph, $709,207 must be increased to $1,764,285. In the fifth paragraph of the same page, $41,685,812 must be reduced to $38,066,377; and in the same paragraph, $799,575 must be reduced to $255,503, and the word "more" must be changed to the word "less." And in the same paragraph, but at the top of the second column of the page, $3,468,429 must be reduced to $2,720,374.

These errors, which I have now corrected, although they run through a considerable number of figures, and may seem to be numerous, are, in fact, but parts of a single error, and consist in deductions from it; and that single error, as I have already stated, resulted from no want of knowledge of the facts, and no purpose I could have had to misstate them; but from an inadvertence, by which, in the midst of a great number and variety of estimates, and in the course of very complicated calculations, two comparatively small items were added into the wrong column.

To show that I could have had no motive to commit the error, which I have now corrected, it will be seen that it was made in the case of both the administrations of Mr. Polk and Mr. Fillmore, between which I was instituting a comparison under those particular heads of expenditure; thus, making the former $23,053,600, when it should be only $20,122,220; and the latter $15,676,609, when it should be only $12,057,174.

It will be observed, further, that the error, even if left uncorrected, did not materially aid the purpose for which I made the comparison, which exhibited the extravagance of one Administration by showing its expenditures and its circumstances by the side of those of another. This error caused me to overcharge each of those Administrations some three millions of dollars for army expenditures, and show an expenditure by Mr. Fillmore only some $8,000,000 less than by Mr. Polk for "military services." As now correctly stated, the difference is just $8,065,056 under that head, and still shows that the peace administration of Mr. Fillmore, exclusive of the amount of public debt paid, has cost the country $2,720,374 a year more than the war administration of Mr. Polk; and, including the public debt, $10,857,310 a year more!

I will add but a single reflection to this. We were often told during the war with Mexico, that the Government would be made bankrupt by its expenses. Some politicians, in a spirit of very peculiar economy, refused, I think, to vote the necessary supplies to prosecute that war. And even since its termination, jeremiads have not been wanting to celebrate its ruinous expenses. In the light of the figures I have exhibited, however, the true character of the war in that respect, at least, is so clearly shown, that the occupation of a class of orators is gone, and certain "blue lights" have paled their ineffectual fires. For while the war with Mexico was as admirable for the wise economy of its financial as for the brilliancy of its military conduct, it has been followed by a civil Administration which, in a time of profound peace, has increased the expenditures at least twenty-five per cent. per annum! So, if war at $40,000,000 a year would have made the Government bankrupt, what is to become of us now when peace costs us $50,000,000?

A poet has somewhere said—

"Peace has its victories as well as war."

Had that poet lived until now, the achievements of this Whig Administration of ours would have enabled him to add with perfect truth—

And tho' more bloodless, more expensive far.

To make this explanation the more intelligible and clear to every mind which may have been for a moment misled by my inadvertent error, I will append to my remarks those parts of my former speech which I have here corrected:

Extracts from speech, corrected.

"During Mr. Polk's war administration, the expenditures for our large army, on war service in a foreign country, averaged $20,122,220 46; whereas, during Mr. Fillmore's peace administration, with a mere skeleton of an army, we have had to pay, for its mere support, $12,057,174 65 per annum! And this without counting in the present year, which, as far as can be ascertained, will greatly exceed this large average."

"During Mr. Polk's war administration, when the Navy was kept always ready, and the most of it actively engaged in sea service, and at the highest necessary expense, its average expenditure was only $7,504,468; whereas, during the three years of Mr. Fillmore's peace administration, with many of our ships neither needed nor engaged in active service, it has cost us $8,896,976 per annum—that is, $1,392,508 for peace more than for war!"

"Thus, striking the balance under these three heads alone, we find that Mr. Fillmore's three years of peace with all the world's has cost us in actual money just $2,720,373 59 per annum more than Mr. Polk's one year of peace and three years of war!—Without counting the 533,070 square miles of territory, embracing 1,000 miles of sea-coast, acquired by the war."

"To show that I am right in this, let us look at the items of that account. During Mr. Polk's administration of four years, the annual average of the public debt created by him was $11,733,974; while the annual average amount of the same debt paid by him was $7,189,315; leaving an annual balance against him of $4,544,659—that is, an aggregate for his whole term of $17,508,782, or about the amount (including some $200,000 of interest) which has since been paid to Mexico, under the treaty of Guadalupe Hidalgo. But adding this whole amount to that already charged to his Administration, and it carries his annual average up to $38,321,880, which is only $1,764,285 more than I have heretofore stated Mr. Fillmore's to be."

"A similar statement for Mr. Fillmore's administration shows that he has created for his three years an annual public debt of $10,878,233; while the annual average amount of the same debt paid by him has been $9,369,451, leaving an annual balance against him of $1,508,782—that is, counting his full term of four years, and in liberality to him assuming no more for this year than the average of the other three, an aggregate of $6,035,128. This, added to his other expenditures, as in the case of Mr. Polk, carries Mr. Fillmore's annual average up to $41,685,812, which still leaves him, upon a final balance of cash accounts, chargeable with expenditures $255,503, $799,575 less than Mr. Polk!"

"But this, it will be perceived, is not dealing fairly with Mr. Polk's administration, upon the rule adopted in estimating and comparing the expenditures of all preceding Administrations. I have, in this particular estimate, done this unfairly to Mr. Polk, that the friends of this Administration should not have even a semblance of a pretext for complaint; and to show that even then, the balance was in his favor against Mr. Fillmore. To state the account fairly, however, as in the cases of all the other Administrations, the whole public debt must be excluded, as well for Mr. Polk as for Mr. Fillmore, and this leaves the difference as I originally and fairly stated it—that is, a balance against Mr. Fillmore of $2,720,374 per annum!"

RAILROAD IN CALIFORNIA.

By unanimous consent, Mr. GWIN informally laid upon the table a substitute for the bill granting a donation of land for the construction of a railroad in California; which was ordered to be printed.

ORDER OF BUSINESS.

Mr. CLARKE. I desire to give notice that I shall ask leave to introduce a joint resolution.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair will inform the Senator from Rhode Island, that this being Friday, under the rule, and under the decision of the Chair heretofore made and acquiesced in by the Senate, no business can be entertained unless the rule setting apart Fridays for the consideration of private, to the exclusion of all other business, shall be suspended.

Mr. DAVIS. I move that the rule requiring private bills to be taken up this day, to the exclusion of all other business, be suspended, to enable the Senate to take up the bill which we had under consideration the day before yesterday—the bill to amend an act entitled "An act to provide for the better security of the lives of passengers on vessels propelled in whole or in part by steam."

Mr. PRATT. I hope the Senate will not agree to that motion. There is no one who estimates more fully than I do the importance of the bill which has been introduced by the Senator from Massachusetts. It is very important to insure its passage during the present session of Congress; but whether it is passed to-day or to-morrow, cannot be of any consequence to the country at large, or to any individual in the country. I hope, therefore, that the consideration of private bills will not be dispensed with, for that or any other purpose. During the pendency before the Senate of the deficiency bill, which is now under consideration in the other House, I think there were three Fridays appropriated to its consideration. Now, there can be no reason why the bill suggested by the Senator from Massachusetts should be taken up; on the contrary, even if private business did not interpose, I would ask the Senator and the Senate to postpone the consideration of that bill for to-day. It relates to a matter in which the whole country is deeply interested. I have sent to the Board of Trade of Baltimore a copy of the bill as amended, with the request that they would indicate, so far as the practical men interested in the subject may desire to do, any amendment which may suggest itself to them. I think it is a measure which the practical men of the whole country should have an opportunity of looking into; and when we pass it, it should be made as perfect as possible. It can be of no importance whether it is passed to-day or to-morrow. It has been suggested that there is a committee of gentlemen here deeply interested in its passage, who have taken some pains in furnishing statistical information; but, sir, they have already given all the information which may be desired by the Senate, and I think they may go home perfectly satisfied that the bill, amended so as to suit the views expressed by other sections of the country, will be passed during the present session of Congress. I hope the execution of the order will not be suspended.

Mr. DAVIS. It is always with reluctance that I move to take up any business out of its regular order, but I have been requested by a number of Senators to make this motion this morning. They are, as I am, anxious that this subject should be disposed of. I should personally be very glad to accommodate the Senator from Maryland, and all gentlemen who wish to be heard upon it; but if we are to wait for the day when every man who may have some opinion about this matter will come here to express it, no day of legislation will come—no day of completion will come. Every pains have been taken to collect public opinion, to give a publicity to this measure, to spread extra copies of the bill everywhere over the country, and there has been a delay of some four or five months since the bill was reported, and I had hoped that everybody who desired to do so would have in that time come forward and expressed his opinion. I hope the bill will be taken up and disposed of to-day; but I will not consume the time of the Senate any further in making arguments about it.

Mr. BRIGHT. I have not voted, I believe, during the session to supersede private business set apart for Fridays; but I will do it this morning, believing that the bill proposed to be taken up is more important than any other bill before us. I will say further, that if I believed it would take more than an hour to perfect it, I would not vote to suspend the special order of business; but I think we can take the bill up and dispose of it within half an hour. I hope the Senator from Maryland will withdraw his objection, and let us take it up. If it takes over half an hour, I believe I may say that I will vote to postpone it; but I think we shall dispose of it within an hour at most.

Mr. PRATT. If any one will suggest a sensible reason why this bill should be taken up and passed through to-day, I will yield with a great deal of pleasure. Why is it? I have heard no reason given. The gentlemen say they are anxious to have it passed. Well, sir, every gentleman who has charge of a particular bill is anxious to have it passed; but that is not a reason why the rules of the Senate should be abrogated to carry out each one's special desire. This day is set apart by a resolution of the Senate for the consideration of private bills. The bill which it is desired to take up, undoubtedly, from its very importance, will be passed. There can be no doubt that the country will be benefited by its passage, whether it is taken up to-day or not; but if you let this Friday be occupied with its consideration you will exclude from the consideration of the Senate, all those private bills which would pass to-day, and take away the possibility of their passing the other House. Here are claimants against the Government, to whom thousands of dollars are justly due, whose claims have been reported upon by committees, year after year, and if they are not acted on soon, by the Senate, cannot receive the sanction of Congress during the present session. The bill with which it is asked to supersede them, will be acted on undoubtedly either to-morrow, or whenever the Senate will meet again. I do think, therefore, that every reason which has been suggested why it should pass to-day, does not afford any adequate reason for postponing private bills. Senators have assigned no reason why its passage to-day would be advantageous to the country, and why it would be better to pass it to-day rather than to-morrow. On the contrary, I have suggested that I have sent the bill as amended to one of the largest commercial cities of the Union, with the view that those interested may make some suggestions in reference to the amendments. It seems, therefore, to me, so far as any reason has been assigned, that justice and policy dictate that you should wait until the persons so deeply interested may have an opportunity of having their views known.

Mr. HAMLIN. I do not know that I can give a "sensible" reason why the Senate should proceed to the consideration of this bill; indeed, I am very fearful that I shall not give such a reason as the Senator from Maryland will deem "sensible;" but I can give one or two which will control my vote, and I shall be glad if they will control the vote of a majority of the Senate. I have voted, I think, uniformly with my friend from Maryland during the whole of this session, to adhere to the rules of the Senate as applicable to private bills; and I am deeply sensible of the importance which attaches to these bills; but I shall depart from him on this occasion, and vote to proceed to the consideration of the bill relating to steamboats. The first reason which will induce me to vote for that motion is, that within the last two or three days, which have been somewhat broken, we have taken out of their ordinary course, and acted upon, as many private bills as we would pass in one whole day. That is one reason. Another is, that the bill relating to steamboats is a very particular bill; and if the Senator from Maryland were on the Committee on Commerce, from which it came, I apprehend he would concur with its members in a very hearty desire to be rid of it. It is an important bill. We are, and have been, receiving suggestions from practical men all over the country, and we desire to be rid of the bill, and pass it in such a shape as the Senate shall see fit. If it is passed at all through the other House, it is very desirable that it should go there at as early a day as possible. I think with the Senator from Indiana, [Mr. BRIGHT,] that we may perfect it in a short time; perhaps as much time has already been taken up in discussing the preliminary question, whether we shall proceed to its consideration, as would be taken up in passing the bill.

Mr. BRODHEAD. I rise merely to make an inquiry. Is this the Friday upon which private bills are considered without debate?

Several SENATORS. No.

Mr. BRODHEAD. Then, if debate be allowable to-day, on private bills, I shall vote to take up the bill proposed by the Senator from Massachusetts.

Mr. BORLAND. I hope that bill will be taken up. I have, with the Senator from Indiana, [Mr. BRIGHT,] heretofore invariably gone for taking up private bills on Fridays, to the exclusion of all public business; but the bill of the Senator from Massachusetts is of too much importance to the whole country to be deferred any longer than is absolutely necessary. As has been justly said, this is a long bill, involving many details, and it will necessarily receive a careful revision in the House. The consideration of it will involve some time there; and, therefore, the sooner we get through with it here the better. I hope no further objection will be made to taking it up.

Mr. PRATT. Every Senator who has spoken on the other side has said that heretofore he has invariably voted with me against the postponement of private bills on Fridays; and yet, it is unfortunately known to the country, or to that part of it interested in these private claims, that a proposition has never been made to postpone them that has not succeeded.

Mr. BORLAND. The Senator is mistaken in that.

Mr. PRATT. They have always been postponed, without a single exception, to the best of my recollection. My friend from Maine, who ordinarily offers sensible reasons, when they can be offered from the nature of the subject, has said that he had two, which he deemed, at any rate, sufficiently sensible to govern his vote. What are they? In the first place, that this is a very particular bill. I cannot see how he makes that a reason. I suppose that every claimant, who is suffering from the want of money due from the United States, will consider his claim to be a very particular one. I cannot see that there is much in that reason, sensible as my friend thinks it is. The next is, that yesterday some two or three private bills were passed by the Senate. They were taken up out of their order. Senators asked the favor of the Senate to take up these bills—bills against which nobody could object; and they were so taken out of their order, and passed without discussion.

To-day is the day upon which those bills would not be considered; but to-day is the day upon which bills upon the Private Calendar, which will be discussed, will be considered, and an objection to which, if made, will not carry them over. I do not see, therefore, that the fact that yesterday some bills upon the Calendar were taken up out of their order, to which nobody objected at all, can be a just reason why these bills, which will be taken up in their regular order on the Calendar to-day, if we proceed to its consideration, should be postponed.

Mr. RUSK. I believe if we had had no discussion on the motion to take up the bill, we should have had it passed by this time, and, therefore, I do not intend to consume much time in speaking now; but I will give one or two reasons which operate strongly on my mind in influencing me to go against my friend from Maryland, with whom I have generally gone on such occasions as this; though I will not claim the credit of having always done so. There has been no more important bill before this body at this session than the one alluded to, and there will be no more important one before us. The sacrifice of property and human life upon steam-vessels has been fearful for years past. This bill has been prepared with great labor, and after a vast deal of investigation by the Senator from Massachusetts, aided by gentlemen of intelligence, integrity, and experience; who are familiar with steamboating. They have now got it perfected; and I believe that when the Chamber of Commerce, to which the honorable Senator from Maryland has sent the bill, come to look at it, they will approve of every item in it. We are drawing near the close of the session. A vast deal of property is involved in the operation of this bill, and the bill itself will draw out discussion in the House of Representatives. The delay of a day here may jeopard it there. If the safety of millions of property, if the safety of thousands of human lives from sacrifice, is an important reason—and it is, to my mind, very important—the bill should be taken up.

Mr. ADAMS. I rise for the purpose of making a single suggestion. It seems to be agreed upon all hands that it is important to act upon this bill, and to act upon it at once. As suggested by the Senator from Texas, the delay of a single day may defeat its passage in the House of Representatives. I would suggest to the Senator from Maryland that we have already passed more private bills and other bills this session than in all human probability will be acted upon in the other House. If this bill is important, as we all think it to be; if there is a chance of passing it now, and having it acted upon in the other House, that, it seems to me, would be a "sensible" reason for taking it up and acting upon it now. I beg leave to make this suggestion. It seems to be agreed on all hands that it is important to act upon it now, and equally agreed that we should act upon the Private Calendar one day in the week. I propose, then, that, by common consent, we meet to-morrow, and spend at least one Saturday in session. After the great number of holidays, it seems to me that no Senator who desires to discharge his duty to the country will hesitate to meet to-morrow, and take up the Private Calendar, and transact the business which, under the rule, should have come up to-day.

Mr. MALLORY. I would be very glad to see a day set apart for the consideration of the bill of the Senator from Massachusetts; but I should also be glad if the Senate abstain from taking it up now. From the examination which I have given to it, with all due deference to the opinion of the honorable Senator who advocates it, I think that the important end which he seeks here, may be attained by other means than those embodied in this bill. It undertakes, if my reading of it be correct, to define in the most minute manner the duties of the owners of vessels propelled by steam, and provides, even to their engines, valves, boats, &c., for the safety of passengers. It strikes me, that the end to be attained might be reached more safely and philosophically, by embodying some broad provision in the bill, by which the owners of steam passenger vessels will be held accountable for losses, and leaving to them what means they choose to employ. In this age of progress, when almost every week brings forth some improvement in steam machinery, to attempt to shackle improvements by any legislation of this kind, seems to be unwise. It seems to me, that the owners of vessels should be left to employ what means, engineers, and pilots they please, but on their risk and responsibility; and that we should adopt the plan—which I believe prevails in England to a considerable extent—of holding them responsible for damages, and leaving them to the employment of such means as they think proper. The bill contemplates the appointment of some twenty or forty inspectors of boilers and hulls of vessels, upon whose certificates—

Mr. HALE. I desire to ask the Senator what the question is? I suggest to him that his remarks are not pertinent to the question before the Senate.

Mr. MALLORY. The question is, whether the bill shall be taken up. I am giving some reasons why it should not be taken up now.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair is of opinion that the Senator is in order.

Mr. MALLORY. I will say, then, that if the plan which I propose can be reached, if the safety of life in vessels propelled by steam can be reached, by other means than this special legislation, it will be in harmony with the progress of the age, and be better attained. At present we have the influence of owners of steamboats between us and damage and loss. We propose now to substitute for that self-interest some thirty or forty inspectors of the hulls of vessels and machinery, upon whose discretion the lives and property of citizens of the United States will depend; for upon that discretion, wisely or not, will vessels be empowered to navigate the high seas by steam. I therefore ask that the bill may not be taken up to-day.

The motion to postpone the execution of the special order for this day, for the purpose of taking up the bill named, was agreed to; there being, on a division—ayes 29, noes 4.

SAFETY OF PASSENGERS ON STEAMBOATS.

The Senate then took up the bill entitled "An act to amend an act entitled 'An act to provide for the better security of the lives of passengers on board of vessels propelled in whole or in part by steam.'"

The PRESIDING OFFICER, (Mr. Foor in the chair.) This bill has been reported from the Senate as in Committee of the Whole, with a great number of amendments. If it be the pleasure of the Senate, the bill will be read section by section.

Mr. BRIGHT. I hope the bill will be read section by section.

Mr. SHIELDS. I think that will be a very slow process, and I would suggest to the Senator from Indiana, that unless there is some special objection to particular amendments which have been made in Committee of the Whole, we had better act on the whole together. My impression is, that the Senate are disposed to sustain the amendments as they now stand, and it will save a great deal of time if we can act on the amendments as a whole, except there may be a wish to modify some particular amendment.

Mr. BRIGHT. I have no anxiety in relation to the course that is pursued, further than that I wish to have an opportunity to offer two or three small amendments. I only ask that the bill may be read for the information of Senators who were not present when it was acted upon before.

Mr. HALE. I hope it will be read section by section.

Mr. DAVIS. I wish to inquire if the bill has been reported to the Senate?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. It was reported to the Senate when it was last acted upon.

Mr. DAVIS. Then I suppose the first question will be on concurring in the amendments reported by the committee.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. That is the first question.

Mr. DAVIS. I would ask my friend from New Hampshire [Mr. HALE] not to call for the reading of the bill at this time; it will occupy a considerable portion of the time of the Senate, and will result in very little advantage. Perhaps the shortest course, and that which would be most acceptable to the Senate, and the most intelligible, would be to take up these amendments in the order in which they were made, and act upon them, and, at the same time, act upon such other minor propositions to amend as may be necessary to perfect the bill. I find, on looking over it, that there are two or three slight errors, typographical and others, which will require correction; and, in order to insure accuracy, I think it will be well, if it be the pleasure of the Senate, to take up the amendments in consecutive order, and dispose of them.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senate will take such action in regard to the matter as it sees fit to adopt.

Mr. DAVIS. If the Senate will permit me, I will move to amend the third line of the first section, by supplying a verbal omission.

I move to insert the words "or enrollment" after the word "register," so that the section will read:

Be it enacted, &c. That no license, register, or enrollment under the provisions of this or the act to which this is an amendment, shall be granted, or other papers issued by any collector, to any vessel propelled in whole or in part by steam, until he shall have satisfactory evidence that all the provisions of this act have been fully complied with; and if any such vessel shall be navigated, with passengers on board, without complying with the terms of this act, the owners thereof, and the vessel itself, shall be subject to the penalties contained in the second section of the act to which this is an amendment.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair begs to suggest, that it is not in order to propose any new amendments to the bill, until those reported by the committee have been disposed of.

Mr. DAVIS. I am aware of that, but I ask the unanimous consent of the Senate to make this amendment.

No objection being made, the amendment was agreed to.

Mr. DAVIS. I hope the amendments will now be taken up and acted on in their consecutive order.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The amendments will be read in their order, and any amendment which a Senator desires to amend, debate, or modify, will be noted by the Secretary and reserved. The vote will be taken upon those to which no objection is made in the aggregate. The others will be taken up seriatim.

Mr. HALE. This is an exceedingly important bill. I understand that it proposes to make a number of very important alterations in the existing laws in relation to steamboats; and it appears to me vastly more proper that we should adopt the usual course, and read the bill section by section. I am not aware that the bill has been read through even once. I think the rules of the Senate require that it should be read.

Mr. RUSK. I will state to the Senator from New Hampshire, that this bill has been under the careful consideration of the Senator from Massachusetts, [Mr. DAVIS,] for one or two sessions prior to the present session of Congress. He has not only labored most arduously upon it himself, but he has consulted very extensively and patiently with all parties interested—with engineers, captains of steamboats, and all parties familiar with the use of steam. He has had consultations with many of the most respectable owners of steamboats, many of whom are here, and with their aid the bill has been perfected. They understand this matter better than the Senate, or at all events better, perhaps, than any one individual member of the Senate, and they unanimously agree that the bill, in the main, is correct. I understand that the honorable Senator from Massachusetts has one or two slight amendments to make, so as to make the bill correspond with amendments which were made to it the other day, and also with the views of the gentlemen I have adverted to. These men are entirely disinterested. Many of them are men of great experience in matters of this kind, captains of steamboats, some of them of thirty-five years' standing, and most successful navigators, and their views on such an important subject should not be disregarded.

Mr. DAVIS. I will state for the information of the Senator from New Hampshire, that when this bill was taken up, the reading of it commenced, and was continued for nearly half an hour when the Senate unanimously agreed to suspend the further reading of it. All that part of it which is now under consideration was read, and if it be read again it will be very apt to share the fate of other bills when being read, and gentlemen will go to reading, and writing, and talking, and no attention will be paid to the reading of the bill. I do not think it is at all necessary to read it again. Besides, it strikes me that, as a matter of right, I do not think this is exactly the point at which a gentleman has a right to call for the reading of the bill.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. If it is insisted upon, the bill will be read section by section, as I think that is the usual course.

Mr. SHIELDS. As I understand it, the bill has been considered by the Senate as in Committee of the Whole, and has been reported. If that is so, then I think the Senator from New Hampshire has no right to call for the reading of the bill at this time. I will not say that the Senator would not listen to the reading of it, but I will state that my impression is, that if it were read section by section, the Senator from New Hampshire would not be able very much to improve it.

Mr. HALE. What?

Mr. SHIELDS. I say that I think if the bill were read again, the Senator from New Hampshire would not be able to improve it very much.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The regular parliamentary course, in the judgment of the Chair, will be to take up the series of amendments in their order, and call upon the Senate to act upon each amendment as agreed to in Committee of the Whole.

Mr. HALE. I remember that I once asked to have a bill read, which appropriated some thirteen or fourteen millions of dollars for the support of the Navy; and it was considered a very contumacious and factious act to ask for the reading, and not to be ready at once to vote away that sum. If there is anything in our rules, with regard to the right of a Senator to call for the reading of a bill, I should like to have it read. As to the suggestion of the Senator from Illinois [Mr. SHIELDS] that I cannot improve the bill, I will say that I do not know whether I can or not till I try. All I ask is to know whether I have a right to have the bill read, or whether a majority may push a bill through without reading. If they may, it is time that the Senate should look around them.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair will remark, that he is informed by the Secretary that it is agreeable to usage to take up the amendments in their order, and act upon them separately.

Mr. BRIGHT. The Chair is correct. The parliamentary usage is, to take up the amendments made in Committee of the Whole, seriatim, and act upon them; and if any Senator has amendments to offer, it is his privilege to offer them.

Mr. DAVIS. Then I hope the Senate will proceed to act upon the amendments in their order.

The second section was then acted upon as amended in the Committee of the Whole, by inserting in the third line the words "appointed under the provisions of this act;" and by adding at the end of the section the following proviso:

Provided, however, If the structure of steamers navigating rivers only be such, or the arrangement of the boilers or machinery be such, that the requirements aforesaid cannot, without serious inconvenience or sacrifice be complied with, inspectors may vary therefrom, if in their judgment it can be done with safety.

The amendments were concurred in, and the section, as amended, is as follows:

Sec. 2. And be it further enacted, That it shall be the duty of the inspectors of the hulls of steamers, and the inspectors of boilers and engines, appointed under the provisions of the act, to examine and see that suitable and safe provisions are made throughout such vessel to guard against loss or danger from fire; and no license or other papers on any application shall be granted, if the directions of the inspectors for preventing fires are not complied with, or if any combustible material, liable to take fire from heated iron, or any other heat generated on board of such vessels in and about the boilers, pipes, or machinery, shall be placed at less than eighteen inches distant from such heated metal, or other substance likely to cause ignition, unless a column of air or water intervenes between such heated surface and any wood or other combustible material so exposed, sufficient at all times, and under all circumstances, to prevent ignition; and further, when wood is so exposed to ignition, as an additional preventive, it shall be shielded by some incombustible material, in such manner as to leave the air to circulate freely between such material and the wood: Provided, however, If the structure of steamers navigating rivers only, be such, or the arrangement of the boilers or machinery be such, that the requirements aforesaid cannot, without serious inconvenience or sacrifice, be complied with, inspectors may vary therefrom, if, in their judgment, it can be done with safety.

The next amendment was to insert in the third section the words—

"And shall also have suitable provision for turning at any time a current of steam into the hold."

The amendment was concurred in.

The next amendment was to strike out the words—

"Provided, however, That any steamer which shall not at any time carry more than fifty passengers, shall not be required to have more than two such pumps, one of which shall be prepared to work by steam as aforesaid,"

and insert—

Provided, That in steamers navigating rivers only, one of the pumps aforesaid may be dispensed with, if the other provisions for extinguishing fire are, in the opinion of the inspectors, sufficient to secure safety.

The amendment was concurred in, and the section, as thus amended, is as follows:

Sec. 3. And be it further enacted, That every vessel so propelled by steam, and carrying passengers, shall have not less than three forcing pumps, of at least six-inch chamber, two to be worked by hand, and one by steam, if steam can be employed, otherwise by hand, one whereof shall be placed near the stern, one near the stem, and one amidship, each having a suitable, well-fitted hose, of at least two thirds the length of the vessel, kept at all times in perfect order, and ready for immediate use; each of which pumps shall also be supplied with water by a pipe connected therewith, and passing through the side of the vessel, so low as to be at all times in the water when she is afloat, and shall also have suitable provision for turning at any time a current of steam into the hold: Provided, That in steamers navigating rivers only, one of the pumps aforesaid may be dispensed with, if the other provisions for extinguishing fire are, in the opinion of the inspectors, sufficient to secure safety.

The next amendments were to strike out from the eighth, ninth, and tenth lines of the fourth section the words—

"—and having a canvas fender around the gunwale filled with cork of not less than six inches in diameter."

And from the twenty-first line the word "small," before the words "steamers of light draught."

The amendments were concurred in.

Mr. DAVIS. The next amendment is to insert after the word "rivers," in the twenty-second line, the words—

"—and also to allow any other steamers, navigating rivers only, to carry but one metallic life-boat, the same being of suitable model and dimensions."

I wish to make a slight modification of that amendment, so that it may not be misinterpreted. I wish to strike out the word "metallic," at the end of the twenty-third line, and insert after the word "dimensions," in the twenty-fifth line, the words "and made of metal." That alteration will make the amendment read without a doubtful construction. Otherwise it would be doubtful as to the specific kind of life-boat to be used.

The amendment to the amendment was agreed to.

Mr. BRODHEAD. I desire to make an inquiry, relative to the metallic life-boats, of the Senator from Massachusetts, [Mr. DAVIS.] The fourth section provides, that all steamships carrying passengers shall be furnished with two boats, one of which shall be a metallic life-boat. The point of inquiry is this: Whether, if this bill passes, all these steamers will not be obliged to procure a life-boat which has been patented? The Senate will perceive that if all the owners of steam-vessels are compelled to get a particular kind of boat which has been patented, that fact alone would be worth a million of dollars to the patentee. I do not know that this would be the construction placed on that section, or that such would be the effect of the bill if it becomes a law; but I should like to hear the construction put on this section by the Senator from Massachusetts. He has already stated to me his views on this subject in private conversation; but I would be gratified if he would state them again for the benefit of the public.

Mr. DAVIS. I would state, for the information of the Senate, that I have endeavored to draw up this bill so as to avoid compelling the owners of steamboats to purchase any patent from anybody. I am aware of the difficulty of compelling a large class of persons to purchase a patented article, and understand the effect of this quite as well as the Senator does. I have been entreated, from various quarters, to adopt a particular course with respect to the patent; but I have the assurance of Mr. Francis himself, again and again, that he does not claim the patent of making metallic life-boats; he claims only the right of making a life-boat with corrugated iron, in a new and peculiar way. He has stated, again and again, that anybody can construct a metallic life-boat without interfering with his patent. My opinion is, that this section does not interfere with his patent. If I thought that it did, I should abandon it at once.

Mr. BRODHEAD. I am satisfied.

The question was then taken on concurring in the amendment as amended, and it was decided in the affirmative.

The section, as thus amended, then stood as follows:

SEC. 4. And be it further enacted, That every such vessel carrying passengers shall have at least two boats supplied with oars, in good condition at all times for service, one of which boats shall be a metallic life-boat, fire-proof, of approved model, not less than twenty-five feet long, six feet six inches wide, and two feet deep, and in all respects a good, substantial, safe sea-boat, capable of sustaining, inside and outside, fifty persons, with life lines attached to the gunwale at suitable distances. And every such vessel carrying more than fifty passengers shall also have a similar boat for every additional fifty passengers, or, instead thereof, for every such number, a good, substantial, safe, wooden life-boat, of suitable model, fitted with life-lines, in manner aforesaid, and capable of sustaining, inside and outside, that number of persons: Provided, however, That ferry and tow-boats shall be exempt from the obligation to carry the life-boats herein provided for; and the inspectors are hereby authorized to grant a like dispensation to steamers of light draught, navigating small or shallow rivers, and also to allow any other steamers navigating rivers only to carry but one life-boat, the same being of suitable model and dimensions, and made of metal: Provided, They shall be fully satisfied that such steamers have other provisions for the preservation of life in case of fire, which are amply sufficient for that purpose.

The next amendments were in the fifth section, in which the words, "except ferry-boats," and the words "or other equally suitable material, or in the place of such life-preservers, floats, if as well adapted to the purpose," were proposed to be inserted, and the word "or," before the word "copper," stricken out.

The amendments were concurred in, and the section, as amended, is as follows:

SEC. 5. And be it further enacted, That every such vessel carrying passengers, except ferry-boats, shall also be provided with a good life-preserver, made of cork, double tin, copper, or other equally suitable material, or in the place of such life-preservers, floats, if as well adapted to the purpose, for each and every person on board, which life-preservers shall always be distributed and kept in readiness in the berths and state-rooms for the benefit of passengers occupying the same, and also in the most conspicuous and suitable place for all others; and shall also keep after the rate of eight fire buckets and three axes for every hundred tons measurement of the vessel, which shall always be kept distributed in a suitable manner and in good order, ready to be used in case of fire.

The next amendment was to add the following as an additional section, which was concurred in:

SEC. 6. And be it further enacted, That every such vessel carrying passengers on the main or lower deck shall be provided with sufficient means convenient to such passengers for their escape to the upper deck in case of fire or other accident endangering life.

The next amendment was to strike out, in the seventh section, the words, "nor shall powder, oil of turpentine, or materials which ignite by friction, be carried by any such vessels as freight; and when kept on board as stores, they must be placed in metallic vessels," and insert the following:

Except in state-rooms or apartments where no burning light is allowed to be used; no loose hemp shall be carried on board any such vessel, nor shall baled hemp be carried on the deck or the guards thereon, unless the bales are compactly pressed and well covered with bagging, or a similar fabric; nor shall gunpowder, oil of turpentine, or materials which ignite by friction, be carried on board any such vessel as freight, except in cases of special license for that purpose, as hereinafter provided; and all such articles kept on board as stores shall be secured in metallic vessels; and every person who shall knowingly violate any of the provisions of this section, shall pay a penalty of $100 for each offense, to be recovered by action of debt in any court of competent jurisdiction.

Mr. BROOKE. I would suggest a slight amendment to the amendment, by inserting after the word "oil," the words "or spirits," so as to include spirits of turpentine as well as oil of turpentine.

The amendment to the amendment was agreed to.

Mr. CLARKE. I move to amend the amendment still further, by inserting after the word "turpentine," the words "oil of vitriol." That is an article which is carried in carboys, on board steamers, and is really as combustible as any other article, and as dangerous an article of transportation as can be found.

The amendment to the amendment was agreed to.

Mr. HALE. I wish to suggest that there are various other kinds of fluid which are equally combustible as spirits of turpentine, such as camphene and other burning fluids, from which great injuries often occur. I think the whole family of them should be treated alike.

Mr. DAVIS. I quite agree to that. I know these articles are as dangerous and explosive as gunpowder. In the original section these articles were inserted, and if any gentleman chooses to insert them here, I have no objection.

Mr. HALE. I propose, then, to insert after the word "turpentine," the words "camphene or other burning fluids."

Mr. SHIELDS. That will exclude whisky.

Mr. HALE. Some of my friends think that will cut off whisky; but I believe the words "burning fluid" are well known in commerce, and have a significance of their own.

Mr. DAVIS. I would observe to the Senator from New Hampshire that some burning fluids are explosive, and some are not.

Mr. CHARLTON. I would suggest that the words used, be "other explosive burning fluids."

Mr. HALE. I know it is difficult to agree on such details; but there is a great deal of controversy as to whether these burning fluids are or are not explosive. We know that they are sometimes said not to be so, and the first demonstration which we have that they are explosive, is made by an actual explosion, and as a consequence, a loss of life by them in many cases is the result. The term is well enough understood, I think. I think it will be better to leave out the word "explosive."

Mr. CHARLTON. I withdraw my suggestion.

Mr. DAVIS. I hope the Senator from New Hampshire will consent to adopt the word "explosive."

Mr. HALE. Very well; I agree to it.

The amendment was agreed to.

The amendment as amended was then concurred in, and the section, as amended, is as follows:

SEC. 7. And be it further enacted, That no curtains made of cotton, or of any material alike combustible, shall be suspended in any such vessel carrying passengers, except in state-rooms or apartments where no fire or burning light is allowed to be used; no loose hemp shall be carried on board any such vessel; nor shall baled hemp be carried on the deck or guards thereof, unless the bales are compactly pressed and well covered with bagging or a similar fabric; nor shall gunpowder, oil or spirits of turpentine, oil of vitriol, camphene, or other explosive burning fluid, or materials which ignite by friction, be carried on board any such vessel as freight, except in cases of special license for that purpose as hereinafter provided; and all such articles kept on board as stores, shall be secured in metallic vessels; and every person who shall knowingly violate any of the provisions of this section, shall pay a penalty of $100 for each offense, to be recovered by action of debt in any court of competent jurisdiction.

The next amendment was a new section.

Mr. HALE. I move to amend the amendment, by inserting, after the word "oil," the words, "or spirits;" and also after the word "turpentine," the words, "camphene, or other explosive burning fluids." This will make the section correspond with the last section, as just amended.

The amendment to the amendment was agreed to.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. There are two blanks in the amendment, which ought to be filled up before the question is taken upon it.

Mr. DAVIS. I do not know what were the views of the Senator from Missouri, [Mr. Geyer,] but I wish that some gentleman would suggest some suitable amount and time. I propose to fill the first blank with the words, "one hundred dollars."

Mr. HALE. That sum is not large enough. I think it ought at least to be one thousand. Suppose that a captain of a steamboat violates the provisions of this act, so that the whole of a boat's crew and passengers are burnt up, as in the case of the Griffith, opposite Cleveland last year, what a paltry consideration is a hundred dollars! I think it ought to be at least one thousand, and with the words, "not exceeding," the penalty can be modified at the discretion of a court. I move to fill up the first blank with the words, "one thousand dollars."

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. DAVIS. I move to fill the second blank by inserting the word, "eighteen."

The motion was agreed to.

The question then recurred on concurring in the adoption of the new section, as thus amended, and it was concurred in.

The section, as amended, is as follows:

SEC. 8. And be it further enacted, That hereafter all gunpowder, oil or spirits of turpentine, camphene, or other explosive burning fluid, and materials which ignite by friction, when packed or put up for shipment or sale, shall be securely packed or put up separately from each other and from all other articles, and the package, box, cask, or vessel containing the same, shall be distinctly marked on the outside with the name or description of the articles contained therein; and every person who shall pack or put up, or cause to be packed or put up for sale or shipment, any gunpowder, oil or spirits of turpentine, camphene, or other explosive burning fluid, or materials which ignite by friction, otherwise than as aforesaid, or shall deliver to any person any package, box, cask, or vessel containing either of the articles aforesaid, not marked as aforesaid, or shall ship or offer to ship the same on board of any steam-vessel carrying passengers, shall be deemed guilty of a misdemeanor, and punished by a fine not exceeding $1,000, or imprisonment not exceeding eighteen months, or both.

The ninth section was amended by inserting in the sixth line, after the word "collector," the words "or other chief officer;" by inserting after the word "customs," in the sixth line, the words "together with the supervising inspector for the district;" by striking out the word "alone," in the tenth line, and inserting "or other chief officer of the customs and the supervising inspector for the district;" by inserting the word "in" between "Burlington" and "Vermont," in the eighteenth line; by striking out "President," in the thirty-ninth line, and inserting instead "Secretary of the Treasury."

Mr. DAVIS further moved to amend the fiftieth line by striking out all the words in it after "for." When the bill was under consideration in Committee of the Whole, the words "not exceeding" had been stricken out, and the word "deck" had been interpolated before "passengers," and following the word "passengers" the words "and (blank) cabin passengers;" the amendment to the amendment proposed to strike out all but the word "passengers," and it was agreed to.

The first clause of the section, as amended, therefore reads as follows:

SEC. 9. And be it further enacted, That instead of the existing provisions of law for the inspection of steamers and their equipment, and instead of the present system of pilotage and the present mode of employing engineers, the following regulations shall be observed, to wit: The collector or other chief officer of the customs, together with the supervising inspector for the district, and the president of the Chamber of Commerce, if there be one, otherwise the president of the Board of Trade, if there be one, otherwise the collector or other chief officer of the customs and the supervising inspector for the district in each of the following collection districts—namely, New Orleans and St. Louis, on the Mississippi river; Louisville, Cincinnati, Wheeling, and Pittsburgh, on the Ohio river; Buffalo and Cleveland, on Lake Erie; Detroit, on Detroit river; Nashville, upon the Cumberland river; Chicago, on Lake Michigan; Oswego, on Lake Ontario; Burlington, in Vermont; and Mobile, in Alabama—shall designate two inspectors of good character and suitable qualifications to perform the services required of them by this act within their respective districts; one of whom, from his practical knowledge of ship-building, and the uses of steam in navigation, shall be fully competent to make a reliable estimate of the strength, sea-worthiness, and other qualities of the hulls of steamers and their equipment, deemed essential to safety of life and property, when such vessels are employed in navigation, to be called the Inspector of Hulls; the other of whom from his knowledge and experience of the duties of an engineer employed in navigating vessels by steam, and also in the construction and use of boilers, and the machinery and appurtenances therewith connected, shall be able to form a reliable opinion of the quality of the material, the strength, form, workmanship, and suitability of such boilers and machinery to be employed in navigation without hazard to life or property, from imperfections in the material, workmanship, or arrangement of any part of such apparatus for steaming, to be called the Inspector of Boilers; and these two persons thus designated, if approved by the Secretary of the Treasury, shall be, from the time of such designation, inspectors, empowered and required to perform the duties herein specified, to wit:

First. Upon application in writing by the master or owner, they shall, once in every six months at least, carefully inspect the hull of each steamer belonging to their respective districts and employed in navigation, and shall satisfy themselves that each vessel so submitted to their inspection is of a structure suitable for the service in which she is to be employed, has suitable accommodations for passengers, and is in a condition to warrant the belief that she may be used in navigation as a steamer, with safety to life and property, and that all the requirements of law in regard to fires, boats, pumps, hose, life-preservers, and other things, are faithfully complied with; and if they deem it expedient, they may direct the vessel to be put in motion, and may adopt any other suitable means to test her sufficiency and that of her equipment.

The first proposed amendment in the second clause of the ninth section was, to insert the words "not exceeding two hundred pounds to the square inch," after the word "which," in the third line, indicating the limit of pressure which may be prescribed by the owner or master of a vessel.

The amendment was concurred in.

The next amendment was to insert the words:

That the openings for the passage of water and steam, respectively, and all pipes and tubes exposed to heat are of proper dimensions and free from obstruction; that the spaces between the flues are sufficient, and that the fire line of the furnace is below the prescribed water line of the boilers.

The amendment was concurred in.

The next amendment was, to insert the words "sufficient in number," applying to safety-valves, and the words—

All but one of which may, if necessary, in the opinion of the inspectors, to secure safety, be taken wholly from the control of all persons engaged in navigating the vessel.

And the words—

Also a water-gauge and a steam-gauge, of approved construction, indicating the height of the water and the pressure of the steam; that upon the upper outside flue of each outside high-pressure boiler used upon rivers, there is placed, in a satisfactory manner, alloyed metals, fusible by the heat of the boiler when raised to the highest working-pressure allowed, and thereby letting steam escape.

Mr. DAVIS. To carry out the object of this clause, I wish to strike out the words just read, after the word "allowed," and insert the following:

And in or upon the top of the flues of all other boilers in a steamer, such alloyed metals be placed as aforesaid, fusing at ten pounds greater pressure, thereby in each case letting steam escape.

The amendment to the amendment was agreed to.

Mr. FELCH. I wish to understand from the chairman of the committee, what is intended by the expression in this clause, "used upon rivers?" I wish to know, whether the same thing is applicable to other waters?

Mr. DAVIS. It is not the design to make it applicable to other waters.

Mr. FELCH. Would it not be better to strike out the words "used upon rivers," so as to make it applicable to all waters? Both high and low-pressure boilers are used upon the lakes, and it is a fact, whatever may be the cause, that most of the accidents have happened upon boats having high-pressure boilers. Whatever measures may secure safety upon rivers, I think ought to be employed upon the lakes also. I suggest, therefore, to strike out the words "used upon rivers."

The amendment to the amendment was agreed to; and then the amendment as amended was concurred in.

The next amendment was to strike out the words at the end of the second clause, as follows: "If a deficiency happens it will be through the fault of the officers;" and insert the words, "so that in high-pressure boilers it shall not be less than four inches above the flue."

The amendment was concurred in.

Mr. DAVIS. I wish to offer the following as a proviso at the end of the clause:

Provided, however, If in any steamers hereafter built and supplied with new boilers and machinery, or in cases of machinery hereafter made, if the alloy fuses on the outer boilers at a pressure of ten pounds exceeding the working pressure allowed, and at twenty pounds above said pressure on the inner boilers, it shall be a sufficient compliance with this act.

The amendment to the amendment was agreed to.

The second clause, as amended, is as follows:

Second. They shall also, once in every six months, inspect the boilers of such steamers, subjecting them to a hydrostatic pressure, the limit to which not exceeding two hundred pounds to the square inch, may be prescribed by the owner or the master, and shall satisfy themselves, by examination and experimental trials, that the boilers are well made, in an approved form, of good and suitable materials; that the openings for the passage of water and steam, respectively, and all pipes and tubes exposed to heat are of proper dimensions and free from obstruction; that the spaces between the flues are sufficient, and that the fire-line of the surface is below the prescribed water-line of the boilers; and that such boilers, and the machinery, and the appurtenances, may be safely employed in the service proposed in the written application, without peril to life or property. And shall also satisfy themselves that the safety-valves are of suitable dimensions, sufficient in number, well arranged, and in good working order, all but one of which may, if necessary, in the opinion of the inspectors, to secure safety, be taken wholly from the control of all persons engaged in navigating the vessel; that there is a suitable number of gauge-cocks inserted in the most approved manner; also, a water-gauge and a steam-gauge of approved construction, indicating the height of the water and the pressure of the steam; that upon the upper or outside flue of each outside high-pressure boiler, there is placed, in a satisfactory manner, alloyed metals, fusible by the heat of the boiler when raised to the highest working pressure allowed, and in or upon the top of the flues of all other boilers in a steamer, such alloyed metals be placed as aforesaid, fusing at ten pounds greater pressure, thereby in each case letting steam escape; and that adequate and certain provision is made for an ample supply of water to feed the boilers at all times, whether the vessel is in motion or not, so that in high-pressure boilers it shall not be less than four inches above the flue: Provided, however, If in any steamers hereafter built and supplied with new boilers and machinery, or in cases of machinery hereafter made, if the alloy fuses on the outer boilers at a pressure of ten pounds exceeding the working pressure allowed, and at twenty pounds above said pressure on the inner boilers, it shall be a sufficient compliance with this act.

The next amendment was in the third clause of the ninth section, and was to strike out the words:

Third. That in subjecting to the hydrostatic test aforesaid, boilers called and usually known under the designation of high-pressure boilers, the inspectors shall assume one hundred pounds to the square inch as the maximum pressure allowable as a working power for a new boiler, made of the best materials and in the best manner, of plates at least one fourth of an inch thick, and shall rate the working power of all high-pressure boilers according to their strength, compared with this standard; and in subjecting to the test aforesaid that class of boilers usually designated and known as low-pressure boilers, the said inspectors shall assume fifty pounds to the square inch as the maximum working power of a new boiler, made of the best materials and in the best manner, and shall rate all low-pressure boilers according to their strength, compared with this standard: Provided, however, That no boiler of any description shall be rated over one third of the test applied as aforesaid; nor shall any—

And insert:

Third. That in subjecting to the hydrostatic test aforesaid, boilers called and usually known under the designation of high-pressure boilers, the inspectors shall assume one hundred and ten pounds to the square inch as the maximum pressure allowable as a working power for a new boiler forty-two inches in diameter, made of inspected iron plates at least one fourth of an inch thick, in the best manner, and of the quality herein required, and shall rate the working power of all high-pressure boilers, whether of greater or less diameter, old or new, according to their strength compared with this standard; and in subjecting to the test aforesaid that class of boilers usually designated and known as low-pressure boilers, the said inspectors shall assume fifty pounds pressure to the square inch as the maximum working power upon a new boiler of medium size, made of the material and in the manner aforesaid, and shall rate all low pressure boilers, whether greater or less, old or new, according to their strength compared with this standard: Provided, That no such boilers of either description hereafter made shall be rated over the said standard prescribed, and in all cases the working power allowed shall be to the test applied as one hundred and ten to two hundred: And provided further, The same rule shall be observed in regard to boilers previously made, unless the proportion between any such boilers and the cylinder or some other cause renders it manifest that its application would be unjust, in which cases the inspectors may depart from it, if it can be done with safety.

The amendment was concurred in.

Mr. DAVIS. I move to amend the residue of the clause by inserting the word "shall" after the word "circumstances."

The amendment was agreed to, and the concluding portion of the third clause of the ninth section, as thus amended, was as follows:

And no valve, under any circumstances, shall be loaded or so managed, in any way, as to subject the boiler to a greater pressure than the amount allowed by the inspectors; nor shall any boiler or pipe be approved which is made of bad material, or is unsafe from its form, or dangerous from defective workmanship, age, use, or any other cause.

The next amendment was to strike out from the fourth clause of the same section the following:

That she was built in the year —, that she is, in all respects, sea-worthy, having suitable accommodations for not exceeding — passengers, of all classes, and satisfactory means of escape from the main to the upper deck, in case of fire, or other accident endangering life; that her boilers were made in the year —, (if of iron) of good wrought iron, equal to the best quality of charcoal iron, not less than one fourth of an inch thick; that we have subjected them to a test pressure of — pounds to the square inch, as provided for by law: that we allow, as the maximum working power, in no case to be exceeded — pounds to the square inch, which neither exceeds one third of the test pressure aforesaid, nor the pressure allowed to a standard boiler; that we have adjusted and arranged the weights regulating the valves, as follows, to wit: —; that the number and arrangement of the gauge-cocks is satisfactory; that the provisions for supplying the boiler ers with water are ample and certain, if not neglected; that the machinery is in good working order—

And insert:

That she was built in the year —, is in all respects staunch, seaworthy, and in good condition for navigation, having suitable means of escape in case of accident from the main to the upper deck; that she is provided with—(here insert the number of state-rooms, the number of berths therein, the number of other permanent berths for cabin passengers, the number of berths for deck or other classes of passengers, the number of passengers of each class for whom she has suitable accommodations, and the number of each whom she is permitted to carry; also, the number, form, dimensions, and material of which each boiler is made, and when made—if made after this act takes effect, and of iron, whether they are such in all respects as the act requires, whether each boiler has been tried by hydrostatic test, the amount of pressure to the square inch in pounds applied to it, whether the amount allowed as the maximum working power was determined by the rule prescribed by this act, if not, the reason for a departure from it; also, the number of safety-valves required, their capacity, the load prescribed for each valve, how many are left in the control of the persons navigating the vessel, how many, if any, are withdrawn, and the manner of securing them against interference; also, the number and dimensions of supply-pipes, and whether they and the other means provided are sufficient at all times and under all circumstances, when in good order, to keep the water up four inches at least above the top of the flue; also, the number and dimensions of the steam-pipes, the number and kind of engines; the dimensions of their cylinders; the number and capacity of the forcing-pumps, and how worked; the number and kind of gauge-cocks, water and steam-gauges, where situate, and how secured; the equipments for the extinguishment of fires, including hose, fire-buckets, and axes, the provisions for saving life in case of accident, including boats, life-preservers, and substitutes therefor, where kept, and all other provisions made on board for the security of the lives of passengers.) And we further certify.

Mr. DAVIS. There are one or two other slight amendments that are rendered necessary, in consequence of some amendments which were adopted the other day. The first is, to insert in the one hundredth and ninetieth line, after the word "made," the words, "the thickness of the metal."

The amendment to the amendment was agreed to.

Mr. DAVIS. I further move to amend the amendment by inserting the word "under," at the end of the two hundred and fourth line. This is a mere clerical error.

The amendment to the amendment was agreed to.

The question then recurred on concurring in the amendment as thus amended, and it was concurred in.

The next amendment was, to insert after the word "pumps," in line two hundred and eighteen, the words, "and other means to keep the water up to the point aforesaid."

The amendment was concurred in, and the fourth clause of the ninth section, as amended, stood as follows:

Fourth. That when the inspection in detail is completed, and the inspectors approve of the vessel and her equipment throughout, they shall make and subscribe a certificate to the collector of the district, substantially as follows:

State of —, District of —:
Application having been made in writing by — to the subscribers, inspectors for said district, to examine the steamer —, of —, whereof — are owners, and — is master, we having performed that service, now, on this — day of —, A. D. —, do certify that she was built in the year —, is in all respects staunch, seaworthy, and in good condition for navigation, having suitable means of escape, in case of accident, from the main to the upper deck; that she is provided with—(here insert the number of state-rooms, the number of berths therein, the number of other permanent berths for cabin passengers, the number of berths for deck or other classes of passengers, the number of passengers of each class for whom she has suitable accommodations, and the number of each of whom she is permitted to carry; also, the number, form, dimensions, and material of which each boiler is made, the thickness of the metal, and when made—if made after this act takes effect, and of iron, whether they are such in all respects as the act requires, whether each boiler has been tried by hydrostatic test, the amount of pressure to the square inch in pounds applied to it, whether the amount allowed as the maximum working power was determined by the rule prescribed by this act, if not, the reason for a departure from it; also, the number of safety-valves required, their capacity, the load prescribed for each valve, how many are left in the control of the persons navigating the vessel, how many, if any, are withdrawn, and the manner of securing them against interference; also, the number and dimensions of supply-pipes, and whether they and the other means provided are sufficient at all times, and under all circumstances, when in good order, to keep the water up four inches at least above the top of the flue; also, the number and dimensions of the steam-pipes, the number and kind of engines; the dimensions of their cylinders; the number and capacity of the forcing pumps, and how worked; the number and kind of gauge-cocks, water and steam-gauges, where situate and how secured; the equipments for the extinguishment of fires, including hose, fire-buckets, and axes; the provisions for saving life in case of accident, including boats, life-preservers, and substitutes therefor, where kept, and all other provisions made on board for the security of the lives of passengers.) And we further certify, that the equipment of the vessel throughout, including pipes, pumps, and other means to keep the water up to the point aforesaid, hose, boats, life-preservers, and other things, is in conformity to the provisions of law; and that we declare it to be our deliberate conviction, founded upon the inspection which we have made, that the vessel may be employed as a steamer upon the waters named in the application, without peril to life or property from any imperfection of form, materials, workmanship, or arrangement of the several parts, or from age or use. And we further certify, that said vessel is to run within the following limits to wit: from _____ to _____ and back, touching at intermediate places, and which certificate shall be verified by the oaths of the inspectors signing it before a person competent by law to administer oaths. And in case the said inspectors do not grant a certificate of approval, they shall state in writing, and sign the same, their reasons for their disapproval.

The fifth clause of the section was amended, by striking out the following:

"The said inspectors shall keep a regular record of certificates, whether of approval or disapproval, and when recorded; the originals shall be delivered to the collector, and they shall keep a like record of all appointments made under this act, and all revocations of appointments, and shall communicate to the collector all such appointments and removals."

And inserting the following instead:

Upon the application of the master or owner of any steamer employed only in the navigation of rivers, for a license to carry gunpowder, oil or spirits of turpentine, oil of vitriol, camphine, or other explosive burning fluids, and materials which ignite by friction, or either of them, the inspectors shall examine such vessel, and if they find that she is provided with chests or safes, composed of metal, or entirely lined therewith, or one or more apartments thoroughly lined with metal, at a secure distance from any fire, they may grant a certificate to that effect, and authorizing such vessel to carry as freight any of the articles aforesaid, those of each description to be secured in such chest, safe, or apartment containing no other article, and carried at a distance from any fire to be specified in the certificate: Provided, That any such certificate may be revoked or annulled at any time by the inspectors, upon proof that either of the said articles have been carried on board said vessel, at a place or in a manner not authorized by such certificate, or that any of the provisions of this act in relation thereto have been violated. The said inspectors shall keep a regular record of certificates of inspections of vessels, their boilers, engines and machinery, whether of approval or disapproval, and when recorded, the original shall be delivered to the collector of the district; they shall keep a like record of certificates authorizing gunpowder, oil or spirits of turpentine, oil of vitriol, camphine, or other explosive burning fluids, and materials which ignite by friction, or either of them to be carried as freight, and when recorded deliver the originals to said collector; they shall keep a like record of all licenses to pilots and engineers, and all revocations thereof, and shall from time to time report in writing their decisions on all applications for such licenses, or proceedings for the revocation thereof.

The amendment to the sixth clause of the section, by inserting "except ferry-boats," after "steamer," was concurred in.

The clause, as amended, reads as follows:

Sixth. The inspectors shall appoint and classify all engineers and pilots, and determine how many are necessary for each steamer, except ferry-boats, and of what classes.

The following proviso, to be added at the end of the eighth clause, was concurred in:

Provided, however, If in cases of refusal to license engineers or pilots, and in cases of removal by the local board of inspectors, any engineer or pilot deeming himself wronged by such refusal, or such removal, may, on application within thirty days to a supervising inspector, have his case examined anew by such supervising inspector, upon producing a certified copy of the reasons assigned by the local board for their doings in the premises; and such supervising inspector may, if he sees good reasons therefor, overrule the decision of such local board of inspectors; and like proceedings upon the same conditions may be had by the master or owner of any vessel, for which the said local board refuses, upon inspection, to give a certificate of approval."

The amendment proposed by the Committee of the Whole to the ninth clause, being the substitution of a new one for the clause as it originally stood, having been read,

Mr. DAVIS said: I am opposed to that amendment, and before the ninth clause is stricken out by the Senate, I propose to amend it slightly, by striking out all after the word "until," and inserting "licenses can be obtained."

The motion was agreed to, and the clause rejected by the committee was rejected.

The clause, as amended, is as follows:

Ninth. It shall be unlawful for any person to employ, or any person to serve as engineer or pilot, who is not licensed by the inspectors; and any one so offending shall forfeit $100 for each offense: Provided, however, That if a vessel leaves her port with a complement of engineers and pilots, and on her voyage is deprived of their services, or the services of any of them, without the consent, fault, or collusion of the master, owner, or any one interested in the vessel, the deficiency may be temporarily supplied until licenses can be obtained.

Mr. BRIGHT. I wish to amend line 349, by striking out the words "arriving and departing," and inserting "on their arrival."

Mr. DAVIS. May I inquire the reason for offering that amendment?

Mr. BRIGHT. The reason is, that the section now requires that all steamers should be examined on "arriving and departing." My object is to have them at once examined on arrival, by the officer to whom this business is intrusted, for this reason: The masters of vessels might be greatly prejudiced by an examination after their boats are freighted and about to proceed on their trips. There are instances of port officers having required vessels to unload, preparatory to an examination, on the ground that they were not seaworthy; whereas, if they had made the examination on the arrival in port of the vessel, all this labor and expense would have been saved.

Mr. DAVIS. The only objection I have to the proposed amendment, is that it seems to me that it limits the authority to visit a vessel except upon her arrival. Now, there may be a necessity for visiting a vessel at other times than merely on her arrival. My object is not that the inspectors should be limited to the visiting of a vessel only on her arrival or departure, but that they should have power to make these visits at such times as they may think necessary. It does not call upon these officers to visit vessels when they arrive or depart, but to visit and examine steamers arriving and departing.

Mr. BRIGHT. But an officer may abuse his authority, and cause a captain of a vessel to unload even when he has got all his cargo aboard.

Mr. DAVIS. If an inspector should abuse his power, then he ought to be removed from office. I think the clause is better as it is. It leaves the matter to the convenience and discretion of the inspector to make his visit when he has time to do so. I do not want to limit the time, as proposed; and I think no gentleman here would more regret to make a provision that might be prejudicial to the interests of any party than I would.

Mr. BRIGHT. I have no doubt that if a party should violate his authority, it would be a good cause of removal; but that would be no satisfaction to a master or owner of a vessel after the injury was done. My attention has been called to the matter, and I wish to make the alteration because of an instance of a most arbitrary exercise of power on the part of an officer. It occurred to me, therefore, that it would be better that officers should exercise this power on the arrival of vessels, and if the Senator from Massachusetts will reflect a moment, I think he will concur with me in the opinion, that the limitation is not an unnecessary one.

Mr. DAVIS. Suppose the Senator should propose to insert, after the word "examine," the word "seasonably." I think that would obviate the difficulty.

Mr. BRIGHT. Very well; I have no objection to that.

Mr. CHASE. I am inclined to think that will scarcely reach the object aimed at by the Senator from Indiana. His object is to guard against the arbitrary action of the inspectors in examining boats, from time to time, as they may see fit, and to limit them to an examination at the time of the arrival of the vessel. If they are required to examine them seasonably, it will be taken to require an examination more than once. Whereas, as I understand the Senator from Massachusetts, [Mr. Davis,] he wishes that the inspectors may use their discretion as to the time of making the examination of the vessel. It strikes me, it would be as well to insert after the word "arriving," the words "as often as may be necessary." That would meet the wishes of the Senator from Indiana, without departing from the general object of the bill.

Mr. BRIGHT. I am satisfied with the suggestion of the Senator from Massachusetts. I think it will obviate the difficulty existing in my mind. The officers will then have power to examine a vessel at any time after its arrival. My object is simply to have the examination made before she is freighted for a second trip. I am therefore willing to accept the suggestion of the Senator from Massachusetts.

Mr. CHASE. I have no disposition to press any modification if, upon reflection, the Senator from Indiana thinks that modification will meet his object. But I ask him to reflect whether it will, if the word "seasonably" be inserted, and the words "arriving and departing" be retained. I suggest that the inspectors may conceive that it is necessary for them to examine the vessel when it arrives and when it departs, thus making two examinations. That is not the object which the bill seeks to accomplish; yet I apprehend that would be the construction placed upon it. However, as the Senators from Massachusetts and Indiana are satisfied, I acquiesce.

The amendment to the amendment, by inserting the word "seasonably," was agreed to.

The tenth clause of the ninth section, as amended, is as follows:

Tenth. In addition to the semi-annual inspection, it shall be the duty of the said board to examine seasonably steamers arriving and departing, so often as to enable them to detect any neglect to comply with the requirements of law, and also any defects or imperfections becoming apparent after the inspection aforesaid, and tending to render the navigation of the vessel unsafe, which service may be performed by one of the board; and if he shall discover an omission to comply with the law, or that repairs have become necessary to make the vessel safe, he shall at once notify the master, stating in the notice what is required; and if the master deems the requirement unreasonable or unnecessary, he may take the opinion of the board thereon, which shall be final; and if he shall refuse or neglect to comply with their requirement, and shall, contrary thereto, employ the vessel by navigating her, she shall be liable to the same penalties as if she had been run without a license; and all inspections and orders shall be promptly made by the inspectors; and where it can be safely done in their judgment, they shall permit repairs to be made when those interested can most conveniently do it; and no inspectors of one district shall modify or annul the doings of the inspectors of another district, in regard to repairs, unless there is a change in the state of things demanding more repairs than were thought necessary when the order was made; nor shall the inspectors of one district appoint a person coming from another, if such person has been rejected for unfitness or want of qualifications.

The amendment reported by the Committee of the Whole, to strike out of the 397th and 398th lines the word "collector," and insert,

Chief officer of the customs, and the said chief officer of the customs shall pay out of the revenues herein provided, such sums to any witness so summoned under the provisions of this act, for his actual travel and attendance, as shall be officially certified by an inspector hearing the case, upon the back of the summons, not exceeding the rates allowed to a witness for travel and attendance in a magistrate's court, in the State wherein the examination is had—was agreed to.

Mr. BRIGHT. I move to amend the amendment just adopted, by striking out the words, "magistrate's court," and inserting, "the circuit or district court of the United States." The amendment will merely have the effect of giving witnesses summoned before the board, the same wages as they would receive if summoned before the circuit and district courts. In some of the magistrates' courts, witnesses are only paid twenty-five cents per diem.

The motion was agreed to.

The clause, as amended, is as follows:

Twelfth. The said board of inspectors shall have power to summon before them witnesses, and to examine them under oath, touching the performance of their duties, by engineers and pilots; and if it shall appear satisfactorily that any engineer or pilot is incompetent, or that life or property has been placed in peril by reason of such incompetency, or by negligence or misconduct on the part of any such person, the board shall immediately suspend him and report their doings to the chief officer of the customs, and the said chief officer of the customs shall pay out of the revenues herein provided such sums to any witness so summoned under the provisions of this act, for his actual travel and attendance, as shall be officially certified by any inspector or hearing the case, upon the back of the summons, not exceeding the rates allowed to a witness for travel and attendance in the circuit or district court of the United States in the State wherein the examination is had.

The thirteenth clause, as amended, was concurred in, as follows:

Thirteenth. That the said board shall report promptly all their doings to the chief officer of the customs, as well as all omissions or refusals to comply with the provisions of law on the part of any owner or master of a vessel propelled in whole or in part by steam.

Mr. DAVIS. I am requested to make an amendment in the fourteenth division of the ninth section, relating to the duties of engineers and pilots. It is to insert "and all mates," after the word "pilots."

The amendment was agreed to, and the section as amended, was concurred in, as follows:

Fourteenth. That it shall at all times be the duty of all engineers, pilots, and mates appointed under this act, to assist the inspectors in the examination of the vessels to which any such engineer or pilot or mate belongs, and to point out all defects and imperfections in the hull or apparatus for steaming, and also to make known to them, at the earliest opportunity, all accidents occasioning serious injury to the vessel or her equipment, whereby life or property may be in danger, and in default thereof any such engineer or pilot or mate shall be dismissed from the service.

The following amendments were made as in Committee of the Whole, to the tenth section, which enumerates the districts for which inspectors are to be appointed—to strike out "New Haven, in Connecticut, Newport, in Rhode Island," and insert "New London, in Connecticut," and to insert "and the uses of steam in navigation."

The amendments were concurred in, and the section, as amended, read as follows:

SEC. 10. And be it further enacted, That in each of the districts of Savannah, in Georgia, Charleston, in South Carolina, Norfolk, in Virginia, Baltimore, in Maryland, Philadelphia, in Pennsylvania, New York, in New York, New London, in Connecticut, Boston, in Massachusetts, Portland, in Maine, and San Francisco, in California, there shall be two inspectors, one possessing the requisite qualifications, as herein provided, in ship-building and the uses of steam in navigating, the other in engineering, and in the construction and qualities of the apparatus for steaming, who shall exercise all the powers herein conferred, except that of appointing pilots for said districts.

The next amendment made as in Committee of the Whole, was to insert in the eleventh section the words, "the amount of passage money and," so as to make the section read:

SEC. 11. And be it further enacted, That it shall not be lawful to take on board of any steamer a greater number of passengers than is certified by the inspectors in the certificate; and the master and owners, or either of them, shall be liable, to any person suing for the same, to forfeit the amount of passage money and ten dollars for each passenger beyond the number allowed.

The next amendment, made as in Committee of the Whole, was to add the following to the same section:

And, moreover, in all cases of an express or implied undertaking to transport passengers, or to supply them with food and lodging, from place to place, and suitable provision is not made of a full and adequate supply of good and wholesome food and water, and of suitable lodgings for all such passengers, or where barges impeding the progress are taken in tow, without previous and reasonable notice to such passengers, in all such cases the owners and the vessel shall be liable to refund all the money paid for the passage, and to pay, also, all the damage sustained by such default or delay: Provided, however, That if in any such case a bond is given to the marshal for the benefit of the plaintiff, to secure the satisfaction of such judgment as he may recover, the vessel shall be released.

Mr. DAVIS. I move to amend the amendment, by inserting after the word "barges" the words, "or other craft."

The amendment to the amendment was agreed to.

Mr. DAVIS. I also move to insert after the word "tow" the words "for a distance of five hundred miles, or over."

The amendment to the amendment was agreed to; and the amendment as amended was concurred in.

The following amendments, made as in Committee of the Whole, were concurred in:

To make the twelfth section read as follows, the amendments being in italics:

That if the master of a steamer, or any other person, whether acting under orders or not, shall intentionally load or obstruct, or cause to be loaded or obstructed, in any way or manner, the safety-valve or valves of a boiler, or shall employ any other means or device whereby the boiler shall be subjected to a greater pressure than the amount allowed by the certificate of the inspectors, or shall be exposed to a greater pressure, or shall intentionally derange or hinder the operation of any machinery or device employed to denote the state of the water or steam in any boiler, or to give warning of approaching danger, it shall, in any such case, be a misdemeanor, and any and every person concerned therein, directly or indirectly, shall forfeit $200, and may, at the discretion of the court, be, in addition thereto, imprisoned not exceeding eighteen months.

The thirteenth section was made to read as follows, the amendments being in italics:

That if at any time there be a deficiency of water in a boiler, by suffering it to fall below three inches above the flue as prescribed in this act, unless the same happens through inevitable accident, the master, if it be by his order, assent, or connivance, and also the engineer, or other person, whose duty it is to keep up the supply, shall be guilty of an offense for which they shall severally be fined $100 each; and if an explosion or collapse happens in consequence of such deficiency, they, or any of them, may be further punished by imprisonment, for a period of not less than six nor more than eighteen months.

The sixteenth section of the bill was made to read as follows, the amendment being in italics:

SEC. 16. And be it further enacted, That it shall be the duty of such inspectors to ascertain the quality of the material of which boiler plates are made, and to satisfy themselves, by any suitable means, whether the mode of manufacturing has been such as to produce iron equal to the best and most reliable quality made with charcoal, such as in their judgment may be used for generating steam-power without hazard to life or property. No plate of iron shall be approved which is made of unsuitable material, or of which the manufacture is imperfect, or is not such as to give confidence in its strength, or which is less than one fourth of an inch in thickness, for a boiler of forty-two inches in diameter, and in that proportion for boilers of greater or less diameters, which is made of any but wrought iron, of a quality equal to the best quality made with charcoal.

The seventeenth section, which provides—

"That all plates approved shall be distinctly and permanently marked in such manner as the Secretary of the Treasury shall prescribe, and, if practicable, in such place or places that the marks shall be left visible after the plates are worked into boilers; and all plates rejected shall have a permanent mark put upon them, showing their condemnation, and the manufacturer shall also stamp his name upon each plate?"— was amended by adding the following:

Made by him, and for the inspection aforesaid there shall be paid to the inspector aforesaid, five cents for each plate inspected, to be accounted for and paid over to the collector or other chief officer of the customs as revenue belonging to the United States.

The eighteenth section, which provides that hereafter it shall be unlawful to use for generating steam for power a boiler made after the passage of this act of any iron, unless it has been inspected as herein provided," &c., was amended by striking out "hereafter," and inserting after "boiler," the words "or steam-pipe connecting the boilers."

The section, as amended, reads as follows:

SEC. 18. And be it further enacted, That it shall be unlawful to use for generating steam for power, a boiler or steam-pipe connecting the boilers made, after the passage of this act, of any iron unless it has been inspected as herein provided; and if any person shall make a boiler of iron not so inspected, intended to generate steam for power, he shall, for any such offense, forfeit $100, to be recovered in an action of debt by any person suing for the same; and any person using or causing to be used such a boiler to generate steam for power, shall forfeit a like sum for each offense.

The next amendment, made as in Committee of the Whole, was to add to the nineteenth section, which is in these words:

"SEC. 19. And be it further enacted, That if any person shall counterfeit the marks prescribed by the Secretary of the Treasury for inspected boiler iron, and be convicted thereof, he shall be fined not exceeding $500, and imprisoned not exceeding two years," the following:

And if any person or persons shall stamp or mark plates with the name or marks of another, with intent to mislead, deceive, or defraud, such person or persons shall be liable to any one injured thereby, for all damage occasioned by such fraud or deception.

The amendment was concurred in.

The next amendment of the committee was in the twentieth section, to strike out "four," and insert "nine;" to strike out "one of whom shall reside near the Mississippi river, one near the Ohio, one near the lakes, and one upon the Atlantic coast," and to strike out "every four months," and insert "each year."

The amendments were concurred in, and the section, as amended, reads as follows:

SEC. 20. And be it further enacted, That in order to carry this act fully into execution, the President of the United States shall, with the advice of the Senate, appoint nine supervising inspectors, who shall be selected for their knowledge, skill, and experience in the uses of steam for navigation, and who are competent judges not only of the character of vessels, but of all parts of the machinery employed in steaming, who shall assemble together at such places as they may agree upon, once in each year at least, for joint consultation and the establishment of rules and regulations for their own conduct, and that of the several boards of inspectors within the districts, and also to assign to each of the said nine inspectors the limits of the territory within which he shall perform his duties.

The next amendment made in Committee of the Whole, was to add to the twentieth section the following:

And the said supervising inspectors shall each be paid for his services after the rate of $1,500 a year, and in addition thereto, his actual reasonable traveling expenses, incurred in the necessary performance of his duty, when away from the principal port in his district, and certified and sworn to by him under such instructions as shall be given by the Secretary of the Treasury, who is hereby authorized to pay such salaries, and also such traveling expenses, when satisfied therewith, out of the revenues arising from this act; and also to pay to the inspectors of boiler iron, for the inspection in addition to their salary, after the rate of two dollars for each entire day's service in that employment; and moreover, each inspector shall keep a true account of the number of plates inspected by him, designating daily how many are approved, how many disapproved, by whom manufactured, and shall make a full return thereof, under oath, to the chief officer of the customs for the district, on the first days of January, April, July, and October in each year, to be by such chief officer forwarded to the Secretary of the Treasury.

Mr. BROOKE. I move to strike out "$1,500" and insert "$2,500" for the salary of the supervising inspectors. I will state that I understand it is the intention of the Senator from Massachusetts to move to fill the blank for the payment of the inspectors with the sum of $2,000. I think the salary of the supervising inspectors should be more than the salaries of the inspectors, as the latter are mere subordinate officers. The controlling minds, the master spirits concerned, are the supervising inspectors; and I think they ought to be paid more than the subordinates who act entirely under them. In addition to the $2,000, which will be received by the inspectors, they are also to be allowed $2 a day while performing duty in inspecting boiler iron. I should prefer to give the supervising inspectors $3,000; but to meet the views of all, I move that it be $2,500.

Mr. DAVIS. I hope that proposition will not be adopted. The bill has been drawn up on the supposition that we could obtain practical men, hard-handed men, to carry it into execution. There is no class of men so competent to do it as the mechanics who understand the business, or those who have been practically acquainted with steam navigation and the uses of machinery. My object, I am free to say, in all instances was to put the salaries so low that they shall never be a temptation to political men. I desire that the system shall be rescued, if it is possible, from the politics of the country, and put into the hands of men competent to carry it into execution, be their sentiments what they may. For the supervisory inspectors, according to my view of the subject, we are to look to the body of engineers—to the body of men who have been commanders of boats, or who, in some way or other, whether in shops, or out of shops, have had great experience on the subject. I hope all the inspectors, supervisory and local, will be of that class of men. It is rather difficult for me to make the discrimination. I shall make some discrimination between New Orleans, and New York, and the Western waters in the pay of the local inspectors; but it is to be observed that when the supervising inspectors get $1,500 per annum for a compensation, all their reasonable traveling expenses are to be paid, and a large portion of their duties will be to itinerate through the districts which shall be assigned to them. I apprehend that that is the wisest policy we can adopt.

I will assign another reason. My object is, that this shall be a self-supporting system. I do not desire to establish a new system to be a burden upon the Treasury of the country—a system without a revenue; but I design that it shall bring revenue enough to sustain itself; in the first place, from the inspection of the boats, and in the second place, from the payment which is made for the granting of the licences. I have estimated that revenue, and we may get, perhaps, something like $60,000 from those two sources. I am, at present, unprepared to say whether more local inspectors may not, upon experience, be found to be needed than we have provided for. I hope we have provided enough. I am unable, also, at present to say whether so large a board of supervising inspectors may be necessary. They may be, at the outset of the system, but eventually, I think, they can be diminished, and I think they will be. I think their duties will diminish as they go on. The great difficulties of the system will be at its outset. Under these circumstances, I have considered with some care what is a proper compensation. I cannot well distinguish between the supervising inspectors. They are left to assign to each other the duties they are to perform. They are to say to each other where they shall go; and it is in their power to interchange duties, if the public service would be best promoted by it, or to change their positions if it is thought desirable. Under these circumstances it is difficult for me, and I think it would be difficult for any other gentleman to distinguish between them. I believe it is admitted on all hands that $1,500 is a very ample equivalent for those upon the Western waters and lakes, and, I think, for those upon the coast. You will find the best men to take the position with the pay of $1,500, with their traveling expenses. As to New Orleans, I am not able to judge, but I would prefer that the system, as it is, should be tried in the first place; and if the compensation is found inadequate—if it will not command the services of the men we contemplate, we can change it.

Mr. BROOKE. The Senator from Massachusetts says his object is to get men with hard hands. I have no objection to that; but I want something more. I want men of hard sense—men of intellect.

Mr. DAVIS. So do I.

Mr. BROOKE. I assert, without fear of contradiction, that you cannot get an intellectual man, a man of science, at the West—I do not know how it may be at the East—to perform the duties required by the bill for $1,500. Look at the 44th section of the bill. It requires the supervisors to collect information, and report to the Department. That requires science and skill. It requires men of intellect to do it; and men of intellect able to discriminate among the vast amount of facts and statistics that may be sent to them. I hold it as the worst economy in the world to pay poorly and stingily for important public services. The best economy is a system of liberality in the payment of public officers. If this system upon which we are about to enter is to be tried fairly, let us start fairly. Let us get men at the outset capable of understanding its operation. If you offer only $1,500 per annum, you cannot get such men as you ought to have—men of experience, skill, and science in these matters to undertake to put the system in operation. The starting point is the most important point. Then is the time, and there is the point where you want men of science, skill, and enterprise; but you cannot get them—you cannot tempt them to leave their ordinary avocations to come forward and engage in this service in the Western country, unless you pay them for it. You may get, it is true, men for $1,500; or perhaps for $1,000, to act as supervising inspectors on the Mississippi and Ohio; but you cannot get men competent to discharge the duties.

Mr. HALE. I am rather inclined to go with the Senator from Massachusetts, because I think him a practical man, and he has given a reason for his course, which is a most lamentable one, but still is imperative; and that is, that if you raise the salary above $1,500, it will be scrambled for by incompetent political partisans; and $1,500 is about as high as we can go, with any assurance, for a man to understand his business. I am rather of opinion that if we go higher than that, we shall have somebody appointed who will stay at home and appoint agents to go out and discharge the duties—to make the calculations necessary, and himself pocket the salary.

I recollect an important fact, and one that I think may govern us in this matter, which occurred in my own experience a few years ago. A gentleman who had come from the West—he had gone from the East originally—had an idea that I had some influence at Washington, (which showed that he did not know much about it,) and wanted me to sign a recommendation that he should be appointed surveyor general out in some of the Territories. I said to him, "Do you know anything about surveying practically?" Said he, "Oh, no! it is not necessary. The work is generally done by deputies." Now, if we give a salary worth struggling for, we will get somebody who will go in and take the salary, while the work is done by deputies. And I think, if the Senator from Massachusetts thinks the salary which he proposes is high enough to secure men who will do the business, we had better agree to it.

Mr. DAVIS. I wish only to say, that so far as my experience goes, I can go into the shops where engineers are to be found, and I think I can find men enough, competent enough, in my own part of the country, who would be very glad to have a place of this description. The men of practical knowledge; and, as the honorable Senator from Mississippi well expressed it, of "hard sense," are exactly the men I want. They are hard hands and hard sense both. They are the most competent men to execute the duty practically that can be found in the country. I wish to try the experiment. I do not wish to be niggardly or close in this business. I am quite willing to be liberal. But, upon a consideration of the matter, I think $1,500 is about as far as our revenues will permit us to go at this time. We have various other expenditures to meet. We have to furnish instruments, and to pay the traveling expenses of the supervising engineers, which will amount to a considerable sum. I think my friend ought to take it into account that I do not require the inspector to live in New Orleans; I do not require him to live in New York. I only require him to do the duty assigned to him as supervising inspector. There ought to be a local inspector at New Orleans, &c.; and the man who superintends that part of the country will have Mobile, New Orleans, and a few places besides to attend to. He may live in Mobile, or in any other place, if he choose, if he only does the duty required as supervising inspector. And whenever his duty requires him to travel, his expenses for traveling are paid. I think we may be safe in trying the experiment at the sum proposed originally.

The amendment to the amendment was not agreed to.

Mr. BELL. I desire to ask a question of the Senator from Massachusetts, in regard to this subject. I am not intimately acquainted with the duties of supervising inspectors as they are prescribed in the bill. But, if I understand the reading of the bill correctly, the supervising inspector whose duty will be assigned to him at Mobile or New Orleans, for example, would have to reside pretty much at one or the other of those places. I suppose the one at New York would have to spend almost all his time there. But I am speaking more particularly with regard to New Orleans and Mobile; and, if I be correct in my supposition, and the supervising inspector must necessarily spend most of his time in those cities, if he discharges his duties with fidelity, I think $1,500 is inadequate to procure the proper person—whether an engineer or the master of a vessel. The increase of expenditure would have to be added in those cities.

Mr. DAVIS. That is to be paid besides.

Mr. BELL. I do not mean the traveling. I mean the living. If the supervisor discharges his duty properly, he will have to live at those places. The honorable Senator suggests that he may live where he pleases, provided he discharges his duties faithfully. But, I understand, that considering the great amount of the duties of the supervising inspector at the port of New Orleans especially—more so than with regard to Mobile—he will necessarily have to live there; and I would suggest that, with regard to that supervising inspector, the salary ought to be at least $2,000; and I should think it ought to be so in regard to the one at New York. He will necessarily be compelled to spend the principal part of the time at New York. The increased expenses of living will be greater than they would be in other places. I will not propose to disarrange the general system which has been so ably devised by the Senator from Massachusetts; but I throw out these suggestions to him. I think we can get an adequate supervising inspection for the New Orleans and Mobile districts, at the compensation I have named.

Mr. DAVIS. It seems that one great fact has escaped the attention of the Senator from Tennessee. Here are nine supervising inspectors to be appointed with general duties. The bill assigns the duty of inspecting at New Orleans to no one of them. Now, if you give to the one that happens to be stationed by their own arrangement at New Orleans, $2,000, you just open a cause of squabble and controversy between the different inspectors. It is a discrimination which cannot be made without inconvenience. I am quite aware, of course, that it may cost more to live there than at Louisville, or at Pittsburg, or on the banks of the Ohio river, where a portion of the supervising inspectors will perform their duty, or on the lakes; but, nevertheless, in the arrangement which is made, it seems to me that the discrimination cannot be made without injury to the service. I had rather, therefore, try the experiment with it as it is.

The amendment was concurred in.

The next amendments made, as in Committee of the Whole, were various and verbal ones to the twenty-first section, so as to make it read as follows:

SEC. 21. And be it further enacted, That the supervising inspectors shall watch over all parts of the territory assigned them, shall visit, confer with, and examine into the doings of the several boards of inspectors, and shall, whenever they think it expedient, visit vessels licensed, and examine into their condition, for the purpose of ascertaining whether the provisions of this act have been observed and complied with, both by the board of inspectors and the master and owners; and it shall be the duty of all masters, engineers, and pilots, to answer all reasonable inquiries, and to give all the information in their power, in regard to any vessel so visited, and her machinery for steaming, and the manner of managing both.

The amendments were concurred in.

The next amendment made as in Committee of the Whole was in the twenty-second section, to strike out "take measures accordingly, when the result is before him," and insert "if he deems the cause sufficient, shall remove the delinquent," so as to make the section read as follows:

SEC. 22. And be it further enacted, That whenever a supervising inspector ascertains to his satisfaction that the master, engineer, pilot, or owners, fail to perform their duties according to the provisions of this act, he shall report the facts in writing to the board in the district where the vessel belongs, and, if need be, cause the negligent or offending parties to be prosecuted; and if he has good reason to believe there has been, through negligence, or from any other cause, a failure of the board who inspected the vessel to do its duty, he shall report the facts in writing to the Secretary of the Treasury, who shall cause immediate investigation into the truth of the complaint, and if he deems the cause sufficient, shall remove the delinquent.

The amendment was concurred in.

The next amendment made as in Committee of the Whole, was to strike out of the twenty-third section the concluding words "of the engine and boilers, and also between the area of the paddles, and the power of the engines," so as to make the section read as follows:

SEC. 23. And be it further enacted, That it shall be the duty of such supervising inspectors to see that the said several boards within their respective collection districts execute their duties faithfully, promptly, and, as far as possible, uniformly, in all places, by following out the provisions of this act, according to the true intent and meaning thereof; and they shall, by their established rules, harmonize differences of opinion when they exist in different boards, and promote, as far as possible, the observance, in the construction of boats and of the machinery for steaming, of a just proportion between all the parts.

The amendment was concurred in.

The next amendments made as in Committee of the Whole, were in the twenty-fourth section, so as to make it read as follows, the amendments being in italics:

SEC. 24. And be it further enacted, That the said supervising inspectors shall also visit collection districts in which there are no boards of inspectors, if there be any where steamers are owned or employed, and each one shall have full power to inspect any steamer in any such district, or in any other district where, from distance or other cause, it is inconvenient to resort to the local board, and to grant certificates of approval according to the provisions of this act; and to do and perform in such districts destitute of local inspectors all the duties imposed upon boards in the districts where they exist, including the inspection of boiler iron: Provided, That no supervising or other inspector shall be deemed competent to inspect in any case where he is personally interested, but in all such cases the duty shall be performed by disinterested inspectors, and inspection made in violation of this rule shall be void and of no effect.

The amendments were concurred in.

The next amendment made as in Committee of the Whole, was to insert in the twenty-sixth section, after the word "collectors," the words "other chief officer of the customs," so as to make the section read as follows:

SEC. 26. And be it further enacted, That it shall be the duty of each of the collectors or other chief officer of the customs for the districts aforesaid, except San Francisco, to make known, without delay, to the collectors of all the said districts, except San Francisco, the names of all persons appointed engineers or pilots, and the names of all persons from whom, upon application, appointments have been withheld, and the names of all who have been removed or suspended, and also the names of all vessels which neglect or refuse to make such repairs as may be ordered under the provisions of this act, and the names of all for which license has been, on application, refused.

The amendment was concurred in.

The same amendment was made in the two subsequent sections, after the word collectors.

The next amendment, made as in Committee of the Whole, was to strike out of the 28th section the words:

"The original certificate of the inspectors, giving to the owner or master two certified copies thereof, one of which shall be placed in some conspicuous place in the vessel, where it will be most likely to be observed by passengers and others; and the other he shall retain as evidence of his lawful right to navigate the vessel, and no one shall be allowed to navigate a steamer without such certificates"

And insert in lieu thereof the following:

All original certificates of the inspectors required by this act to be delivered to him, and shall give to the master or owner of the vessel therein named, two certified copies thereof; one of which shall be placed by such master or owner in some conspicuous place in the vessel, where it will be most likely to be observed by passengers and others, and there kept at all times, during a voyage, and while such vessel is receiving freight or passengers; the other shall be retained by such master or owner as evidence of the authority thereby conferred; and if any person shall receive or carry any passenger on board any such steamer not having a certificate of approval as required by this act, and a certified copy thereof placed and kept as aforesaid; or who shall receive or carry any gunpowder, oil of turpentine, or materials which ignite by friction, as freight on board any steamer carrying passengers, not having a certificate authorizing the same, and a certified copy thereof placed and kept as aforesaid; or who shall stow or carry any of said articles, at a place or in a manner not authorized by such certificate, shall forfeit and pay for each offense one hundred dollars, to be recovered by action of debt in any court of competent jurisdiction.

Mr. GEYER. I move to amend the amendment by inserting after the word "turpentine," the words which were inserted in the corresponding sections of the act, referring to camphene, &c. The amendment to the amendment was agreed to.

Mr. DAVIS. I have some objection to make to the amendment. I do not think the Senator from Missouri understands the original provision in the bill. That provision is, that the collector "or other chief officer of the customs, shall retain on file the original certificate of the inspectors, giving to the owner, or master, two certified copies thereof; one of which shall be placed in some conspicuous place in the vessel, where it will be most likely to be observed by passengers and others, and the other he shall retain as evidence of his lawful right to navigate the vessel, and no one shall be allowed to navigate a steamer without such certificate." Now, there is penalty enough. We want no more. If the person undertakes to navigate a vessel without such certificate as that, his vessel is liable to seizure and forfeiture. That is all that can be desired. If it is unlawful to navigate without the paper, the vessel then becomes liable to seizure, and to be libeled and sold. That is a very heavy penalty. It needs nothing additional. The owner or master of the vessel is to keep the certificate set up where it can be seen at all times. Why does the Senator wish to limit the time to a period during the voyage, and while the vessel is receiving freight and passengers? Is it not better to say that it shall be kept up at all times where it can be seen? It seems to me that will be a better and safer rule than to limit them to keeping it up to the period of the voyage, and while the boat is in port receiving freight and passengers. They ought always to keep it there where anybody can see it—where any one visiting the vessel can see it. It seems to me that that rule is better than the one which the Senator has proposed. If he can modify his amendment so as to take in the latter part of it, and retain the whole section as originally proposed, I should prefer it.

Mr. GEYER. If I had supposed that there was any provision in the original section that required the certificate to be kept up at all times, I should then have adopted the suggestion of the honorable Senator, and added only that portion relating to the carrying of gunpowder; but this is a penal section, and will, in all probability, become strictly construed. As it stands, the collector is to retain on file the original certificate, and is to give to the owner or master two certified copies, one of which is to be placed in some conspicuous place of the vessel where it will be most likely to be observed by passengers and others; and the other is to be retained as evidence of his lawful right to navigate the vessel. Now, he may place it there, and it may be removed. The fact that it was placed there would exempt him from the penalty; but his lawful right to navigate depends upon the possession of the duplicate. The amendment which was adopted as in Committee of the Whole provides that he shall keep it up at all times when he is receiving freight and passengers, and during the voyage. Under the original section, if the certificate be not visible to the passengers he has full authority with the duplicate to navigate. With respect to the times when the certificate is to be kept up, I suppose that all that will be necessary will be at all times during the voyage, and when receiving freight or passengers. It will not be necessary to keep it up, nor indeed would it be practicable to keep it up, when the ship was undergoing repairs. The provision which I have added, is to make it express to keep up the certificate at all times, while on the voyage, and while receiving freights and passengers, so that he shall not satisfy the law by keeping it there a month or two and then suffering it to be removed, and proceeding to navigate the vessel upon the authority of the duplicate. It is true that if he navigates the vessel without the certificate he is liable to the forfeiture; but if he receives freight and passengers without having it put up, he is liable to no penalty at all under the original section. That enjoins the duty of putting up the certificate; but if he does not put it up, no consequence is attached, if he has the duplicate under which he may navigate the vessel. For that reason it occurred to me that it would be necessary to amend, so that all persons going on-board, either to ship freight or take passage, will see whether the requisition is complied with or not.

Mr. DAVIS. There is a portion of the amendment which I wish to retain. I want the Senator to retain the penalty, and if he superadds that to the section as it stood first, I should like the arrangement better than the one which he now proposes.

Mr. BRIGHT. I would suggest that we should pass over the amendment for the present, to allow it to be so modified.

It was passed over accordingly.

The next amendment made as in Committee of the Whole, was to add the following as a new section:

SEC. 29. And be it further enacted, That every inspector who shall certify falsely touching any such vessel, propelled in whole or in part by steam, and carrying passengers, her hull, accommodations, boilers, engines, machinery, or their appurtenances, or any of her equipments, or any matter or thing contained in any certificate signed and sworn to by him, shall, on conviction thereof, be punished by fine, not exceeding _____ dollars, or imprisonment not exceeding _____, or both.

Mr. DAVIS. I would suggest to the Senator from Missouri, whether it would not be proper to insert the word "willfully" between the words "shall" and "certify," so as to make the penalty apply to the inspector who "shall willfully certify falsely." They may make the false statement without any evil intention.

Mr. GEYER. I have no objection to that.

Mr. DAVIS. I then make the motion to insert "willfully."

The amendment to the amendment was agreed to.

Mr. GEYER. I move to amend the amendment, by filling the first blank with "five hundred," and the second with "six months."

The amendment to the amendment was agreed to, and the amendment as amended was concurred in.

The next amendment made as in Committee of the Whole, was to insert the following as a new section:

SEC. 30. And be it further enacted, That if any such vessel carrying passengers, having a license and certificate, as required by this act, shall be navigated without having her hull, accommodations, boilers, engines, machinery, and their appurtenances, and all equipments, in all things conformable to such certificate, the master or commander by whom she shall be so navigated shall be punished by fine not exceeding _____ dollars, or imprisonment not exceeding _____, or both: Provided, That such master or commander shall not be liable for loss or deficiency occasioned by the dangers of navigation, if such loss or deficiency shall be supplied as soon as practicable.

Mr. GEYER. I move to amend, by filling the first blank with "one hundred," and the second with "two months."

The amendment to the amendment was agreed to, and the amendment as amended was concurred in.

The next amendment made as in Committee of the Whole, was to strike out the following:

SEC. 27. And be it further enacted, That when, from darkness, fog, or other cause, the chief pilot or chief engineer shall be of opinion that the navigation is unsafe, the vessel shall, if in a river, be brought to anchor as soon as it can be prudently done, and no person in command shall be justified in pursuing a voyage in a river after being thus admonished by the engineer or pilot, but shall be answerable for any damage which may arise from the non-observance of this provision.

SEC. 28. And be it further enacted, That when steamers navigating rivers, or narrow, difficult or dangerous channels, and from darkness, fog, or other causes, there is just reason to fear collision or other accident from meeting and passing each other, they shall, as they approach each other, observe the following regulations:

The descending vessel shall drift, using only so much steam as shall be necessary to keep her steerage; and if no signal is given, each shall pass to the right, or on the larboard side of the other. But if in this mode of passing shall be deemed unsafe, the boat objecting to it shall give seasonable notice, by a distinct and strong stroke upon the bell, repeating the same, if necessary, at short but distinct intervals, which the other shall, as soon as heard, answer by a similar stroke, and they shall pass to the left instead of the right: but if a passage by each other is unsafe or impracticable, by reason of the narrowness of the channel, or from any other cause, the boat in such channel shall ring her bell rapidly, and the other, if not in the channel, shall give way to her and let her pass; but if both boats are entering or have entered such channel, the ascending boat shall give way to the descending boat, and no vessel shall be justified in coming into conflict with another, if it can be avoided—

And insert in lieu thereof the following:

SEC. 31. And be it further enacted, That when from darkness, fog, or other cause, the pilot on watch shall be of opinion that the navigation is unsafe, or if from accident to, or derangement of, the machinery of the boat, the engineer on watch shall be of opinion that the further navigation of the vessel is unsafe, the vessel shall be brought to anchor, or moored as soon as it is prudently can be done; and no person in command shall be justified in pursuing a voyage after being admonished, by either of the officers named, that it would be unsafe from the causes assigned, but shall be answerable for any damage which may arise from so pursuing the voyage.

SEC. 32. And be it further enacted, That when steamers are about to meet each other in the night, in narrow channels, or in fog, it shall be the duty of the pilot of the descending boat to keep the channel and stop his engine, and suffer the boat to float with only steam sufficient to give her steerage, until the following signals are given and answered, and a space properly cleared:

It shall be the duty of the pilot of the ascending boat, as soon as the other shall be in sight and hearing, to sound his bell once, if he shall wish to pass to his right; and it shall be the duty of the pilot of the descending boat to answer the same by one stroke of the bell; if not answered, the pilot of the ascending boat shall strike his bell again and again, at short intervals, until heard by the pilot of the other boat. But if the pilot of the ascending boat should wish to pass to the left-hand side, he shall strike his bell twice; and it shall be the duty of the pilot of the descending boat to answer the same by two strokes of his bell, and both boats shall be steered accordingly. The first call may be made by the pilot of either boat, and it shall be the duty of the other to answer as aforesaid; but if the first call cannot be complied with safely, a negative answer shall be given, by ringing the bell five or six times in quick succession, after which the call shall be reversed.

When boats shall be near meeting in a channel, or place too narrow to pass each other with safety, the one that may first be in the channel shall have a right to it, except in the rapids of the Upper Mississippi, and the other shall give way. If, however, two boats are about to enter such channel or place at the same time, and in all cases in the rapids aforesaid, the ascending boat shall give way.

Should the pilot of either boat fail to make or to answer the signals required, or should a signal be answered wrongfully, both boats shall be immediately stopped, and, if requisite, backed so as to prevent collision.

It shall not be lawful for an ascending boat to cross a channel (unless in compliance with the foregoing signals clearly made and answered) within possible striking distance by a descending boat. These rules shall be observed both night and day. Should any pilot, engineer, or master neglect or willfully refuse to observe the foregoing regulations, any delinquent so neglecting or refusing, shall be liable to a penalty of $30, and to all damage done to any person or persons by such neglect or refusal; and no vessel shall be justified in coming into collision with another if it can be avoided.

Mr. BAYARD. I will propose a slight amendment to the amendment, because the phraseology might give rise to difficulty in tide-waters; it is, to add to the thirty-second section the words,

Provided, That on tide-waters, a boat moving with the tide shall be considered as descending, and a boat moving against the tide as ascending.

Mr. DAVIS. That amendment, as I understand, simply proposes that a boat in tide-water, running with the tide, shall be considered the descending boat, and the one against the tide as the ascending boat. There may be this inconvenience in navigating rivers that have tides in them. In the Mississippi river, for example, there is a tide, notwithstanding the current is downward. The adoption of the amendment to the amendment may lead to confusion. It would change the order of things. Perhaps, in our tide-waters, where there are narrow passages, it would answer. I do not see any objection to it there. But it strikes me that when we get into the rivers which have a tide, it will cause some confusion; as in vessels, for example, descending the Mississippi with the current, while the tide is setting the other way.

Mr. BAYARD. Is there a tide in the Mississippi?

Mr. DAVIS. It is recognized in law as a tide. Gentlemen say that the current overcomes the tide. I am aware of that; and that is just the confusion to which it will lead. The tide setting against the current raises the water. That is called the tide in law; and on that very foundation, the courts have decided that admiralty jurisdiction shall go as far as the tide raises the water of the Mississippi.

Mr. BAYARD. I think the current is sufficiently powerful to overcome the tide on that river; therefore, a boat will not move with the tide, for I apprehend the stream never runs up.

Mr. DAVIS. But that is the reason why it is called the tide.

Mr. BAYARD. But the boat does not move with the tide. When we speak of a boat ascending a river, in the ordinary meaning of the terms, we mean that it is going from the mouth to its source. That is not the meaning in the tide-waters. In the Mississippi, I take it for granted that, though the tide may check the current, a boat never moves with the tide.

Mr. DAVIS. If the honorable Senator will change his amendment, and say that the boat going with the current shall be considered the descending boat, it will answer.

Mr. RUSK. It does not strike me that there is much necessity for the amendment to the amendment. These regulations are intended for the rivers where there is a current, which renders it difficult for the boats to change their course. It is necessary to prescribe these rules where the river is narrow; but when we come to the tide-water, I apprehend there will be ample room. The adoption of the amendment to the amendment will produce confusion, because there is a tide in the Mississippi for a number of miles. What would be the result? You would have to change the rules every time the tide ran up and back again; and there would be a considerable danger of collision.

Mr. BAYARD. If the bill was confined to the Mississippi alone, I would not have a word to say; but it must have its construction, and apply to all waters in the United States. When we speak of an ascending boat, in ordinary parlance, it would mean a boat moving up toward the source of the river. That does not apply in all cases; and as the bill applies to all waters, it would seem that some provision of the kind I have suggested should be adopted.

Mr. DAVIS. I am rather inclined to think that we had better not adopt the amendment to the amendment at all. But, if we do adopt it, I hope it will be in a modified form; so that the boat running with the current shall be considered the descending boat.

The amendment to the amendment was not agreed to.

The amendment was concurred in.

The next amendment made as in Committee of the Whole, was in the thirty-third section, by striking out—

"Or through carelessness and inattention, or through rash and unlawful conduct, on the part of any officer, engineer, or pilot"—

And inserting—

And any person sustaining loss or injury through the carelessness, negligence, or willful misconduct of an engineer or pilot, or their neglect or refusal to obey the provisions of law herein prescribed as to navigating steamers, may sue for and recover damages for any such injury caused, as aforesaid, by any such engineer or pilot.

The amendment was concurred in, and the section now reads as follows:

Sec. 33. And be it further enacted, That whenever damage is sustained by any person, in his property or person, from explosion, fire, collision, or other cause, the master and the owners, or either of them, and the vessel, shall be liable to each and every person so injured, to the full amount of damages, if it happens through any neglect to comply with the provisions of the law, or through known defects or imperfections of the steaming apparatus, or of the hull; and any person sustaining loss or injury through the carelessness, negligence, or willful misconduct of an engineer or pilot, or their neglect or refusal to obey the provisions of the law herein prescribed as to navigating steamers, may sue for and recover damages for any such injury caused, as aforesaid, by any such engineer or pilot.

The next amendment made as in Committee of the Whole, was by striking out the original thirtieth section, now thirty-fourth, as follows:

Sec. 30. And be it further enacted, That before issuing the annual license to a steamer, the collector of the customs for the district shall demand and receive, as a compensation for the inspections and examinations made for the year, the following sums, according to the tonnage, to wit: For each vessel of a thousand tons and over, thirty-five dollars; for each of six hundred tons and over, but less than one thousand tons, thirty dollars; and for each under six hundred tons, twenty-five dollars; for which sums the said collectors shall be accountable to the United States at the end of each quarter.

And inserting in lieu thereof the following section:

Sec. 34. And be it further enacted, That before issuing the annual license to a steamer employed in the coasting trade, the collector or other chief officer of the customs for the port or district shall demand and receive from the owner or owners of the steamer, as a compensation for the inspections and examinations made for the year, the following sums, in addition to the fees for issuing enrollments and licenses, now allowed by law, according to the tonnage of the vessel, to wit: For each vessel of a thousand tons and over, thirty-five dollars; for each of five hundred tons and over, but less than one thousand tons, thirty dollars; and for each under five hundred tons and over one hundred and twenty-five tons, twenty-five dollars; and for each under one hundred and twenty-five tons, twenty dollars, at the time of obtaining registry, and once in each year thereafter, pay according to the rate of tonnage before mentioned, the sum of money herein fixed: And each engineer and pilot licensed as herein provided, shall pay for each certificate granted by any inspector or inspectors, to such inspector or inspectors to be accounted for and paid over to the collector or or other chief officer of the customs, five dollars, and the sums derived from all the sources above specified shall be quarterly accounted for and paid over to the United States in the same manner as other revenue.

The amendment was concurred in.

The next amendment made as in Committee of the Whole, was by striking out of the thirty-sixth section the words, "the district of Newport, in Rhode Island," and inserting the words, "the district of New London, in Connecticut."

The amendment was concurred in.

Mr. DAVIS. I do not know that the district in which New Orleans is situated, is called the district of New Orleans. I propose, therefore, to amend the thirty-sixth section of the bill by inserting after "New Orleans," the words "or of which New Orleans is the port of entry." A similar amendment is needed in regard to the district of Oswego, and I therefore move to insert after "Oswego," "or of which Oswego is the port of entry."

The amendments were agreed to.

Mr. DAVIS. I now move to fill the blanks in the thirty-sixth section, to make it read as follows:

Sec. 36. And be it further enacted, That the inspectors in the following districts shall be allowed annually the following compensation, to be paid under the direction of the Secretary of the Treasury, in the manner officers of the revenue are paid, to wit:

For the district of Portland, in Maine, $300.
For the district of Boston and Charlestown, in Massachusetts, $300.
For the district of New London, in Connecticut, $300.
For the district of New York, $2,000.
For the district of Philadelphia, in Pennsylvania, $1,000.
For the district of Baltimore, in Maryland, $1,000.
For the district of Norfolk, in Virginia, $300.
For the district of Charleston, in South Carolina, $400.
For the district of Savannah, in Georgia, $400.
For the district of Mobile, in Alabama, $1,000.
For the district of New Orleans, or of which New Orleans is the port of entry, in Louisiana, $2,000.
For the district of Galveston, in Texas, $300.
For the district of St. Louis, in Missouri, $1,500.
For the district of Louisville, in Kentucky, $1,200.
For the district of Nashville, in Tennessee, $400.
For the district of Cincinnati, Ohio, $1,500.
For the district of Wheeling, Virginia, $500.
For the district of Pittsburgh, Pennsylvania, $1,500.
For the district of Chicago, Illinois, $500.
For the district of Detroit, Michigan, $300.
For the district of Cleveland, Ohio, $500.
For the district of Buffalo, New York, $1,200.
For the district of Oswego, or of which Oswego is the port of entry, New York, $300.
For the district of Vermont, $200.
For the district of San Francisco, California, $1,500.

Mr. BORLAND. Before this matter is disposed of, I want to make an inquiry of the Senator from Massachusetts, in reference to the State of Arkansas. He will recollect that a bill passed the Senate some time ago—I do not believe it has yet passed the House, but I have no doubt that it will—putting the rivers of Arkansas, or the steamboat interest of the rivers of Arkansas, upon the same footing with those of the other States, the general law not providing for the appointment of the inspectors by the district judges in the States which are not called collection districts. That bill passed for the benefit of Arkansas, giving to the district judge of the United States there the same power of appointment that the judges have in the other States. There is no port of entry in Arkansas. But it will be necessary, it seems to me, to make some provision for securing an inspection at Little Rock, although it is not a port of entry, because there is a very important steamboat interest there, which is becoming more and more important every year.

Mr. DAVIS. I believe I stated, upon a former occasion, that it is quite impossible, nor do we deem it necessary, that there should be inspectors in every collection district. There is but one in Maine, and but one in Massachusetts. There is none in Rhode Island. There is but one in Connecticut; but one set of inspectors upon the Atlantic coast of New York; none in New Jersey; but one set in Philadelphia; but one set in Baltimore; but one set in Norfolk; but one in Charleston; and but one in Savannah. The rivers are much more abundantly supplied than the seacoast; but we have made this arrangement: we have supposed that nearly all the steamers at one terminus or the other of their voyage, will come to a place where there are inspectors; hence it is, that in many districts we have made none. But we suppose there may be some exceptions to this rule; and one of the chief ends in appointing the nine supervisors is, that they should visit the other districts, and portions of the country destitute of inspectors. And we have empowered them, in all such cases, to examine and grant certificates. We want to try the experiment. In many places we would not be able to find men qualified to do these duties. We want men that have the requisite qualifications to make the inspections. We want men suitable for it; men that will undertake to carry it out in good faith. We suppose that at the points where we have made the selections such men can be found. I do not mean to say that they cannot be found in Arkansas, and in some places where we have not appointed them. I know they could be found. But we have appointed as many as the revenue will permit, and we have left a little experience to decide whether local inspectors are wanted at other points. If they are, we suppose Congress will furnish them; and we think the supervising inspectors will visit the Red river, the Arkansas river, the Missouri river, the Mississippi river, the Illinois river, &c. That is one part of the duty imposed upon them, and one of the chief ends of appointing them. We expect to have very good men appointed for the stations, and we are in hopes that the system will work kindly, to suit the convenience of every one.

Mr. BORLAND. The case of Arkansas is not entirely provided for in the way suggested by the Senator. There are a good many boats belonging to Arkansas, and trading within the rivers of the State, that do not go, except, perhaps, through some accidental circumstance, beyond the State. They trade between the mouths of the Arkansas and the White river, and up those rivers; for the Senator must recollect that on the White river we have a navigation, a large portion of the year, of five hundred miles, and for a large portion of the year a navigation upon the Arkansas of over seven hundred miles, and for most of the year six hundred miles. The boats which trade on those rivers do not go beyond them. We have mail lines now from the mouth of the Arkansas river, up the White river, and up the Arkansas. The boats do, occasionally, go to Memphis; but there is no provision for inspectors there. But even suppose there were inspectors at Memphis, still our boats from the mouth of the Arkansas would have to go over two hundred miles to get the inspection. My only object is to secure for our steamboat interest within our own State—not for boats that trade between there and New Orleans, or other places—facilities for inspection. Many of the boats trade exclusively upon our own rivers; and I assure the Senator, as I undertook to show him and the Senate, when the other bill of which I speak was before us, there is no place in the world where rigid inspection is needed so much as in my State; for no imposition has ever been so gross and injurious.

Mr. DAVIS. The Senator may feel some assurance that one of the supervising inspectors will go into Arkansas.

Mr. BORLAND. I would inquire if a supervising inspector will be there sufficiently often to make the inspections?

Mr. DAVIS. It lies in the discretion of the men to arrange their duties. Our expectation is, that they will arrange the performance of their duties so as to suit the exigencies, and meet the wants of the public.

Mr. BORLAND. I will say, then, that as I apprehend we will not finish the bill to-day—I find a good many objections to completing it to-day—I shall propose an amendment before the final action on the bill, making the provision which I have suggested.

The amendments were agreed to.

Mr. HALE. I propose to amend the thirty-ninth section of the bill. It reads now—

"That every master or commander of a vessel shall provide himself with a copy of this act, and keep the same on board his vessel; and if he neglects or refuses so to do, he shall forfeit $20."

I propose to insert, in place of that, the following:

"That every master or commander of a steamer shall provide himself with at least ten copies of this act, and keep them on board his vessel, and if he neglects or refuses so to do, or shall refuse to exhibit a copy of the same to any passenger who shall ask it, he shall forfeit $20."

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. HALE. I want to call the attention of the friends of the bill to another provision. There are several penalties proposed in a great many sections, and in several there is a mode of enforcing them, while in others there is none. I wish to amend the bill by adding a section which will give a general jurisdiction in enforcing all penalties. It is as follows:

SEC. —. And be it further enacted, That all penalties imposed by this act may be recovered in an action of debt by any person who will sue therefor, in any court of the United States.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendments made as in Committee of the Whole, were to insert the following as additional sections:

SEC. 41. And be it further enacted, That all engineers and pilots shall, before entering upon their duties, make solemn oath before one of the inspectors herein provided for, to be recorded with the certificate, that he will faithfully and honestly, according to his best skill and judgment, perform all the duties required of him by this act, without concealment or reservation; and if any such engineer, pilot, or any witness summoned under this act as a witness, shall, when under examination, knowingly and intentionally falsify the truth, such person shall be deemed guilty of perjury, and if convicted, be punished accordingly.

SEC. 42. And be it further enacted, That all parts of laws heretofore made, which are superseded by or are inconsistent with this act, are hereby repealed.

The amendments were agreed to.

Mr. GEYER. There are two sections, the forty-fourth and forty-fifth, adopted by the Senate as in Committee of the Whole, which are inserted in the wrong place. At the suggestion of the Senator from Massachusetts, I propose to transpose them. They ought to precede the forty-second section.

The two sections were read, as follows:

SEC. 44. And be it further enacted, That the supervising inspectors appointed under the provisions of this act, shall, within their respective districts, under the direction of the Secretary of the Treasury, take the examination, or receive the statements in writing, of persons of practical knowledge and experience in the navigation of steam-vessels, the construction and use of boilers, engines, machinery, and equipments, touching the form, material, and construction of engines and their appurtenances; the causes of the explosion of boilers and collapse of flues, and the means of prevention; the kind and description of safety-valves, water and steam-gauges or indicators; equipments for extinguishment of fires, and for the preservation of life in case of accident, on board of such vessels, and all other means in use or proper to be adopted, for the better security of the lives of persons on board vessels propelled in whole or in part by steam; the advantages and disadvantages of the different descriptions of boilers, engines, and their appurtenances, safety-valves, water and steam-gauges or indicators, equipments for the prevention or extinguishment of fires, and the preservation of life in case of accident, in use on board such vessels; whether any, and what further legislation is necessary or proper for the better security of the lives of persons on board such steam-vessels; which examination and statements so taken and received shall be transmitted to the Secretary of the Treasury, at such time as he shall prescribe.

SEC. 45. And be it further enacted, That it shall be the duty of the Secretary of the Treasury to cause such interrogatories to be prepared and published as in his opinion may be proper to elicit the information contemplated by the preceding section, and upon the receipt of the examination and statements taken by the inspectors, shall report the same to Congress, together with the recommendation of such further provisions as he may deem proper to be made for the better security of the lives of persons on board steam-vessels.

Mr. HALE. I move that the Senate do now adjourn.

The question was taken, and the result was—yeas 12, nays 15; no quorum voting.

Mr. CHASE. It is evident that there is no quorum in the Chamber, and consequently we can do no business. I therefore renew the motion to adjourn.

The motion was agreed to; and

The Senate adjourned till Monday.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

FRIDAY, July 9, 1852.

The House met at eleven o'clock, a. m. Prayer by the Rev. LITTLETON F. MORGAN.

The Journal of yesterday was read and approved.

POSTAGE RATES.

The SPEAKER. The business first in order is the bill "to reduce and modify the rates of postage in the United States, and for other purposes," reported from the Committee on the Post Office and Post Roads, and postponed until to-day, that bill taking precedence of the bill in reference to the Wheeling bridge case.

Mr. OLDS. I ask the House to vote upon the amendments proposed by the committee.

The Clerk then read the first amendment, which is to strike out of line eleven the words "and a half."

Mr. OLDS. That amendment simply proposes to make the standard weight of newspapers and pamphlets two ounces instead of two ounces and a half.

Mr. BROOKS. I think, if the House will give their attention to the subject, they will see that that is an amendment which ought not to be made. The committee originally reported, as will be seen by reference to the eleventh line of the bill, two and a half ounces to be the ultimatum of the weight of newspapers, and, I believe, of pamphlets; and the proposition now coming from the committee is to strike out the half ounce, so as to make it read, that the greatest weight of newspapers, pamphlets, or periodicals shall be two ounces.

I have not been able to ascertain the object of that amendment, because I have heard no argument in its favor; but the reasons why it should not be adopted are plain, and I think I can satisfy the House that they are good reasons, if they will give me their attention for a moment.

It is the easiest thing in the world to make a large newspaper, or a pamphlet of considerable size; and of a great number of pages, of a very light weight; but it is done by decreasing the quality of the paper—the quality of the materials of which it is made, and the thickness of the newspaper. A newspaper, for example, of this size, [holding up the Albany State Register,] may be twice as large and yet not weigh more than this does, if it is made of a thinner and lighter material than this is. If this amendment should be adopted, the newspapers and periodicals of the country, to come within the purview of the post office law, would have to be printed on paper of a lighter material, so that what the post office would gain the country would lose, both in the quality of the paper and in the eye-sight of the community. There is nothing more mischievous to the people of this country than the bad paper upon which their newspapers and pamphlets are printed. That is the great cause of the use of spectacles in this country. The only reason why I have occasion to use them—for I once had as good eye-sight as anybody—is from reading newspapers printed on this thin paper—this paper of bad quality. The amendment of the Senate will increase the necessary demand for the use of spectacles, by making the material worse and the newspapers lighter and thinner, and so injuring the whole community, it may be for the benefit of the Post Office Department, or it may not be.

Now, I contend that it would be no substantial benefit to the mail carriers to make these newspapers lighter, for the great quantity of mails now carried through this country, where the mail-bags are large and numerous, are carried upon railroads and steamboats, and it hardly matters to the country, therefore, how large or how heavy they are. But even if it did matter to the country, it should not be taken for a moment into consideration when compared with the value of the eyes of the community, and with the value of having good materials upon which pamphlets and newspapers shall be printed.

These arguments which I have attempted thus briefly to illustrate, might be dwelt upon much more at length; but in addition to this, the adoption of the proposed amendment would be a crying injustice to some of the larger newspapers of the country. I will remark here, that it does not come in conflict with any newspaper in which I am interested. The amendment, as it stands, meets my case; but it would be a crying injustice to yet larger newspapers—newspapers with which my own is, in some degree, in rivalry, but whose interests I nevertheless feel it my duty to represent. It will be a crying injustice to those newspapers to compel them to curtail their size, or a crying injustice to the community if they did not curtail their size, but were compelled to employ thinner and lighter paper, for thereby a serious damage would be inflicted upon the community.

Now, it is no injury whatever to the country to have large sheets for newspapers. The greater the industry and enterprise of newspaper proprietors, and the printers of pamphlets and periodicals—the greater their disposition to increase the size of their sheets, and furnish for a given amount of money a certain quantity of reading matter, the better it is for the public. It is a thing to be desired. Large newspapers should be rather courted than avoided. The last thing that Congress should do, should be to say to the proprietors of newspapers, Under no circumstances, under no pressure of news and intelligence, shall you print an extra sheet. The effect of this amendment would be to compel the proprietor of a newspaper that was nearly the weight of two ounces, under no circumstances whatever to print an extra sheet—either with the speech of a member of Congress, with foreign news, or with the domestic and political news that may be abundant in the country; because the moment he attached an extra sheet to his newspaper, it would come within the purview of this amendment, and an additional tax would be laid on the subscriber to the newspaper.

I think, sir, I have now sufficiently explained the reasons why I oppose this amendment, and, in conclusion, I express the hope that it may not be adopted, but the bill will be allowed to stand as it was originally reported, with respect to this provision.

Mr. CABELL, of Florida. The business properly in order this morning, was the bill "granting the right of way and a portion of 'the public land to the States of Florida and Alabama for the construction of certain railroads in said States,'" that bill having been postponed until to-day. I am satisfied, however, that the House is much more interested in the passage of this postage bill, than in a bill which is entirely of local interest, and I am, therefore, willing that the railroad bill shall be again postponed.

The SPEAKER. The Chair and the Clerk inadvertently overlooked the bill to which the gentleman from Florida refers, which would have taken precedence of the bill now under consideration.

Mr. CABELL. I move to postpone the consideration of the bill to which I refer until Thursday next.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. OLDS. I have but a word or two to say in reply to the gentleman from New York, [Mr. Brooks.] This is a question of some importance, and I trust the House will listen to the few remarks I have to make in relation to it. The committee originally reported in favor of two and a half ounces as the standard weight of newspapers, and for an additional rate of postage for every additional ounce, or fraction of an ounce. Upon consultation, however, with the Senate committee, and with the Post Office Department, I was directed to report an amendment to strike out the half ounce, so as to fix the standard weight at two ounces, and then the same rate of postage for every additional ounce, or fraction of an ounce. The argument used before the committee was this: That if you fix the standard weight at two and a half ounces, and then an increased rate for every additional ounce or fraction of an ounce, you make the weights for the post offices all over the country, in determining the postage upon newspapers and other printed matter, fractions of an ounce—two and a half ounces, three and a half ounces, four and a half ounces, and so on. It was, therefore, thought advisable by the Department, and by the joint committee of the two Houses, that I should be directed to report an amendment to strike out the half ounce, and leave the standard weight at two ounces.

Another argument in favor of this amendment was this: we found, by examination at the Post Office Department, that there were but few papers in the country—not more, perhaps, than three or four—the weight of which would be over two ounces. Here, for example, is the New York Courier and Enquirer, which is perhaps the largest paper in the country. This paper weighs, when dry, two ounces and three eighths of an ounce. The New York Journal of Commerce is another paper that weighs over two ounces, and there are perhaps a few other papers in the country that would weigh over two ounces—the standard weight we have fixed for newspapers. The New York Herald, double sheet, the Tribune, double sheet, the Express, double sheet, all of them weigh under two ounces—the standard weight—and it was deemed unwise by the committee and by the Post Office Department, to fix the standard weight at a fraction of an ounce, for the purpose of accommodating four or five papers. For myself, I do not care which the House shall determine on, whether two and a half ounces, as originally proposed by the committee, or two ounces as now proposed by the amendment.

Mr. JENKINS. I desire to ask the gentleman a single question. Would not the effect of the amendment be to compel the publishers of these large papers to use a thinner and inferior paper instead of the better paper which they now use?

Mr. OLDS. We supposed that the effect of it would be to induce the publishers of the Courier and Enquirer, and other large papers which are three fourths filled with advertisements peculiarly for the city, to issue an edition of a small size for country circulation, and that that would be the only effect of it.

Mr. SKELTON. I propose an amendment to the amendment, which will probably meet the views both of the chairman of the Committee on the Post Office and Post Roads, and of the gentleman from New York. I propose that the weight be fixed at three ounces, thus avoiding the fraction of an ounce, and securing all the advantage which the gentleman from New York desires. I perceive that this clause of the bill includes periodicals and pamphlets, as well as newspapers. Now, periodicals and pamphlets are perhaps the most important publications in the country, and three ounces would cover many of them. I therefore propose the amendment to the amendment which I have indicated, to strike out "two and a half," and insert "three" in lieu thereof.

Mr. OLDS. I will state to the gentleman from New Jersey an objection which ought to be fatal to his amendment. It is this: if you make the standard rate of postage of all printed matter, at one cent per three ounces, for a distance, as proposed by this bill, under three thousand miles, the consequence will be that all periodicals, in short, all printed matter, would be made to conform to that weight. Take, for illustration, of the periodicals of the country, Harper's Monthly Magazine, which now weighs about eight ounces—the postage on which, under my bill, would be seven cents—this would issue in three numbers, instead of one, and the postage, instead of seven cents, would be three cents. Other periodicals would conform to the same practice. The result will be to so cripple the revenue of the Post Office Department, which is now already more than a million and a half short of the expenses, that we shall have to make still larger appropriations from the Treasury of the United States to meet the deficiency.

Mr. SKELTON. I cannot see the force of the gentleman's remarks. The expense of transporting three ounces instead of two and a half ounces, will make but little difference in the increased expenses of the Department. The increase of weight allowed to be transported for a given sum, will be a great advantage to the intelligence of the country.

Mr. OLDS. One single remark in reply to the gentleman. By the gentleman's proposition, he would not equalize the burden of the postage, for the reason that three fourths, four fifths, nay, ninety-nine hundredths of the newspapers of the country would not come up to the weight of three ounces, and yet you would charge those weighing over one ounce and less than three ounces, the same rate of postage you charge upon printed matter weighing three ounces. If the supposition be true that the periodicals of the country will conform in their weight to the standard you fix in this bill, if you raise it from two to three ounces, it will diminish the revenues of the Post Office Department, in the ratio of two to three, so far as paper postage is concerned.

The question was then taken upon the amendment offered by Mr. SKELTON, and it was not agreed to.

The SPEAKER. The question recurs upon the adoption of the amendment proposed by the committee, to strike out "two and a half ounces," and insert "two ounces."

Mr. BROOKS. Then all who are in favor of two ounces will vote to strike out, and those who are in favor of leaving the bill as it is, at two and a half ounces, will vote in the negative?

The SPEAKER. That is so.

Mr. OLDS called for tellers; which were ordered, and Messrs. OLDS and FOWLER appointed.

Mr. OLDS. Let the question be again stated, that the attention of the House may be called to it.

The SPEAKER. The Chair will again state the amendment. It is to strike out of the original bill "two and a half ounces" and insert "two ounces;" so that it will read, "and of no greater weight than two ounces, shall be charged with one cent postage," &c.

Mr. CHANDLER. If this amendment is adopted it will exclude the larger papers from the mails.

The SPEAKER. If the amendment is rejected the original bill will stand at "two and a half ounces;" but if it is adopted it will stand "two ounces." Those in favor of two ounces will first pass through the tellers.

The question was then taken, and the tellers reported—ayes 67, noes 52.

So the amendment, substituting two ounces for two and a half ounces, was adopted.

The SPEAKER. The question is now upon the adoption of the second amendment.

Mr. BROOKS. Is this amendment just passed upon any further amendable?

The SPEAKER. The Chair thinks that after the amendments proposed by the committee shall have been disposed of, it will be competent to amend the bill in any of its parts.

Mr. BROOKS. Will it be necessary to go through all the amendments to the whole bill?

The SPEAKER. Perhaps it would be more regular to go through with the amendments proposed to each section first, and then receive any amendments that may be offered by gentlemen of the House to that particular section. The Chair understands that there are several amendments proposed by the committee to that particular section, which will be first disposed of, and then the gentleman can propose his amendments.

The following amendments to the first section were then severally read, considered, and agreed to, viz:

1st amendment: Section 1. Eleventh line; strike out the words "and a half."

2d amendment: Same section. Thirteenth and fourteenth lines, strike out "two" and insert "three" in each line.

3d amendment: Same section. Fifteenth line, strike out the words "published regularly," and insert the words "and periodicals, not weighing over one ounce, published regularly as often as once in three months."

4th amendment: Same section. Sixteenth and seventeenth lines, strike out the words "and not weighing over one ounce."

5th amendment: Same section. Seventeenth line, after the word "with," insert the word "only."

6th amendment: Same section. Nineteenth line, strike out the word "either."

7th amendment: Same section. Twentieth line, after the word "or," insert the words "paid quarterly in advance."

8th amendment: Same section. Twenty-first line, after the word "thereon," strike out the remainder of said section.

9th amendment: Strike out the third section.

Mr. FOWLER. I would suggest that the first section, as it has now been amended, be read, so that we may know how it stands.

The first section, as above amended, was then read, as follows:

Be it enacted, &c., That from and after the thirtieth day of June, eighteen hundred and fifty-two, the postage upon all printed matter passing through the mail of the United States, instead of the rates now charged, shall be as follows, to wit: Each newspaper, pamphlet, periodical, magazine, book, bound or unbound, circular, catalogue, and every other description of printed matter, unconnected with any manuscript or writing, and of no greater weight than two ounces, shall be charged with one cent postage, and one cent for each additional ounce, or fraction of an ounce, for any distance under three thousand miles; and for any distance over three thousand miles, double those rates. All newspapers and periodicals not weighing over one ounce, published regularly as often as once in three months, and sent from the office of publication to actual subscribers, shall be chargeable with only one half the foregoing rates. The postage upon all printed mailable matter shall be prepaid at the office where it is mailed, or paid quarterly in advance at the office of delivery; otherwise double the foregoing rates shall be charged thereon.

The SPEAKER. Amendments are now in order to the section just read.

Mr. OLDS. It will be seen that this bill provides that "from and after the 30th day of June, 1852, the postage upon all printed matter," &c. That day having passed, it becomes necessary to amend it in that respect. I move to strike out the word "June," and insert "September."

The question was taken, and the amendment was agreed to.

Mr. BROOKS. I rise in opposition to the section as it now stands, and I shall be under the necessity of repeating a part of my argument to the House, because in the then state of the House, not one half of the members now present were then present, and the vote on the amendment was taken in such a manner, that while there was a majority at the beginning of the vote—in order to make a quorum, that majority became converted into a minority. It arose from our curious habits of doing business here, and shows how much legislation on the most important questions is subject to chance. I do not suppose the House can well have a more important subject for legislation than this respecting the rate of postage upon newspapers passing through the mails, with its consequent influence upon the intelligence of the people of this country.

I must, then, beg the pardon of the House, if I repeat a few of the arguments which I advanced upon the opening of this morning's session.

The maximum weight newspapers and pamphlets are now allowed to have, is three ounces. If I am not correct in this statement, I beg the chairman of the Post Office Committee will correct me.

Mr. OLDS. It is so.

Mr. BROOKS. The gentleman says it is so. This fact being taken for granted, then, that three ounces is the maximum weight of newspapers passing through the post office, I beg the House to remember that the proposition contained in this section of the bill is to reduce that weight from three ounces to two ounces.

Mr. POLK. Will the gentleman from New York allow me to ask him a question?

Mr. BROOKS. Certainly.

Mr. POLK. What is the weight of the pamphlet containing the life of General Scott? [Laughter.]

Mr. BROOKS. This proposition to reduce the weight of newspapers from three to two ounces is a proposition of a good deal of importance. There are newspapers in the country over the weight of two ounces now, whose weight and quality of paper are materially affected by this section of the bill. It is not expected, nor will the passage of this bill compel them to reduce the size of their papers. That is not possible. But the effect will be to compel them to print those papers upon lighter materials, and thinner paper, and the effect of this provision upon those persons who read those papers, will be to destroy their eyesight.

Now, I hold in my hand a Congressional Globe, which I use as an illustration, because it is now on every member's table. The value of that paper per pound is about twelve cents. That weight of paper is about one third more than would be the weight of paper which could be bought for eight or nine cents, and yet every man who reads the Congressional Globe will admit that it is better to read upon paper of this weight and quality, than upon paper worth eight or nine cents per pound, of much thinner quality, and much worse material.

And yet if the principle of the general law intended for some existing newspapers, was to be applied to this Congressional Globe, the size of it would be preserved, but it would be printed upon paper worth eight or nine cents per pound, and of much thinner material.

No good, therefore, comes to the country from the adoption of such a proposition as this, but great mischief to the eyesight of the community, injury to the paper manufacturers, and to the art of printing, and of course damage to the country is to be apprehended from the passage of this proposition.

I contend, further, that it is a war against intelligence and the circulation of intelligence. The country has everything to gain by the largeness of its newspapers, the quantity of reading matter they contain, and the numerous extra sheets they put into circulation. Formerly, when this country had in it some thirteen or fourteen States, small sheets were sufficiently large to diffuse throughout the whole of it its intelligence; but now that we have thirty-one States, it is impossible for any legislator, any public man, or any individual to thoroughly comprehend the condition of the country unless intelligence be spread out in some proper form or other. In order to effect that, the country must have intelligence spread before it in large sheets, or extra sheets accompanying the newspapers. Often upon the arrival from California, there come ten or eleven columns of news of the highest importance to all parts of the country, from which emigrants have gone to California. To spread that intelligence sufficiently before the public you must have extra sheets accompanying the newspapers. Newspapers, with their extra sheets, will weigh over the two ounces prescribed in this bill; and if they print extra sheets, the tax will fall upon the community, or the proprietors of the journal will use paper of a poorer quality, of a lighter weight; and in that manner damage the eyesight of the members of the community, and the character of its printing reputation.

32D CONGRESS, 1ST SESSION.

MONDAY, JULY 11, 1852.

NEW SERIES...No. 108.

It is the policy of all other countries where liberty and intelligence prevail—it is the policy of our fatherland, where journalism has reached the highest state of advancement, to have large sheets for newspapers—double and even triple sheets, which the proprietors of them give to their readers. It would be impossible in a sheet limited in weight as the first section of the bill now proposes, properly to spread before the country the debates of this Congress, so that the community could have them in full. Indeed, the country, as a whole, never do have them, and they never can have them under such a law as this, for it prohibits the publication of a newspaper of a size sufficiently large. The people of my section of country seldom know now what is said by Southern men, never, perhaps, in full. The people of Mississippi, or of North Carolina, on the other side, can know little or nothing of what is said by gentlemen from New York and Vermont. The cause of the great degree of sectionalism now pervading this country is, that the inflammatory speeches made here, from the small size of our papers, are not widely circulated. The member from South Carolina sends his speech in pamphlet form to his people, and they are enraged with the people of the North for depriving them of their rights, and some member from New England or New York rises and tells how the North has been injured by the people of South Carolina, and they become enraged and indignant at the outrages inflicted upon them. Whereas, were newspapers sufficiently large, and of greater weight than at present, spread before the public, as they are before the people of Great Britain by London newspapers which circulate throughout that country, intelligence would not be as it is now, made sectional. Speeches are sectional, inflammation is sectional, and the whole tendency of this limitation of the weight of newspapers to two ounces will be to make everything more and more sectional. Wise and prudent legislators, then, ought to exert the whole power of the Government to encourage, in the printing of newspapers, the use of the best quality of paper, and the largest size, whereas this section of the bill pursues directly a reverse course.

The proposition is to make newspapers small and of a very poor material, and it is proposed to add the sanction of Congress to a policy so false by express legislation. Do I go too far when I say it is unworthy of the age? A wise Congress and wise legislators ought to rather hold out a premium for the printing of large newspapers and on good material, than to affix the penalty proposed by this bill; and if the House will reflect upon it, I am sure this idea will be abandoned. Especially will it be abandoned when members recollect the present weight of newspapers is three ounces, against which there has been no serious complaint on the part of the community.

Mr. Speaker, there are other propositions involved in this section, of yet greater importance to the country than those which I have dwelt upon. What has been, and what is now, the demand of the public? What has been the great effort of the people, out of and in doors, to obtain from Congress? Cheap postage; cheap postage upon both letters and newspapers. Cheap postage would have been obtained last Congress on newspapers, but, in the hurry and flurry of the passage of the bill, late at midnight, never having been read, and being misapprehended by the House, a bad postage law was made with regard to newspapers. I admit that it is necessary to amend and make that law better; but it is not necessary to amend it as this bill proposes, by making it worse. I have no doubt that the great body of the House entertain the idea of the public who are demanding cheap postage on newspapers. This section of the bill, however, doubles the postage on newspapers to many parts of the country; and the only benefit it gives at all is a reduction of postage on great distances—on newspapers to California and Oregon, which are hardly yet settled. However useful it may be to them, that benefit is obtained by a positive injury—a positive infliction of damage on the settled portions of the Union. The present rate of postage, as shown by the table I have before me, for any distance not exceeding fifty miles, is twenty-five cents per quarter upon a daily newspaper. The proposition of this bill upon a two-ounce newspaper, or a newspaper a grain over one ounce, is to convert that twenty-five cents for a distance not exceeding fifty miles into a postage of seventy-eight cents per quarter. Here is cheap postage for you!

Mr. OLDS. The gentleman will see that he there labors under a mistake. This seventy-eight cents is to be paid only in case the postage be not prepaid. If prepaid, it is only thirty-nine cents.

Mr. BROOKS. It is thirty-nine on one-ounce papers, and seventy-eight on two-ounce papers. Am I right?

Mr. OLDS assented.

Mr. BROOKS. I, then, by the assent of the chairman of the Committee on the Post Office and Post Roads, state that upon one-ounce newspapers for a distance of fifty miles, this bill proposes an increase of postage from twenty-five to thirty-nine cents; upon two-ounce newspapers to seventy-eight cents; and upon two-and-a-half or three ounce newspapers yet more per quarter. This reaches almost every man in whose district a newspaper is printed; for within a circle of fifty miles, in order to take a daily newspaper weighing one ounce, you have to pay thirty-nine cents postage, and for a newspaper weighing two ounces, seventy-eight cents per quarter. I am right in these facts, and it is necessary the House should understand them. Now, if the distance be over fifty miles, and does not exceed three hundred miles, the present postage is fifty cents. By this bill, upon an ounce newspaper the postage would be seventy-eight cents, being an increase of twenty-eight cents. The postage would, of course, on papers of a greater weight, be more, especially if they printed extra sheets. In case the newspaper weighs but one ounce, and goes beyond the gentleman's district, there is a diminution of postage; but in case it goes beyond fifty, and under three hundred miles, the rate of postage, I repeat, is increased from fifty to seventy-eight cents per quarter. When the distance is over one thousand miles there is a decrease of postage; but one thousand miles is a large sweep. It reaches to the greater portion of the settled parts of the country. Is the House ready to make the large increase of postage on newspapers proposed by this bill? Is it ready to take a proposition for increase into consideration, when there is a universal cry for cheap postage, cheap newspapers, and cheap intelligence? I put it to the House whether, when the country asks for bread, it is urgent to give it stone?

As I said at the start, the long, the great distances stretching beyond one thousand miles there is a decrease of postage, because the postage under the old bill was enormously and outrageously high. I am glad there is a decrease; but this decrease should be extended in proportion, say, more in proportion to the settled reading portions of the country, who desire intelligence, and that circulation of intelligence which would make one part of this country well acquainted with the other. Mr. Speaker, this House, in adopting the bill of the last Congress, committed a great mistake, with which the country is not satisfied, and with which the country will not be satisfied. Before we repeat this mistake, let us ponder well and act deliberately upon the items in this first section of the bill, for a bill greater in importance to the great body of the reading public cannot come before us. One portion of the community should have the opportunity of well understanding the other. The great effort of Congress should be the circulation of cheap newspapers, cheap intelligence at a low rate of postage, so as to bring the several sections to an understanding of the various rights and interests of each other. The whole effect of this first section of the bill is to reverse this wise maxim, if it be admitted a wise maxim. I hope the House will undertake no such business as that. I hope we will act upon the bill deliberately, and I make the suggestion here, because I may not be able to make it hereafter, that the bill be printed in a proper form, accompanied by a report setting forth all the facts, all the changes proposed to the old bill. Let it pass through the hands of the printer, with the amendments interlined, and be deliberately acted upon. If, then, we choose to take the responsibility of increasing the rate of postage, and limiting the size of newspapers, it will be alone upon our shoulders.

Mr. OLDS. I ask the attention of the House for a few moments, though I am not sure I can make myself very intelligible, for this is a very intricate subject indeed. When I tell the House we have more than seventy distinct rates of postage on the newspapers of the country, they will perceive how difficult it will be for me to make the House understand, and I do not know that I really understand myself how this bill will bear upon the different distances fixed by the old law.

Mr. DANIEL. Has not the morning hour expired?

Mr. OLDS. I move to recommit the bill to the Committee on the Post Office and Post Roads.

Mr. DANIEL. I move to go to the business on the Speaker's table.

Mr. HOUSTON. Will it be in order for me to make a motion to suspend the rules of the House to go into the Committee of the Whole upon the deficiency bill?

The SPEAKER. It is not in order until the motion of the gentleman from North Carolina [Mr. DANIEL] is disposed of.

Mr. HOUSTON. I have a great desire to dispose of the bill now before the Committee of the Whole.

Mr. HENN. I wish to offer an amendment, by unanimous consent, to the second section of the bill, so that it may be printed in the Globe in the morning.

The SPEAKER. We have not yet reached it. Mr. HENN. I know it is not in order, but by unanimous consent, I wish to offer it so that it may be printed.

The following is the amendment proposed by Mr. HENN:

Add the following to the second section:

The presidents of universities, colleges, academies, and of all scientific institutions, and also the Smithsonian Institution, may send by mail, free of postage, the printed copies of any regular paper, pamphlet, or book published under the authority of any such institution; and also the proof-sheets of such copies while the same are being published: Provided, Such printed copies shall be distributed gratis.

There being no objection, it was so ordered.

Mr. HOUSTON. Unless the gentleman desires to get to the business upon the Speaker's table, and the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. OLDS] will yield me the floor for that purpose, I will make the motion to go into Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union. I am exceedingly anxious to get through with the deficiency bill with as little delay as possible.

Mr. DANIEL. The House having passed by for a long while private bills, I am exceedingly anxious that they should be now considered. I therefore insist upon my motion.

The question was then taken upon Mr. DANIEL's motion, and it was not agreed to.

So the House refused to proceed to the business upon the Speaker's table.

Mr. HOUSTON. The gentlemen from Ohio yields me the floor, and I now move that the rules be suspended, and that the House resolve itself into the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union.

Mr. FOWLER. I wish to understand if the gentleman from Ohio moved to recommit the bill under discussion?

The SPEAKER. That motion was made and entered upon the Journal.

The question was then taken upon Mr. HOUSTON's motion, and it was agreed to.

The twenty-fifth amendment, the next in order, was then read, as follows:

"For additional compensation for increasing the transportation of the United States mail between New York and Liverpool, in the Collins line of steamers, to twenty-six trips per annum, at such times as shall be directed by the Postmaster General, and in conformity to his last annual report to Congress, and his letter of the 15th of November last to the Secretary of the Navy, commencing said increased service on the 1st of January, 1852, at the rate of $33,000 per trip, in lieu of the present allowance; the sum of $236,500: Provided, That it shall be in the power of Congress, at any time after the 31st day of December, 1854, to terminate the arrangement for the additional allowance herein provided for, upon giving six months' notice."

The CHAIRMAN. The pending question is upon the amendment of the gentleman from Virginia, [Mr. MEADE,] to strike out "33," and insert "25," so as to make the appropriation $25,000 per trip, instead of $33,000.

The question was then taken upon the amendment, and it was not agreed to.

Mr. DEAN. As it is necessary at this stage of the question to propose some amendment to the bill in order to obtain the floor, I therefore move to strike out the proviso.

Mr. BAYLY. I desire to amend the prior clause of the bill, and I wish to ascertain if, after this proposition to strike out the proviso is acted upon, it will be in order to go back to the prior part of the section?

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair thinks it will be in order to go back to any part of it.

Mr. DEAN. This is the only question which has arisen during this session upon which I have entertained doubts as to the way I ought to vote. While every feeling of national pride bid me say ay, my fixed opinions of opposition to the creation or continuance of monopolies by the General Government, or of grants by it of bounties to individuals, seemed to compel me to give a reluctant nay to the application. Amid this apparent struggle between principle and patriotism, I examined the subject in its various bearings, and am satisfied that all objections on principle are without foundation; that it is a question free from all constitutional difficulty; that the amount of the appropriation is the only real question about which we should differ. Having, after a thorough examination, come to this conclusion, I endeavored some days since to obtain the floor to give the reasons which would induce me to vote for the appropriation inserted by the amendment of the Senate, and now recommended by the Committee on Ways and Means of this House. Not succeeding at that time, as my time is now limited by our rules, I shall avail myself of the privilege universally granted, as my time will expire before finishing my remarks, to hand my notes to the reporters, that my constituents, to whom I am immediately responsible for every vote, may understand in full the reasons by which my action has been determined.

The first question to be settled in passing upon this appropriation is, ought this Government to aid in maintaining the Collins or a similar line of steamers between this country and England?

If this is answered in the affirmative, the only remaining question is, whether we are not obliged to sustain this line now, because of the impossibility at this time of obtaining any other ships, of sufficient capacity and speed, to carry the mails between New York and Liverpool, in a successful competition with the Cunarders?

In discussing the first proposition, it becomes proper that I should address myself to the question propounded by the gentleman from Tennessee, [Mr. JONES,] who, in opposing this measure yesterday, asked, "Where can you find the power in the Constitution to make this appropriation?"

Now, sir, I might answer the question by citing precedents almost innumerable, of the exercise of similar powers, with the approval of every Administration; or point to the unbroken line of policy from the foundation of the Government. I might say that the creation of this system was upon the recommendation of President Polk in his annual message—that the law was passed by a Democratic Congress, and approved and signed by a Democratic President. But I do not propose to answer it in that way, choosing rather to point out the specific clauses in the Constitution which authorize this appropriation. By referring to the preamble to the Constitution we shall find that one of the objects for which it was adopted was "to provide for the common defense and promote the general welfare." And the eighth section of the first article reads as follows:

"The Congress shall have power to lay and collect taxes, duties, imposts, and excises; to pay the debts, and provide for the common defense and general welfare of the United States."

That is, the taxing power is given to raise money for the purpose of providing for the common defense. Admitting, however, that it can only be exercised in pursuance of the subsequent grants of power, this, taken in connection with the war-making power, and the means to be employed in the exercise of this prerogative not being specified in the fundamental law, the right to employ such as in our judgment the wants and exigencies of the times require must be clear and undisputed. At one age of the world this duty on our part would have been properly discharged by building high walls, by arming our soldiers with spears, swords, javelins, and shields. At a later day, and while we had no commerce, by raising troops, furnishing them with fire-arms and ammunition, and erecting and manning fortifications to protect our harbors and the passes to our country.

Now, it is to be noticed that the manner in which the common defense is to be provided for, is not restrained in the Constitution, except by the limitations of the express powers. We are nowhere told that we may build a fort, establish and maintain a military academy or arsenal, or make or purchase fire-arms; yet the exercise of these powers has always been unquestioned as necessary implications from the war-making power and the power to impose taxes to provide for the common defense. If it can be shown that by sustaining this line it will aid in providing for the common defense in case of war, the right to make the appropriation is clear. But will it necessarily effect this object? We have now a commerce which is universal—and in view of the revolution that steam has effected in navigation, and the probability that the next war that any foreign Power shall wage against us will be upon the ocean—when all these have their steam navies—in view of this, the necessity which this changed state of affairs creates, I submit that the power is not only within the strict purview and meaning of the Constitution; but that the duty on our part to exercise it in this manner is imperative; that a steam navy is as necessary now as were fire-arms and gunpowder in the time of the Revolution. But I find in another provision of the Constitution—in the grant to establish post offices and post roads—a direct power for that purpose.

Now, gentlemen may say, perhaps, that you cannot build a road upon the Atlantic. Why, you can build a road there as well as upon a river; and the rivers in this country are made post roads; and I cannot see any reason why the ocean cannot be so used. In fact, this line has bridged the Atlantic, and connected New York with Liverpool.

And, Mr. Chairman, there is no direct power in the Constitution to transport the mails. But it is a necessary incident to the powers granted. As I see my time is nearly out, I have only to say that I find the power in another part of the Constitution, which is "the power to regulate commerce." For it is impossible to regulate commerce unless the Government provide for the transmission of intelligence. We must have foreign correspondence, and all our Atlantic cities are interested in this matter, as well as the people at large. I say, therefore, in the Constitution, in addition to the power to provide a navy, there are three other distinct grants of power under which this appropriation can be justified.

I will not now amplify these points, but merely add there is another point, and that is, the national objects to be promoted by this enterprise. We are now compelled to meet and compete with England; with our naval and commercial marine, in a contest for the commerce of the world; and other gentlemen may do as they please, but in this, the third war with England which we are now waging, I, for one, mean to be on the side of my country. The contest now is, for commercial, industrial, and naval supremacy. It is a contest which we are waging, not by one class of our people against another, but a contest which the manufacturers, which the commercial class, which our artisans, and our citizens generally are waging with England, for commercial and manufacturing supremacy; and I say, that in a contest of this kind, I, for one, will be on the side of my country.

Mr. BOCK. Has the war been regularly declared?

Mr. DEAN. Yes, sir, the war has been regularly declared; or, rather, it exists by the act of England, for the power of the British Government is, and for years has been, devoted to the maintenance of this Cunard line.

Mr. NABERS. I am very happy, Mr. Chairman, to agree in one particular with the gentleman from New York, [Mr. DEAN,] who has just taken his seat. It is this, that he is always found upon the side of his country. I am always found there, and not only upon the side of a part of my country, but all my country. Am I to understand that the Collins line embraces the whole country? Am I to infer that it embraces not only the people, but the Constitution, too? If so, I am free to confess that I have read that Constitution in vain.

The gentleman quotes the article in the Constitution about the common defense and general welfare, and applies it to the bounty which this amendment proposes to give the Collins line of ocean steamers. This is perverting a constitutional provision, which was intended to embrace all, to the benefit of a select few. It is invoked to aid a particular interest, and that, too, at the expense of the general welfare. Read the Constitution again, sir. I have not the honor of a personal acquaintance with the gentlemen interested in the Collins line, but I take it for granted that they are shrewd men, and know how to approach us; and how do they do it? Why, by putting the British upon our back, and appealing to our patriotism. Sir, it is the first time, in the history of this country, that I have ever known that hallowed principle called patriotism to be put up to the highest bidder for cash! In 1847, or whenever the contract was made with E. K. Collins & Co., they agreed to be patriotic for $385,000 a year! [Laughter.] I say they agreed for a stipulated price to play the patriot, but they have tired out at that price, and now they demand, for a continuance of their patriotism towards our country, the small and insignificant sum of $800,000, or upwards, per annum! Who could not be patriotic for that money, sir? [Laughter.] Point me to a man upon the earth who would refuse to be patriotic for a handsome sum like that. The questions were asked on yesterday by the gentleman from Tennessee, [Mr. POLK,] "Have you no nationality? Do you limit your patriotism by the round of a dollar?" To the first question I answer, yes. I am proud of my nationality. To the second I answer, no. My patriotism is not limited by the round of a dollar, but the patriotism of E. K. Collins and Co. would seem to be thus limited. What do they say? They come forward to this House and tell you, unless you increase their compensation, they cease their patriotism; that is, they will let the line go, and suffer the British to catch you! I recollect in the early struggles of this country for liberty that men made great sacrifices in order to be patriotic. I recollect that old General Marion used to sleep in the swamps of South Carolina, dash out occasionally with his men to fight the British and Tories by way of getting fresh air and a little recreation, and then return to his hiding-place, and lived upon parched corn and roast potatoes served up upon a piece of pine bark! That was patriotic in those days. But patriotism in 1852 means magnificent floating palaces—means a princely fortune as the result of a contract with the Government of the United States. But, sir, I deny that this Congress has the right to make such discrimination as is contemplated by this amendment.

Mr. MILLSON. The gentleman from New York [Mr. DEAN] moves to strike out the whole proviso. I wish to know if it is in order to amend the proviso which has been proposed to be stricken out?

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair thinks it is in order. The proviso is an independent proposition, complete in itself, and is therefore subject to amendment.

Mr. MILLSON. I move to amend the proviso by striking out the words "fifty-four," in the fourteenth line, and inserting "fifty-two" in lieu thereof, so as to authorize Congress, at any time after the 31st day of December, 1852, to terminate the contract.

Mr. Chairman, I should be false to every principle by which my public conduct has heretofore been regulated, if I failed to express my utter and earnest opposition to this amendment of the Senate. I will not now go into a discussion of the question, whether it be consistent with the principles of the Democratic party to make this appropriation. Nor do I deem it at all necessary to reply to the argument of the gentleman from New York, [Mr. DEAN,] that the preamble of the Constitution confers upon Congress authority to provide for the common defense and the general welfare of the United States. I need make no other answer to this argument than to refer him to the resolutions of the late Baltimore Convention; and if the gentleman claims membership in the Democratic party, and subscribes to the doctrines proclaimed by their Convention, he will require no other answer to his arguments. He will find there a resolution, adopting into the Democratic creed the resolutions of Kentucky and Virginia, and the report of Mr. Madison to the Virginia Legislature, in which this very heresy of his is condemned and repudiated.

Mr. CARTTER. I wish to inquire of the gentleman, which resolution of the Baltimore Convention he refers to?

Mr. MILLSON. I refer to that declaring that the Democratic party will uphold the principles laid down in the Kentucky and Virginia resolutions.

Mr. CARTTER. Of '98?

Mr. MILLSON. Yes, sir. But what is the case before the House? The statement of it is simple enough. A company of gentlemen have embarked in an enterprise for the transportation of passengers and merchandise between New York and Liverpool. They have entered into a contract to carry the mail at a stipulated price. It is not pretended that their compensation for this service is too small. But they say that their expenses far exceed their receipts, and they inform us that they must abandon their enterprise, unless the United States will agree to make up the losses they must suffer. The ill success of their adventure has in no way been occasioned by us, but it is proposed to increase their allowance, already disproportioned to the actual service rendered, so as to enable them to prosecute their business. Sir, I see nothing in this system, but pure, simple, unmitigated protection, and protection in its most odious form.

I will do the Whigs of the country the justice to say that they have never yet, in their advocacy of the protective system, ventured so far as to put their hands into the public Treasury, and take from it sums of money for the purpose of bestowing them in bounties to favored classes; and I will do them the further justice to say that, while they urge what they wrongly suppose to be the protection of American against foreign interests, they have never gone so far as to urge the protection of American interests against American rivalry. No, sir; much as I condemn the policy they have sought to establish, they have never yet gone to the extent of seeking to protect one single manufacturer of cotton in Connecticut against all the other manufacturers of cotton in the United States. Upon such a question as this, the discussion of details would seem hardly to be necessary. There are some propositions we ought to be prepared to reject without any scrutiny of particulars. But let me direct your attention to the extent of this protection. According to the showing of the gentlemen who are the proprietors of these steam-vessels, their receipts have been $48,286 85 per trip. Deduct, then, the amount paid them by the Government of the United States—$19,000—and their whole receipts, from all sources, have been only $29,286 85. And yet, we are now asked to give them $33,000 per trip! All their earnings from the transportation of passengers and merchandise only amount to the sum of $29,286 85, and we are asked to pay them for transporting a few mail bags $33,000 per trip; that is to say, a sum largely exceeding the whole of their income from all other sources.

But, sir, will even this amount save them from loss? In their own exhibit, the average expense of each trip is set down at $65,215 64; and if they should hereafter receive $33,000 per trip from the Government, their income, unless their other receipts should be swelled, would only be $62,286 85; so that their loss in twenty-six trips would still be upwards of $76,000 per year.

But all this is to be done, not for the sake of Mr. Collins and his associates, but for the good of the country. Yes, sir, that is the excuse. The same thing has always been said, when burdens have been laid upon the people, for the purpose of giving undue advantages to certain protected interests. It was done for the good of the country; to strengthen us in war; to increase our respectability abroad; to protect American labor against British rivalry; to increase the demand for our agricultural productions. It was done for the good of the farmer, the mechanic, and the merchant, who had to bear the burden, rather than for the manufacturer, who saddled it on them. We are accustomed to such arguments as these. The people have never been much impressed with them. They are, indeed, not quite original in our own country. Goldsmith pleasantly tells us that the sumptuous dinners which the churchwardens used to vote themselves, were only eaten for the good of the poor of the parish.

[Here the hammer fell.]

Mr. McMULLIN. Mr. Chairman, I shall not attempt to discuss the constitutional question which presents itself in connection with the consideration of the subject-matter now before the committee; but, sir, I must say, with due deference to the coordinate branch of this Legislature, that I think they have traveled slightly out of the way upon a mere deficiency bill—a bill, sir, to provide for the deficiencies in the expenditure of your Government—to add to that deficiency bill the enormous expenditure now proposed.

Mr. CARTTER. I call the gentleman to order.

Mr. McMULLIN. Make your point of order.

Mr. CARTTER. I will endeavor to do it. My point of order is this: that it is competent to speak against the amendment of the gentleman from Virginia, [Mr. MILLSON,] which amendment was against the bill. The gentleman is putting up a second speech against the bill. Instead of speaking against the amendment, he is speaking for it.

The CHAIRMAN. So far as the gentleman has proceeded, the Chair is not able to determine that he was out of order. The amendment is one to limit the appropriation to 1852, instead of to 1854. The gentleman may be in favor of the bill or against it, and yet support the amendment.

Mr. McMULLIN. The Chair has certainly decided correctly, because I have not yet determined my position. Before I shall have taken my seat, the question of order might, perhaps, have been properly raised upon me.

Sir, I desire to obtain from the friends of this bill, information upon two or three important points. My understanding is, that when this Collins company asked the Government to enter into partnership with them, they proposed to carry the mail for $385,000, with which sum they would be able to compete with the British line. They now come forward and ask the Government to swell that appropriation to upwards of $800,000. Now, sir, we require the War Department, the Navy Department, and the various other departments of the Government, to show in detail the expenditures of the Government. The Collins company come forward and say that they have expended a very large amount of money. How have they expended it? I desire to know of the friends of this measure, whether or not that company were in debt about one million of dollars, at the time they launched their vessels, and were ready to carry out this contract? I desire to know if the stock of the company has not been depreciated to from thirty to fifty below par? I desire to know, further, what salaries they pay their officers? I have been informed that they pay their captains $6,000 per annum. If that be true, I desire to know of the friends of the company, if they cannot command the services of competent officers for $3,000 per annum?

Sir, let these gentlemen come forward and give us a bill of particulars. Let them show the Government why they have gone into this extraordinary and extravagant expenditure of money, and not deal in these vague generalities. Let them be required to do that which the Departments of this Government are required to do. Sir, it is an outrage and an imposition upon this Government, to ask us to appropriate this money without knowing how the company have incurred these exorbitant expenditures.

The learned constitutional lawyer from New York [Mr. DEAN] gets up here and tells the House and the country that he is a Democrat, that this is a Democratic measure, and that it has been a Democratic measure since the foundation of the Government. The gentleman must have but little respect for the House of Representatives to present legal views in such a vague and indefinite manner. Sir, if this is not protection—protection in its most odious form—I confess that I know not what protection consists in. Sir, an appeal is made to the House of Representatives that this is a contest between Great Britain and America; and those who oppose this appropriation are told that their patriotism is not large enough, high enough, expansive enough, to protect our Government and our country against Great Britain.

Mr. MILLSON. I believe this to be an important amendment, and I therefore ask for tellers.

Mr. CARTTER. I wish to inquire if it is now in order to oppose the amendment?

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair thinks not.

Mr. CARTTER. I believe the rule is, that there may be one speech in opposition to the amendment. But the speech of the gentleman from Virginia, [Mr. McMULLIN,] who has just taken his seat, was an elaborate argument in favor of the amendment of his colleague.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair thinks it is not in order to discuss the amendment further.

Tellers were ordered; and Messrs. CARTTER and VENABLE were appointed.

The question was taken, and it was decided in the negative—ayes 62, noes 73.

So the amendment was not agreed to.

Mr. STANTON, of Tennessee. I move to amend the proviso by striking out "54" and inserting "55."

I advocate this amendment upon the ground that it is necessary to extend the time in order to test the grounds on which this appropriation was originally made. This line was originally established with two objects. One of those objects was to carry the mails, and for that, I contend—and I presume there will be no question about it—the Government has the right to contract and to pay. It was a legitimate object, clearly within our constitutional power, and sanctioned by precedent and almost universal acquiescence. The other object was the establishment of a steam navy, or the employment in the commerce of the country of a certain number of vessels which might be employed for the protection of that commerce in time of war. Now, sir, there can be no question that this also is a legitimate object, if the means employed be appropriate. I maintain that the experiment has not yet been fully tested, and ought, by no means, to be abandoned. I maintain that these vessels, built by the Collins company, are the strongest ships that have ever been put afloat since ships have been built. I maintain that they will prove to be the best war vessels that ever have been constructed; and, more than that, I maintain that the establishment of this line has already done much for the security of the country. One gentleman, during the discussions that have already taken place, said, in the course of his remarks, that it was idle and absurd to say that these four vessels could stand against the whole steam navy of the British Government. Sir, if our Navy, with these four vessels added, could not stand against the steam navy of Great Britain, surely it could stand much less against that navy if we had not these four vessels.

Now, sir, when this policy was adopted, at the recommendation of President Polk, immediately after the danger of war with Great Britain upon the Oregon question, our coast was constantly traversed by the West India line of British steamers; and that fact created a strong apprehension on the part of our Government of a complete devastation of our coast and our commerce if a war had broken out. The effect of the establishment of this and other lines has been to drive away those British steamers from our coast. In this point of view, the effect has been to render our country more secure, to give us protection to this extent, and to give us greater confidence in ourselves.

But, sir, it has done infinitely more than that. I tried to get the floor before the debate upon this question was closed, in order that I might submit my views at length, but I found it impossible to do so from the press of effort that was made upon that occasion to speak. I can now do it very imperfectly. I do not pretend to say that these vessels are the best that can be built, or that the principle adopted in their machinery and in the mode of their propulsion is the best that can be adopted; but I say that this is a great experiment, which has redounded to the honor of the country, and for which Government has not paid too much, and will not pay too much if the amount necessary to continue the experiment shall be appropriated by the adoption of the provision which is now under consideration. Sir, I believe that the establishment of this policy recommended by Mr. Polk, and now scarcely more than commenced, has put this Government fifty years ahead of what it would have been if this policy had never been adopted. Before the construction of these vessels, it was impossible in this country to make such machinery as that used in these Collins steamers.

Mr. TAYLOR. Mr. Chairman, the people of the United States are no doubt somewhat surprised that on the 9th day of July, 1852, we are discussing a bill, and the amendments thereto, to supply deficiencies for the fiscal year terminating on the 30th June, 1852. For one, I disclaim all participation in the slow progress of business in this House in those protracted and irrelevant debates which have so long delayed the public business; and I say here, that I think this bill and all the amendments thereto, the one now under consideration included, should have passed some three or four months ago.

Sir, I have sought the floor now, as one of the Representatives of the State of Ohio, to express my concurrence in the important amendment now under consideration, sent to us from the Senate, and to say that I believe it is the disposition of the great State which I have the honor in part to represent upon this floor, to uphold this great national interest; and that they are adverse to the opinions so eloquently expressed in the written speech read by my colleague [Mr. STANTON] the other day.

Sir, I congratulate this House that we have at last got rid of the "odious thralldom," (to use the expression of one of the most distinguished editors of this country,) imposed on the House of Representatives by the everlasting and irrelevant debate under the one-hour rule; and that we have at last got into the business condition of being obliged to confine our remarks to five minutes speeches. That is the only way in which we can make any progress in the public business; and I, for one, would confine the remarks of members, during the morning hours, to five minutes speeches, and hold evening sessions for general debate.

I wish now, in a very few words, to assign the reasons why I shall support this amendment of the Senate. The gentleman from Virginia [Mr. MILLSON] says,—and the same remark has been made by other gentlemen,—that he is opposed to this amendment, because it is giving some aid to the great principle of protection—a principle which I am proud, as a Whig member of Congress, to advocate and maintain. Sir, the principle of protection is maintained not only by the Whig party in this country, but by a large portion of the Democratic party. It is a vital principle of the American Government, and of our Constitution. What is our Government for, if it be not to advocate or defend the great principles of protection, progression, and reform? Why are we legislating here for months, unless it be to protect American rights, to protect American labor, to uphold American honor and American labor in the great country of which we are the Representatives?

Sir, I glory in the fact that this is an incidental mode of protecting American commerce, upholding American power and supremacy on the sea, and carrying out the great principle of steam navigation which was originated by American ingenuity. It is true that in 1840, the British Government seizing hold of this great principle, had, before we commenced these enterprises of ocean steam navigation, fourteen steamers on our coast monopolizing our carrying trade for freight and mails, and, in some degree, driving our own commercial marine from our own coast. The wisdom of a former Congress thought proper to establish an ocean steam marine, and in little more than three years we have driven away the British steam vessels from our coast, monopolized the trade to Chagres, divided the profits of freight and of carrying the mails between England and other parts of Europe and the United States, and we have only to complete the work by maintaining the Collins line, which is emphatically the American line, as a national line.

Sir, I cannot go into the details of this matter now, although I have the materials here; but in one of these evening sessions, which I hope we shall have, I shall be glad to descant upon the subject. The Cunard or British line has seven vessels in commission; the Collins or American line has only four. They may properly be termed British vessels and American vessels; and the American vessels, I wish you to understand, although there are only four of them, have more tonnage than the seven employed by the Cunard line. According to the best calculation I can make, the amount paid to the Collins line by the American Government is less than that paid by the British Government to the Cunard line, the aggregate tonnage of the seven Cunard steamers being 12,252 tons, and the aggregate tonnage of the four American steamers, or Collins line, being 13,702—so that the price paid to aid the American line by the American Government is less per ton than the amount paid by the British Government to uphold the British or Cunard line—the American line receiving $4 82 per ton, and the British line receiving from the British Government $5 75 per ton.

The British Government has now 320 ocean steamers, carrying 1,520 guns, including her war steamers, and these easily convertible into war steamers, whilst the American Government has only 40 steamers suitable for war purposes, carrying 73 guns. And yet we find gentlemen here disposed to abandon the wise policy which originated and maintains the small effective force we now have, to countervail the immense force and far-seeing sagacity of the English Government. Sir, we cannot safely abandon our ocean steam marine. We must uphold it. Every principle of economy, of wise legislation, forbids that we should now abandon the scheme of ocean steam navigation; and it seems to me that the small advance now proposed to the Collins line of steamers is the best means of maintaining the proud position we now hold in the great progress of steam navigation. I hope the Senate's amendment will be concurred in.

Mr. STANTON, of Tennessee. I will withdraw my amendment, if there is no objection.

No objection was made, and the amendment was withdrawn.

Mr. CLINGMAN. I move to extend the time of notice to be given from six months to twelve months.

My object is to answer briefly the remarks of the gentleman from Virginia, [Mr. MILLSON,] with reference to protection. I was endeavoring on yesterday to say something on this subject, when my five minutes expired. I think, Mr. Chairman, this bill has suffered, in the estimation of some at least, from its connection with this question of protection, or a tariff. Now, what is the proposition now pending? Everybody, I think, will see at once that there is a striking dissimilarity between the two cases, as soon as attention is called to the view I am about to present. It is proposed to give this Collins line an advanced compensation, to enable it to compete with the line that is sustained by the British Treasury. Now, it is contended by nobody that the manufacturing establishments that bring their goods into this country are supported out of that Treasury. Why, sir, all manufactures which are made and brought into this country are made by private persons, on their own capital, and are brought here to be sold in open market, at such price as can be obtained, and hence gentlemen may very well be opposed to giving our American manufacturers any support, either by bounty or protection, because they have to compete with private persons only. But I say, sir, if the British Government should carry out the principle, as she has done with the Cunarders—if Great Britain, I say, were to give money to her manufacturing establishments, and thus enable them to manufacture goods at a cheap rate, and undersell us, then I should be for meeting them in some mode, either by bounties to our establishments, or, what I should prefer, taxing them heavily. But she has done nothing of the sort, and therefore gentlemen may very well be opposed to going into this protective system when our manufacturers have only to meet with competition from private persons and private capital, and yet be willing to support a line of steamers which comes in competition with a line supported by the British Government. I say, sir, that if the Cunard line were supported by private persons and private capital alone, as the manufacturing establishments are, I would not give the Collins line one dollar to compete with them. I would say to them, "Go forward and fight; fight the Cunarders fairly, upon their own ground, without asking help from us." But it is because the British Government has interfered in the contest, and is assisting this very line, that I support the proposition now before us, to give our ships a fair chance in the contest, by helping them as much as Great Britain helps their opponents.

But, Mr. Chairman, I agree with the gentleman from Virginia, [Mr. MILLSON,] that this gives an advantage to these lines over private persons, and I regret it; but by withdrawing our support to the Collins line, and causing it to go down, we shall not avoid this evil. Suppose you withdraw your support from the Collins line and let it go down. Great Britain will still keep up her line and thus continue this injurious monopoly against private enterprise. She will multiply the number of her ships, and the number of trips, because then they can charge higher rates for passengers and freight, and you would still have this British competition with which our private mercantile marine would have to struggle. If we leave the field to Great Britain she will only go to a greater extent in this matter. What is the proper course to pursue? To meet her by similar lines. If she gets up an armament, though we are friends of peace we must get up another to meet it. Though, by so doing, and having two military establishments, more lives may be lost than if there were only one. You may, however, by this means restrain her. This principle of retaliation is the universal practice, not only of nations, but of men. If a man gives me a blow, and I submit, he may repeat it; but if I can succeed in knocking him down, that is the best way to satisfy him that it is wrong for him to commit a breach of the peace. Now, if Great Britain has embarked in this contest, I want her to see that she has a foe that will meet her at every point, and contest every inch of the ground. Let her see that in this race the terms are to be equal, and that she is to be pressed at every stride and beaten, if American skill, energy, and capital can do it. In this mode, and in this only, shall we be able to induce that Government to abandon this system of embarking in enterprises which ought to be left to private establishments. That is my object, but we cannot accomplish it by folding our arms, and leaving her to have everything her own way.

Mr. BAYLY. I do not derive the constitutional authority for passing this provision from the language of the preamble of the Constitution, and subsequently repeated in the clause granting powers to Congress; and I think if the gentleman from New York [Mr. DEAN] examines carefully that preamble and the subsequent clause, he will find that the words "provide for the common defense and general welfare," so far from enlarging the powers of the General Government, restrict them. I do not, therefore, find the power to make this appropriation in the preamble of the Constitution, which declares that one of its objects is to provide for the common defense and the general welfare; but I find it in that part of the Constitution which gives to Congress the undisputed jurisdiction over navigation, and the undisputed authority to maintain a navy. Sir, this question is no new one. In '94 Great Britain, by giving exclusive privileges and advantages to her ships, had nearly monopolized the shipping of the world. She had, according to the report of Mr. Madison, at that time eleven twelfths of the shipping and seamen employed in her trade. Our Government took up that question in '94, and Mr. Jefferson made his celebrated report upon the subject of commercial privileges and restrictions. Following that report Mr. Madison introduced into this House his celebrated resolutions of that year, and made his speech upon that occasion. In Mr. Jefferson's report on commercial privileges and restrictions, he took the ground distinctly which is now taken by us, that when other nations give privileges and advantages to their shipping, that the very principle of free competition, of free trade, requires that we should meet them by countervailing regulations.

I wish I had time to go into this subject fully. Mr. Jefferson said that when one nation gives advantages to its navigation over those of any other, there were but two ways to remove this inequality. One was by friendly negotiation, which was preferable, if it could be successful, but, if it was not, the other was by countervailing regulations. He says, after going on to say that friendly negotiation was the better course, if practicable:

"But should any nation, contrary to our wishes, suppose it may better find its advantage by continuing its system of prohibitions, duties, and regulations, it behooves us to protect our citizens, their commerce and navigation, by counter-prohibitions, duties, and regulations also. Free commerce and navigation are not to be given in exchange for restrictions and vexations, nor are they likely to produce a relaxation of them."

Now, sir, it has been said that the principle of protecting manufactures is involved in this provision. Why, sir, nobody, under the clause to regulate commerce, has ever doubted that we might pass countervailing regulations, with a view to commercial objects, to meet those of other nations. If any one doubts it, let him look to the history of the formation of the Constitution. Let him look to our whole legislation, especially respecting our intercourse with the West India Islands. If he doubts our rights to foster our navigation and raise up a school for seamen, let him look to the fishing bounties which have extended down to this very day, notwithstanding the necessity for them has disappeared.

No, sir, what we free-traders have objected to was, that in the tariff laws the power to regulate commerce was perverted to the power to encourage manufactures. What we have objected to in tariffs of protection is, that it was not the bona fide intention of the law to regulate commerce, but under the pretext of doing that, to cripple commerce and encourage manufactures. That is what we have objected to. It has never been objected that Congress could not pass countervailing regulations for the purpose of regulating commerce, nor has anybody even questioned the authority of Congress to jurisdiction over navigation. Has anybody ever questioned the authority of this Government to pass countervailing regulations with the very view of enforcing that equality which is the very soul and life of free trade itself.

Mr. CLINGMAN. I withdraw my amendment if there is no objection.

Mr. JONES, of Tennessee. I demand a vote upon the amendment.

The question was then taken on the amendment, and it was not agreed to.

Mr. SEYMOUR, of New York. I move to strike out of the proviso, "six months" and insert "ten months."

Mr. Chairman, I regret my necessary absence from the business of the House for a few days past, as it has deprived me of the opportunity of presenting my views upon this important question at length. I deem the proposition now before the committee, in reference to the Collins line, to be one of the most important questions that has come before this House during the present session, or that can be presented. I know, sir, that the citizens of the State I have the honor in part to represent, feel a deep interest in the success of the Collins line; but, sir, any disposition I might have to meet the wishes of my own fellow-citizens, would never induce me to sustain a measure which I did not believe to be constitutional, and to be consistent with the general weal.

I believe that those considerations which pertain to the general welfare of the country, so far as it may be involved in this proposition, outweigh anything of a local character that concerns this subject. So far as the constitutional question is concerned, I never have had the least doubt upon the subject. In my examination of the question, I was led particularly to a consideration of those laws which the gentleman from Virginia, [Mr. BAILY,] has just alluded to, and which lie at the very foundation of the commercial prosperity of this country—laws, sir, introduced at an early period of our Government, and which have been maintained hitherto, and enforced in all their rigor, for the purpose of building up our commerce, and which have done it, and thereby have taken from our great commercial rival, just as is proposed to be done now by the operation of the system of steam marine, the monopoly of trade upon the ocean.

Sir, I have heard the cry of monopoly raised against this proposition. What monopoly? A monopoly, sir, which shall defeat the British monopoly which they enjoyed for six or seven years before the Collins line was established, and in the enjoyment of which they have cleared more than five millions of dollars, and by which they were able to put on, in competition with the very line we have established between New York and Liverpool, a splendid line of steamers, without which, I venture to assert, this increased appropriation would not be necessary to maintain the Collins line. For had the Cunarders remained of the same tonnage and swiftness as when the Collins line was projected, no gentleman can fail to see that the compensation which the Government paid to them of $385,000 a year would have been sufficient to have transferred this monopoly from England, and given it to our own country. And is there really any objection to such a result? When there must be a monopoly either by the British or by ourselves—for that is inevitable in the present state of things—where is the American that is not prepared to stand by his own country in this matter?

But, sir, I have said that irrespective of these commercial considerations there are other views pertaining to this proposition, of a higher character, and those are the bearings it has upon our naval marine. I consider that the great question which overrides all others. For I think the time has come—if it has not already been decided and settled in the American mind—the time has come when we must settle the question, whether we are to increase our naval power, or not; and if we determine to increase it, and to make it comport with our position and character as one of the great Powers of the world, whether that shall be done in the old made of expensive ships-of-the-line and frigates, to lie in time of peace and rot in our docks, or by building up lines of mail steamers, so constructed as to be easily convertible into war steamers.

Mr. SWEETSER. Mr. Chairman, I do not feel at liberty to remain silent at this crisis of the debate. I agree with the gentleman from New York, [Mr. SEYMOUR,] that this is an important question. I believe this to be a question of grave import. It is one which should be discussed with that kind of care and examination which becomes a deliberative body, acting upon great and important interests. An appeal has been made, not only to our interests, but to our patriotism—our national pride. This is the proper forum where such an appeal should be made upon a grave question of this character. I rise for the purpose of responding, so far as I have the ability, for those whom I have the honor upon this floor to represent. I am willing to assume the full responsibility of the vote I shall ultimately give, and I will here avow that it is my determination to vote against the Collins line of steamers. The reasons for that vote I will assign. I represent in part the great valley of the West, and I desire to present a point to Western men upon which it seems to me their vote should be predicated. In so doing I do not hope to be listened to with favor by gentlemen who are protectionists in principle and in practice. I will say to those gentlemen on my right, as was said by one of old, that "Ephraim is joined to his idols; let him alone."

It will be found, by reference to the report of the Secretary of the Treasury for 1852, that more than half of the steam fleet of the American continent is upon the waters of the Mississippi and its tributaries. It is the largest steam fleet in the world. Its size is conclusive evidence of its success and superiority for its purpose to any in the world. By it, freight is carried at a lower price than by any other mode of conveyance known in this age of improvement. These steamboats carry passengers on the average for one cent per mile, furnishing all accommodations, and freight at the rate of one cent per hundred pounds per one hundred miles. This fleet is entirely the result of individual enterprise, without governmental aid.

Let us go back for a moment for the space of forty years, and mark the progress of events. In 1811 there was but one steamboat afloat upon the waters of the Mississippi. A trip from Cincinnati to New Orleans, a distance about equal to that from New York to Liverpool, was then made in about fifteen days—cost of passage from $60 to $80. In 1852 about five hundred steamboats float upon the bosom of the Mississippi and its tributaries; the usual time of passage from Cincinnati to New Orleans is about six days; first class of passage from $15 to $20, and freights in a similar ratio. This change has been the result of the untrammelled enterprise of our citizens, unaided by donations from the public Treasury. Can it be that Western Representatives, representing a constituency who have often repudiated a system of protection, forget to manifest their abhorrence of this most obnoxious system for the draining of the Treasury, which must, in its practical effects, demand an increase of the tariff to supply an exhausted exchequer? Sir, I cannot, with certainty, picture what would have been the effects of this system of protection which is now sought to be fixed upon the country, in aid of this Collins line, and the various other lines which are now appealing to Congress for aid. If it had been adopted upon our Western waters, I venture the assertion that it would have checked the enterprise of our people, and probably overshadowed the advancement of her great interests. Their is something about this vampire system that is exhausting and destructive.

The mighty West has progressed, as I have attempted briefly to detail, with many obstacles in her track. Her great rivers have been obstructed by rafts and snags. She has asked for appropriations to clean out the great national highways, in order that her surplus might float safely to the sea-board. Whenever such an appeal is made, the very men and interests that are wide awake in this scheme, slumber most profoundly upon this cry of national pride, and national interests. Sir, let us provide first for the safety of our internal commerce, and not be led away from our true policy, by an unmeaning appeal to our national pride. I am willing that the broad ocean shall be open to the fair competition of the world; and whenever the carrying trade can be done cheaper by our nation than another, it will right itself. The loss complained of by this line of steamers may be the result of extravagance or mismanagement; if for either cause, I am not prepared to open the Treasury for relief.

I now call upon Western Representatives to look to Western interests, and point to Western success; and turn a deaf ear to the threatened suggestions which have been, and will be, made by speculators, in behalf of this system of protection. It is known that we are called upon to adopt a system in relation to ocean steamers, that will drain the Treasury of from six to eight millions per annum, an amount far beyond the expenses of the legislative, executive, and judicial departments of the Government. If we vote the amount desired by the Collins line, we fix upon Congress a precedent that will sink the Treasury to the whole extent of the estimate which I have given. Sir, I feel alarmed when I contemplate the practical results of such legislation.

The question was taken, and the amendment to the amendment was disagreed to.

Mr. CLINGMAN. I move the following as an addition to the proviso:

And provided further, That the President be requested to enter into negotiation with the Government of Great Britain and other foreign Governments, with a view of making such regulations as may be necessary to prevent the interference with private enterprise by vessels owned wholly or in part by Government.

It will be perceived by the committee that this is an important amendment. It strikes me that it is right. It has reference to what I alluded to on yesterday, and I hope it will be adopted. It is probable this system will go on, and that it will be adopted by other foreign Governments. The French are now speaking of it, and other foreign Governments will establish lines to compete injuriously with our own private establishments. I therefore think it would be very well for all the Governments in the world to agree that they would let trade and commerce be carried on by private capital, and have an understanding that Government vessels are not to embark in it. I hope the amendment will be adopted.

Mr. FREEMAN. I am opposed to the amendment, and in the few remarks I have to make I desire to call the attention of the committee to a position or two of the gentleman from Virginia, [Mr. BAYLY.] He takes the ground that we have the constitutional right to make this appropriation, under that provision of the Constitution, as I understand him, which provides that Congress shall have power "to regulate commerce with foreign nations." The complete negative of that proposition will be found on the face of the bill itself; and I am astounded the gentleman should have made a point of that character before this committee. There is no provision in this bill "to regulate commerce with foreign nations." It declares only that the Collins line shall be paid a certain sum of money for transporting the mails of the United States. The power of Congress over the mails is not inferential from that of regulating commerce, either foreign or domestic, but is a positive grant to establish post offices and post roads. Let him come forward with his proposition to regulate commerce with foreign nations, and we will then have an opportunity to discuss the question. Sir, was it contended by Mr. Madison and Thomas Jefferson that the power simply to regulate commerce should enable the Congress of the United States to bestow a bounty on a private corporation to the amount of thousands—ay, millions of dollars? And this is what is called regulating commerce with foreign nations! Sir, gentlemen have mistaken the clause of the Constitution under which this appropriation is to be made. It may be found more appropriately in the power "to declare war, grant letters of marque and reprisal, and make rules concerning captures on land and water." It is a war declared against the Treasury of the nation—a war to levy black mail under the pretense of carrying the United States mail—a war upon the people to sustain the Collins line—a corporation which professes to be bankrupt, and now issues its letters of marque and reprisal to force from the people, under color of law, what it pretends to have lost in a voluntary enterprise of its own. But, sir, the power "to make rules concerning captures on land and water" covers the case entirely, [laughter;] and I am surprised that gentlemen known to be familiar with the Constitution should have passed over in silence a power so palpable, so full, and so complete in all its proportions. [Laughter.] This amendment will regulate the capture on land of about eight hundred thousand dollars per annum from the National Treasury, to be spent in riotous living upon the water. The appearance of the magnificent Baltic in the Potomac, and at the very threshold of this House, like another Trojan horse, has taken captive the American Senate, and this House is now rushing into the same ruinous vortex.

I am surprised that any Democrat, and more especially the learned gentleman from Virginia, should assume such a position. Sir, the Virginia resolutions of '98 and '99, had better be repealed, and the names of Madison and Jefferson blotted from the history of the "Old Dominion." We grant Collins & Co. a donation of $800,000 per annum, by way of regulating commerce, and with the condition that they will grant to the United States the privilege of purchasing these ships some day or other, when they may or may not be entirely worn out. Is that regulating commerce?

Mr. BAYLY. I desire to say that I did not put it upon the ground of regulating commerce at all, but the jurisdiction over our navigation.

Mr. FREEMAN. Still worse, sir. In what clause of the Constitution may this jurisdiction over navigation be found? Sir, all the courts of the country, and all the commentators on the Constitution concur in the opinion, that the power of Congress over the foreign or external navigation of the country is derived solely from the power "to regulate commerce with foreign nations." I challenge the learned gentleman from Virginia to produce another clause of the Constitution that gives this body any power whatever over the oceanic navigation of the country. When the gentleman from Virginia [Mr. BAYLY] deserts this position, as he now does, he has no other ground to stand upon. Mr. Story, in his Commentaries on the Constitution, says:

"If commerce does not include navigation, the Government of the Union has no direct power over that subject, and can make no law prescribing what shall constitute American vessels, or requiring that they shall be navigated by American seamen; yet this power has been exercised from the commencement of Government; it has been exercised with the consent of all America; and it has been always understood to be a commercial regulation. The power over navigation, and over commercial intercourse was one of the primary objects for which the people of America adopted their Government; and it is impossible that the Convention should not so have understood the word commerce as embracing it. Indeed, to construe the power so as to impair its efficacy, would defeat the very object for which it was introduced into the Constitution; for there cannot be a doubt that to exclude navigation and intercourse from its scope, would be to entail upon us all the prominent defects of the Confederation, and subject the Union to the ill adjusted systems of rival States, and the oppressive preferences of foreign nations in favor of their own navigation."

The same doctrine is to be found in the opinions of the Supreme Court of the United States, in the case of Gibbins vs. Ogden, 9th Wheaton's Rep., 189 et seq.; 12th Wheaton's Rep., 446; and 1st Tucker's Blackstone's Comm., pp. 247-9. The latter is a Virginia school-book, as familiar among lawyers as is Peter Parley among children.

With this accumulation of evidence, may we not safely conclude that our power over navigation is implied alone from the power to "regulate commerce?" The gentleman from Virginia, [Mr. BAYLY] having abandoned the derivation of his authority from this grant, is left without a fulcrum on which to rest his Archimedean lever, and sinks to a depth which lead and line has never sounded.

Has it, then, come to this, that the Representatives of the nation are to usurp the powers reserved to the States and the people? Are we to take out of the hardy hands of the enterprising sailors and the commercial men of the country that for which they have been toiling for years under the pretense that we have the sole and unlimited jurisdiction over navigation? I am astonished that the gentleman from Virginia especially should have undertaken to base his argument upon anything of this kind. The argument of the gentleman from New York [Mr. DEAN] is much more plausible, and it is not alone found in the preamble of the Constitution, as supposed by the gentleman from Virginia, [Mr. BAYLY], but also in the eighth section, viz: "to lay and collect taxes, duties, imposts, and excises; to pay the debts and provide for the common defense and general welfare of the United States." There the power is to be found, if anywhere; and who would dream of providing for the common defense and general welfare by a donation to E. K. Collins & Co. of $800,000 per annum for running a steamship line from New York to Liverpool? By what power of compression has twenty-six millions of people been concentrated in the colossal statues of E. K. Collins & Co.? What has become of the United States of North America? Are the latter a mere synonym for a steamship corporation? What, sir, has become of that provision of the Constitution which declares that "no preference shall be given by any regulation of commerce or revenue to the ports of one State over those of another?" The Collins line is to run alone from the port of New York. What becomes of all the ports of all the other States that line the Atlantic and Pacific States from Maine to California, and thence to Oregon? Is the port of New York, already the most favored in the country, to be the sole recipient of this extraordinary bounty? Sir, if such is to be the construction of the Constitution by Democrats, and more especially by the Democracy of Virginia, they had better expunge from their platform of principles the Kentucky and Virginia resolutions of '98—raze out the State-Rights doctrines taught by Jefferson and Madison, and supply the extraordinary "deficiency" thus created by the life and writings of Alexander Hamilton.

The question was then taken on the amendment of Mr. CLINGMAN, and it was disagreed to.

Mr. POLK. I move to strike out "six" and insert "four."

I consider that it is proper I should make an explanation. On yesterday, in a five minutes speech, I referred to Commodore Skinner as to his experience with regard to steam-vessels. I did not mean to reflect upon him at all as an officer, and as a man having full and entire information upon the subject. I say this, with the view that my remarks may not go out to the country as involving a reflection upon him.

I consider that the question now to be decided by this House is as between America and England.

I consider that, in this matter, the American Congress is called to act upon a question which, according to its determination, will affect favorably or unfavorably the interests of America. In its decision will not the American Congress stand up imbued with that spirit of patriotism which should animate every American bosom, and determine the question to the advantage of his own country? Will you give this contract to England? Are you Americans, and yet not act as become Americans when the issue is fairly made up? Washington said that none but Americans should stand guard at our outposts; and I say to-day that none but Americans should stand guard for this bill. English lobbyists should be spurned from your Halls. Will you, in the decision of this matter, pander to England and to English pride? Will you lose sight of your patriotism in casting a vote on this question? I am speaking facts that will tell upon the minds of the people. I am telling you what the public opinion will be when concentrated upon this question. Are you British or American? You are Americans, the gentleman from Virginia [Mr. MEADE] says, under restraint; and yet you are willing, in a contest for ascendancy between America and England, to compromise and break down American character—American interests—for the sake of a few dollars from your public Treasury to pay for a service to be performed. I scorn and despise that principle of economy which, to save a few dollars, would strike down American interests and pride in the face of the foe. I am willing, for the sake of progress, to vote a hundred millions of dollars to-day for the protection of the commerce of the country. We can battle any foe that will land upon our coast, and we can whip any force that the combined forces of continental Europe may send against us.

England, like Venice, has been the mistress of the seas; but America, if you prove true to her, must, in the progress of events, take her place among the nations of the world. But an American Congress, in view of progress of this character, halts and falters because a dollar may be expended. You do not, by your opposition, reflect the opinion of the people; you do not, in this Hall, exemplify by your action the noble impulses which actuate the American people. America must take the rod of Neptune. She is bound to assume the command of the seas. Will an American Legislature prove recreant to American interests, and refuse to lend its support to the Collins line—the evidence itself of the great triumph of American industry and character? To see an American fail to sustain it, is shameful in the extreme.

The policy of England is, to cripple the Collins line. Why? Because she desires to restore to herself the monopoly which she had, by means of her steam mercantile marine, before the energetic competition waged by the Collins line. She made by the monopoly, from 1841 to 1846, $7,836,800 in gross, for mail matter, and $5,286,800 net, besides a receipt from passage money. To sustain this monopoly, England has since increased her compensation to the Cunard line, to enable that line to reduce the price of freight and passage money. The reduction has been made. The Collins line, consequently, has been running at a loss of $17,000 per trip.

Through the means of the steam mercantile marine, England expects to increase her overshadowing military marine. The navy of England consists of 667 vessels, and that of France consists of 328. The expense of the British navy in 1850, was $34,000,000—

The question was taken, and the amendment to the amendment was disagreed to.

Mr. NABERS. At the expiration of the five minutes I occupied a little while ago, I was about to observe that we had no right to make the discrimination proposed by this amendment. Collins & Co. have been employed in carrying the mails of the United States between New York and Liverpool. They have made rather a hard bargain, as many mail contractors on land have done. When an individual engages to carry the United States mail by land, and finds that his compensation is not sufficient, and is obliged to forfeit his contract, what course is pursued towards him? Why, sir, the contract is let out again, and of course at a higher rate, and suit is promptly brought against the original contractor for the difference in the bids. Some of my constituents have made unfortunate mail contracts, which they were obliged to abandon, and another bidder took them at a higher price. Under the direction of the Postmaster General a suit was brought against the defaulting contractors upon their official bond, and after laboring for the last six months I have succeeded in compromising the matter, and releasing my constituents from their contract by paying the sum of $200 and upwards. Now, I claim for my constituents indemnity for the past, for that is what is proposed to be done for Collins & Co. by this amendment.

Not only do you propose to give Collins & Co. indemnity for the past, but security for the future, by increasing their annual pay from $385,000 to $800,000. Collins & Co. have engaged to carry the mail between New York and Liverpool for—as I before stated—$385,000 per annum. They have made a bad bargain, and now, instead of allowing them, as you do mail contractors upon land, to forfeit their contract, and bring a suit against them upon their official bond for the difference if another company takes it, they come here and ask for more money to indemnify them for the bad bargain which they have made, and convert it into a profitable job. Sir, I protest against it, unless you mean to deal alike with all. The question is asked by the gentleman from Tennessee, [Mr. POLK,] are you British or American? There are none but American pulsations about my heart, sir; but I deny that E. K. Collins & Co. constitute America. [Laughter.] They are a company of gentlemen wishing to grow rich upon the Treasury of the United States. The gentleman seems to be in love with British policy,—and what is the result of that policy? It has filled the realm of Great Britain with palaces upon one side and hovels upon the other. That is what it has done. It has built up an aristocracy of wealth, on all sides surrounded by poverty of the most revolting description. Shall we follow that example? No. I desire to place E. K. Collins, and every one else, upon the same footing. That is what I desire to do; and if E. K. Collins & Co. have made a bad bargain—and they say they have—let them come here and ask to be released from a hard contract, and I will vote to release them and let out the contract to other parties; and if we have to pay more than $385,000 per annum for carrying the mail between New York and Liverpool—which we certainly will not—I will not urge that Collins & Co. shall pay the difference, though that is the rule in other cases.

But our patriotic feelings are appealed to again and again, and one would think that we were celebrating the fourth of July, to hear the speeches of the gentlemen. [Laughter.] I have no doubt of the patriotism of E. K. Collins & Co. For the purpose of competing with the Cunard line, I have no doubt that they are willing to sacrifice all they have; and go down unwept, unhonored and unsung, merely for the purpose of—FILLING THEIR POCKETS!

[Here the hammer fell.]

Mr. POLK. I withdraw my amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. It requires the unanimous consent of the committee to be given.

[Cries of "I object!" "I object!"]

The question was then taken upon Mr. POLK's amendment, and it was not agreed to.

Mr. BELL. I propose to strike out in the fifteenth line the words "giving six months notice."

I should not detain the committee at this time, was it not for the fact that one of my colleagues [Mr. STANTON] has made an able address to this committee under the hour rule, in opposition to the Senate amendment; and as his speech, of course, will be circulated through the State which I have the honor in part to represent, I desire to explain my position in regard to this subject. I am in favor of this amendment of the Senate. I shall vote for it because I believe it is a national question. From all I can learn, I understand that the appropriation was first made for the purpose of promoting commerce and increasing our marine. I understand, also, that it becomes necessary for Congress to interpose in this matter, and afford aid from the National Treasury, not because our vessels cannot compete with those of Great Britain, but because the money of Great Britain was poured out profusely for the purpose of protecting her commerce in aiding the Cunard line, and monopolizing our trade. It is a well-established fact, that Collins & Co. have built better vessels, and have complied with their part of the contract faithfully and honestly, and so far as they are connected with the postal arrangements, they have maintained the honor and integrity of the Government. I derive, also, the information from the reports upon this subject and other admitted facts, that before the establishment of the American line of steamers, the English line charged £7 10s. per ton for freight. After the establishment of the American line, the price on freight was reduced to £4 per ton. This reduction accrues to the benefit of our own commerce, and our own citizens. It now appears that the Collins line of steamers cannot compete with the English line, because the English Government has granted further aid to her own line. The question is now reduced to this: will you surrender these benefits, will you consent to have the price of freight increased to what it formerly was? Will you place yourselves under the necessity of having your mails transported under the British flag or the flag of any other country? These are questions we are called upon to decide by our votes on the proposition before the committee. But, Mr. Chairman, I am free to declare, for one member, that when these questions are presented, and when we are reduced to the alternative of deciding in regard to this subject, I would double the amount of compensation, if necessary, until our Government mails and American commerce, under our own flag, by our own resources, should be maintained and protected on the ocean. One word in reply to my honorable friend from Maryland, [Mr. EVANS,] who, in his remarks in reply to one of my colleagues from Ohio, [Mr. STANTON,] on a former occasion, spoke about the bounties of the General Government to the State of Ohio.

Sir, we never enjoyed the bounties of the General Government. We never asked or received enormous grants of land which the member said the General Government had given us. It is true we had five hundred thousand acres of land granted to aid us in making our canals and paying our canal debt; and also forty-nine sections to aid in making a road from Sandusky to Columbus. These were the grants for internal improvements. Some alternate sections were also granted for extending our Miami canal from Dayton to Lake Erie. But we were compelled, as a part of the grant, to make said canal within a limited time, and let the mails be carried free of tolls on said road. The Government sold its other lands for more than twice the minimum price. So that she was the gainer by the grant. The General Government has sold cash sales, in Ohio, 12,616,900 acres, average price $1 60 per acre. . . . $20,853,699
Appropriated for military purposes, grants to individuals and companies, and which the Government realized, 10,446,000 acres at $1 25 per acre. . . . 13,057,509

The General Government, sir, has taken from the State of Ohio, on account of her lands, near $34,000,000. Ohio has never applied for bounties and she never will.

By the ordinance of 1787, you gave her the privilege of enjoying that boon which was worth more to her than if you had granted her every foot of land within her territory. I mean, Mr. Chairman, that clause in the ordinance which forever prohibited slavery in the territory northwest of the Ohio river. That, sir, with the industry and enterprise of her citizens, is the secret of her rapid growth and continued prosperity.

[Here the hammer fell.]

Mr. EDGERTON. I propose, in the few remarks which I shall make, to examine the positions taken by the gentleman from New York, [Mr. DEAN.] It is true that I am not indorsed for legal acumen by Livingston's Law Magazine, as is the distinguished gentleman; and yet, sir, I pretend as a Democrat to have some idea of our constitutional rights and powers. The gentleman asserts that Congress is authorized to make this appropriation under the following clause of the Constitution:

"The Congress shall have power to lay and collect taxes, duties, imposts, and excises; to pay the debts and provide for the common defense and general welfare of the United States."

Now, sir, the gentleman says he is a Democrat.

Is he aware what the Democratic doctrine is in relation to this very clause of the Constitution? Has he ever read what the founder of the Democratic party said in relation to this very clause? If the gentleman has, he has failed to discover what Democratic doctrine is, as much as did the gentleman four years ago. Here, sir, is what the founder of the Democratic party says in relation to this very clause of the Constitution: To lay taxes, is the power, and the general welfare the purpose for which that power is to be exercised. Congress is not ad libitum to lay taxes for any purpose they please, but only to pay the debts and provide for the general welfare of the Union. They are not to do anything they please—to vote appropriations for the Collins line, for instance—for the general welfare, but only to lay taxes for that purpose. That is the Democratic doctrine. We cannot legislate here for the general welfare of the country, unless we lay taxes for the purpose. Does the gentleman propose by this bill to lay taxes for the purpose of providing for the general welfare? No, he proposes to distribute money to Collins & Co., and calls that providing for the general welfare.

But, sir, the gentleman from Tennessee, [Mr. POLK,] and some other gentlemen here, place their support of this appropriation upon a national ground entirely. Sir, I much mistake the mission of this country; I mistake much of its national glory and character, if it be to sustain individual enterprise. It is true, the glory of the nation is individual success; but this we have no power, by the National Treasury, to encourage or restrict. The national character and glory of this country consists in this Congress protecting the rights and independence of the States, and restricting the exercise of powers not granted by the Constitution. In that consists our national glory, and in nothing else. The gentleman from Tennessee says that he would "put Americans on guard." Sir, when I see this Congress surrounded by a corps of sappers and miners upon the Treasury, many of whom are now within the sound of my voice—worms living upon the powers they corrupt and destroy—I would put Americans upon guard; here, in this Hall, I would say to them, the American Congress should protect the rights of the States, the rights of the whole country, and not promote the interests of a few sappers and miners on the Treasury. We have no fear for our national superiority from abroad. The first blow will be struck here in this Hall, and by the exercise of powers not delegated to us. As against all the world, the very genius of our people will make us victorious. But what shall protect us against ourselves? against the corrupting influences of a power more concentrated, and in every other country but this, stronger than the power of liberty itself—the power of money? Nothing but a strict construction of the Constitution—But a careful watchfulness on the part of the States that their rights and powers are not usurped by this Congress. A slight departure for national glory, for instance, to-day, becomes a precedent for to-morrow; and thus, violations of the compact by the sanctions of law, have the semblance of constitutional right, and must, ultimately, operate to the destruction of the spirit and intent of the Constitution and the Union itself. It is here I would put none but Americans on guard to-day.

The question was then taken on the amendment to the amendment, and it was disagreed to.

Mr. ROBINSON moved to amend the proviso by striking out "six months," and inserting "eight months," instead thereof.

Mr. R. said: Mr. Chairman, it was very far from my purpose to have said a single word in reference to this subject. In truth, I took so little interest in this matter that I had not even made up my mind as to how I should vote upon it. But since I have listened to the discussion in this House, and witnessed such a new-born zeal for a new creed that is attempted to be interpolated into the Democratic platform, without any authority, and by gentlemen who are not sachems in our party, I have thought proper to say a word, if for no other purpose, to defend those who have voted for it. To have listened to the gentlemen who have indulged in terms of such round denunciation of those who support this measure, and denounce it in such unmeasured terms as anti-democratic, one would have supposed that it first got into the legislation of the country by virtue of the action of a Federal Congress, approved by a Federal President. I have had the curiosity to look back into this matter. I find that it was recommended some three or four times by President Polk, who is acknowledged to have been the model Democratic President. I find that the Collins line and the Sloc line both were authorized by the Twenty-ninth Congress—a Congress with about sixty Democratic majority in this House, and a proportionate majority in the other.

Mr. McMULLIN. How did the Democrats vote?

Mr. ROBINSON. They voted for them unanimously, without one solitary "no," in either House. That Twenty-ninth Congress, composed of as good Democrats as ever made tracks in Washington city, passed a law authorizing these lines, and it is an absolute fact that there was so little opposition to the measures in the Senate or the House that it passed nem. con. There were not enough of these orthodox Democrats here, then, even to call the yeas and nays. I find that afterwards, at the beginning of the Thirtieth Congress, Mr. Polk came forward, and in his message congratulated the country on the enactment of the law authorizing them.

Mr. McMULLIN. How do you know it passed unanimously?

Mr. ROBINSON. There were no yeas and nays called upon the question; and the gentleman knows that it is a parliamentary law that every man is presumed to have voted in the affirmative when there is no division on a question. And in this case there was not even a call by a single member for a division, much less yeas and nays. President Polk in his annual message, at the commencement of the Thirtieth Congress, says:

"While other maritime powers are adding to their navies large numbers of war steamers, it was a wise policy on our part to make similar additions to our navy. The four war steamers authorized by the act of the third of March, 1847, are in course of construction.

"In addition to the four war steamers authorized by this act, the Secretary of the Navy has, in pursuance of its provisions, entered into contracts for the construction of five steamers, to be employed in the transportation of the United States mail 'from New York to New Orleans, touching at Charleston, Savannah, and Havana, and from Havana to Chagres'; for three steamers to be employed in like manner from Panama to Oregon, 'so as to connect with the mail from Havana to Chagres across the Isthmus'; and for five steamers to be employed in like manner from New York to Liverpool. These steamers will be the property of the contractors, but are to be built under the superintendence and direction of a naval constructor in the employ of the Navy Department, and to be so constructed as to render them convertible at the least possible expense into war steamers of the same number of naval officers, as well as a Post Office agent, are to be on board of them, and authority is reserved to the Navy Department at all time to 'exercise control over said steamships,' and to 'have the right' 'to take them for the exclusive use and service of the United States,' 'upon making proper compensation to the contractors therefor.'

"Whilst these steamships will be employed in transporting the mails of the United States coastwise, and to foreign countries, upon an annual compensation to be paid to the owners, they will be always ready, upon an emergency requiring it, to be converted into war steamers; and the right reserved to take them for public use, will add greatly to the efficiency and strength of this description of our naval force. To the steamers thus authorized under contracts made by the Secretary of the Navy, should be added five other steamers, authorized under contracts made in pursuance of law by the Postmaster General, making an addition, in the whole, of eighteen war steamers, subject to be taken for public use. As further contracts for the transportation of the mail to foreign countries may be authorized by Congress, this number may be enlarged indefinitely.

"The enlightened policy by which a rapid communication of the various distant parts of the globe is established, by means of American-built sea steamers, would find an ample reward in the increase of our commerce, and in making our country and its resources more favorably known abroad; but the national advantage is still greater, of having our naval officers made familiar with steam navigation; and of having the privilege of taking the ships already equipped for immediate service at a moment's notice; and will be cheaply purchased by the compensation to be paid for the transportation of the mail in them over and above the postage received.

"A just national pride, no less than our commercial interests, would seem to favor the policy of augmenting the number of this description of vessels. They can be built in our country cheaper and in greater numbers than in any other in the world."

You will observe, Mr. Chairman, that the point which has been made against this measure here is, that it is a discrimination in favor of the owners of this line. Well, if it is a discrimination to increase the compensation of the Collins line now, it was no less a discrimination to grant them compensation then. The principle was as much violated then, in allowing any compensation, as it will be now to increase it.

But I do not propose to go further into the discussion of this matter. I have no time. I wish I had. I have examined the record, to see how this appropriation passed at the other end of the Capitol at the present session, and I find that some of the most distinguished Democrats of the nation voted for it—amongst them one who went into the Baltimore Convention with a large plurality of the delegates there representing the Democratic party in his favor for the Presidency of the United States, and a second who got nearly as many votes in that Convention.

Mr. BAYLY, of Virginia. My friend from Mississippi [Mr. FREEMAN] seemed to be very much scandalized at my defending the power of Congress to pass this appropriation. Sir, in five minutes none of us can go into an elaborate discussion upon such a point; but I now throw down the gauntlet to my able and learned friend from Mississippi, and tell him that if he has any wish to test this question in a debate upon this floor, and if, when we get into the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union at any time, he will give me an hour's notice, I will be prepared to meet him. And this, sir, is a bold proposition; for I know the ability of my friend.

Mr. FREEMAN. I accept the challenge with pleasure.

Mr. BAYLY. Sir, the gentleman seems to think I am desecrating the names of Jefferson and Madison, when I quoted their own language. I will nevertheless quote another paragraph, and I wish I could quote this whole report of Jefferson. Immediately succeeding the paragraph I read from Mr. Jefferson's report in my first remarks, he continues:

"OUR NAVIGATION involves still higher considerations. As a branch of industry, it is valuable; BUT AS A RESOURCE OF DEFENSE, ESSENTIAL. But it is as a resource of defense that our navigation will admit neither neglect nor forbearance. The position and circumstances of the United States leave them nothing to fear on their land board, and nothing to desire beyond their present rights. But on the sea-board they are open to injury; and they have there, too, a commerce which must be protected. This can only be done by possessing a respectable body of citizens, seamen, and of artists, and establishments in readiness for ship-building.

"Were the ocean, which is the common property of all, open to the industry of all, so that every person and vessel should be free to take employment wherever it could be found, the United States would certainly not set the example of appropriating to themselves, exclusively, any portion of the common stock of occupation. They would rely on the enterprise and activity of their citizens for a due participation of the benefits of the seafaring business, and for keeping the marine class of citizens equal to their objects. But if particular nations grasp at undue shores, and, more especially, if they seize on the means of the United States" (to carry our mails, for instance, and monopolize the postage), "to convert them for aliment of their own strength, and withdraw them entirely from the support of those to whom they belong, defensive and protective measures become necessary on the part of the nation whose marine resources are thus invaded; or it will be disarmed of its defense; its productions will lie at the mercy of the nation which has possessed itself exclusively of the means of carrying them; and its politics may be influenced by those who command its commerce.

"The carriage of our commodities, if once established in another channel, cannot be resumed in the moment we may desire. If we lose the seamen and artisans, whom it now occupies, we lose the present means of marine defense, and time will be requisite to raise up others, when disgrace or losses shall bring to our feelings the error of having abandoned them. The material of maintaining our due share of navigation answers in abundance; and as to the mode of using them, we have only to adopt the principles of those who put us on the defensive; or others equivalent or better fitted to our circumstances."

Gentlemen talk about my not occupying Republican ground. Sir, there are a great many gentlemen in these days who profess to be learned in republican doctrines, who have never studied them. I do not apply this to my friend from Mississippi, for I know he stands in a different category. In 1794, it was the Republicans who took and sustained the ground I now occupy.

The Federalists then resisted it vehemently, and they were denounced as catering to British interests in doing it; but the Republicans prevailed, and the result of their success was, that so far from Great Britain possessing a monopoly of the seas, as she was in a fair way to do in 1794, we now outnumber her in our commercial marine. All this has been the result of Democratic policy. I am but standing here to defend the doctrines of Jefferson, and Madison, and the whole Republican party who followed them.

Sir, I wish to give an illustration of this matter. Take the case of our lakes. By treaty with Great Britain, it is provided that neither party shall keep, in time of peace, men-of-war upon the lakes. The object of that provision was to give the two nations, on the breaking out of war, a fair start upon the lakes. But suppose the British Government was, by giving bounties to their ships on the lakes, to give them such an advantage as to drive our shipping entirely off; would not that be a virtual violation of the treaty, and will any man say, that in a case of that sort, the United States ought to stand by quietly and see the British Government, by giving bounties to their ships, drive ours from those inland seas? Sir, there is no part of the country more interested in this question than the Northwest, except my own. We are more exposed, being on the sea-shore, and more interested.

[Here he hammered fell.]

The question was then taken on the amendment offered by Mr. ROBINSON, and it was not agreed to.

Mr. BOWIE. I propose to extend the time of notice from six to twelve months.

The CHAIRMAN. That amendment has already been proposed.

Mr. BOWIE. Then I propose to extend it to eighteen months.

The CHAIRMAN. That amendment is in order.

Mr. BOWIE. When reason ceases to point distinctly the course of action, instinct or feeling steps in to supply its place. In the present conflict of opinion with regard to the Collins line, the equipoise of argument is decided by national pride. The national feeling on this subject has been lately significantly expressed. You remember, Mr. Chairman, the profound grief which pervaded the country when that noble steamer, the Atlantic, was supposed to have been buried in the ocean, whose name she bore. Was it the value of the costly freight she carried, or the loss of the many lives involved, or national mortification at the presumed failure of American skill and American seamanship, that excited such sorrow? It was not the wealth of the cargo, or the sundered ties of nature and friendship, or the pangs of private grief; but deep, national humiliation, which overshadowed us. If such was the consequence of the imagined loss of one ship, what will be the sensation when our constituents are told, not one, but the whole line, has been swept from the seas, not by storm or tempest, but by our own hands. Sir, our constituents will not be satisfied.

Considerations of economy, equality of privileges, and individual enterprise, all fade before the prestige of American triumph in competition with Great Britain. Monopolies are odious; yet there is a monopoly so glorious, as to lose its odium in its luster—the monopoly of genius, nautical enterprise, and naval renown. For this we are now struggling with the queen of the seas. It is this which has made her flag the oriflamme of victory, and its folds more welcome as a winding-sheet to her dying seamen, than the bridal couch to the living.

I long to see this monopoly taken up. Accomplish this, and we remove the chief competition our merchants have to fear. Domestic monopolies can be regulated by law; foreign monopolies must be destroyed.

There is a class of statesmen so rigidly just, so magnanimously impartial, they would rather the steam marine should sink under what they call fair competition with British steamers, than swim under the auspices of the Government. I have not attained that enviable elevation of sentiment. They remind one of the woodman's wife, who, finding her husband engaged with a bear, drove off the dogs that came to his rescue, and insisted upon a fair fight, regardless of consequences. The American steamers have not only the bear, but the bulls, to contend with, and when the eagle would spread her wing to protect them, their friends drive her off, and insist they shall fight the whole field single-handed.

I adopt the trite maxim: Our country: may she always be right—but our country right or wrong. It may not be morally correct, yet, in the midst of conflicting theories, it is politically safe.

Merchants who pay seven per cent. for capital, and two dollars for labor, cannot compete with those who get capital for two per cent. and labor at fifty per cent. less, with Government bounties besides. Much has been said about protection of one interest to the exclusion of others, and equality of commercial privileges. I hold it to be the duty of our Government to protect American navigation and commerce against foreign competition. These complaints do not proceed from the Representatives of the mercantile classes. They know the power to regulate commerce with foreign nations is one of the primary duties of the Federal Legislature, and whatever is necessary to secure the end is within the terms of the grant. I do not find the Representatives of the great commercial marts opposing this appropriation. They know the interests of their constituents, and knowing, dare maintain them. It is to be presumed from their silence that they approve.

Mr. MARSHALL, of Kentucky. I am opposed to the extension of the time of the notice, as asked for by the gentleman from Maryland, [Mr. BOWIE,] yet I am in favor of the line, and intend to vote for the amendment proposed by the Senate.

I desire, within the space of five minutes, to give succinctly the reasons which operate to bring me to that conclusion. I find that, upon the other side of the House, the objection to the passage of this proposition rests upon a constitutional question. I find the power to make this appropriation in the express grant of the Constitution "to provide and maintain a Navy." In the exercise of that power, I understand this Government has the right to use any modification of the power that may be beneficial. Gentlemen might as well talk to me about my right to have and maintain a carriage, and yet say that I have not the right to hire it as a hack until I want the use of it myself, as to tell me we have a right to provide and maintain a Navy, and yet have not a right to exercise the power under the modification, which invites private enterprise to build vessels suitable for war purposes, upon an agreement that the Government will employ them in transporting the mails over the ocean, yet with the express power to put such vessels into commission as war steamers whenever the Government may think proper to do so. Again, there is a source of power, under the clause, saying Congress may establish post offices and post roads. If you have the right, under the Constitution, to take charge of the postal communications; if you have the right to pay out $20,000 to send mails from here to Liverpool—the right to repeat that as often as you have postage communications to make—why have you not the right to make continuing contracts, from year to year, with one vessel or three vessels to perform the service? This is my answer to the constitutional objection.

But, sir, I shall vote for this proposition upon another ground. In naval science a few years has made a great change. The element of steam has been introduced into ocean navigation; and if we are to talk about an American Navy at all, we must talk about an American steam navy. I will sustain this line, if for no other purpose, as a nursery for American engineers and naval officers, in which they may become acquainted with this new element—steam—which now has become an instrument of power, by which our naval renown alone can be maintained, and which, therefore, should be familiar to gentlemen of the naval profession. But I sustain it for yet another reason. Experience has shown to this country that when steam was introduced into ocean navigation the carrying trade, so far as passengers and the finer fabrics are concerned, was transferred at once from sailing to steam vessels, and by its introduction it became necessary for the packet lines, which ran from American ports, and which had successfully competed with the British lines, to give up all connection with the carrying trade, so far as passengers and fine fabrics were concerned. In order to compete with the British we were required to adopt the new element, and therefore it became a matter of necessity to our Government. During Mr. Polk's administration, Government invited, or at once acceded, to a proposition to construct and set afloat vessels, under the guidance of private enterprise, but manned, to some extent, by American naval officers, with the view to enter into this competition with England. The effect has been to give us the supremacy as steamers on the ocean. Our vessels are superior in power, swiftness, elegance, model, and capacity for war purposes. We have regained our position as carriers. I see no consequence to flow, no effect to arise from a withdrawal of this line, except to transfer at once into the hands of our competitors all the advantages which have been gained from our experiments heretofore in steam as applied to ocean navigation, and to subject the people of this country to burdens from which their energy has just liberated them—I mean the burden of sustaining the steam lines of Great Britain by just such contributions as English cupidity may think it politic to extort.

Mr. BOWIE. I withdraw my amendment, if there is no objection.

No objection being made the amendment was withdrawn.

Mr. SUTHERLAND. I move to amend, by striking out the word "Congress" and inserting "Postmaster General," so that the Postmaster General shall give the notice, instead of Congress.

The honorable gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. MARSHALL] has said nearly all I intended to say upon this subject. I have been utterly astonished to witness the manner in which the constitutional question has been brought into this discussion. I wanted to ask the gentlemen who have been arguing against the constitutionality of this amendment, where they get the power of this Government to build war steamers for the Navy. I would ask the gentleman from Ohio, [Mr. ENDERSON,] if this amendment was to appropriate $1,000,000 to build a steamer for the Navy, if it would not be constitutional?

Now, sir, one word more. More than four months ago, in looking over this matter, before I knew Mr. Collins, and before I visited the Baltic, and before there was any heat or discussion upon this subject, I made a memorandum of some of the reasons which would induce me to vote for this appropriation. They were simply these, and I will state them: In the first place, Congress not only has the power, but it is its solemn duty, to provide for the common defense. The policy of this nation is defensive; war is to be kept at a distance. Fortifications are expensive and entirely out of the question for this purpose, except at the principal ports, such as Boston, Newport, New York, &c. The minor ports, such as New Bedford, Newbern, Savannah, Mobile, &c., are to be protected either by military or naval forces. Fortifications would be too expensive. Steam vessels are more efficient than sailing vessels, as being more readily concentrated at any point threatened. Since the introduction of steam, ten steam-vessels are worth more than one hundred sailing-vessels, to maintain and provide for the common defense. To constitute a war steam marine, sufficient to guard the whole coast from Cape Florida to New Brunswick, would require one hundred war steamers. What is the most economical way of providing this force?

In peace, about ten steamers will be required for ordinary service. If the residue are provided by the Government, they must be laid up in ordinary. If not provided, the loss in lives and property, by an active enemy, during the first six months of a war, would teach a fearful lesson as to the folly of not preparing in peace for the exigencies of war. What then would be the cost of providing such a steam marine? Taking the past as a guide, we cannot safely estimate the cost at less than $1,000,000 for each vessel. The interest of this sum, for ninety vessels, would be $5,400,000. The expense of taking care of them cannot be estimated at less than $1,000,000 annually, and the annual decay and depreciation at less than $5,000,000. The annual expense, therefore, of providing and maintaining such a steam marine as would be adequate to the complete protection of the coast, may be fairly estimated at $12,000,000.

Now, sir, by extending the aid of the Government to establishing ocean steamers of sufficient strength and capacity, a steam marine is kept up at an annual expenditure of one fifth that amount. The first outlay is saved, until the actual breaking out of a naval war. Why, sir, the whole policy of the original contract was to provide for the common defense, by building up a steam marine in this way, because it is cheaper and equally efficient.

The gentleman from Mississippi [Mr. NABERS] sarcastically exclaims, "that the Government has the privilege of taking these vessels by paying for them." I ask him if that is not a privilege, by saving us the hundred million of dollars which we would have to expend, if we should build a hundred war steamers? The Government can take these steamers at any time. I ask whether this is not the true policy of the Government, and whether it is not the better policy?

Would gentlemen raise any question of constitutionality; would they raise any question of expediency, even, were this a bill to provide for building ten war steamers? By supporting this line, by giving it aid, we are encouraging a system which will, in the end, place at our disposal a marine force which will enable us to do away, in some measure, with the enormous expenses of the Navy. Gentlemen do not complain at seeing steamers lying under cover, and rotting, which have cost $1,000,000 each, and which cost us $26,000 each yearly to keep them there, and doing no good to any human being. It seems to me that Great Britain, when she adopted this course, to make a navy useful in time of peace, developed a great idea of the age. Instead of suffering a great amount of property and immense capital to lie idle and rot at her wharves, she makes it useful to her citizens by employing it in commerce.

Mr. INGERSOLL said that he should vote for the appropriation for the Collins line, and did not, with the lights now before him, see any constitutional difficulties in the way. The powers conferred on Congress by the Constitution to regulate commerce, authorized us to place the commercial marine of the country on a footing that would enable it to compete successfully with that of any other nation. Our foreign navigation by means of steamers, especially in the direct communication with Europe, had to struggle not only against individual enterprise, but against the Treasury, lavishly expended, of the British Government. Unless our own citizens are nerved in their laudable enterprise by the aid of their own Government, it is clear that they must, in this instance, retire from the contest. He also thought that the powers conferred on Congress by the Constitution to provide a navy, enabled us to aid these steamers, that could be at any time hereafter turned into ships-of-war, should occasion require it. Why not do this under that clause of the Constitution, as well as to provide materials to be kept till wanted for ship-building in our navy-yards? In both instances they are but materials provided for the naval service. He thought, too, that the former action of Congress had in a measure committed us to the needed appropriation.

Had he been a member of Congress when the original contract was assented to by this body, he might not at that time have gone for it; but the contract for service had been entered into; it will continue till the year 1854, and he could not now consent to abandon this, the pioneer line of our country, and thus gratify our foreign rivals, who are looking to the result of our proceedings on this subject with intense interest. He believed that the feeling he expressed was general, especially throughout the Atlantic sea-board, and that the majority of the people of the district he represented participated in it. He alluded to the opinion of Moses H. Grinnell, formerly a Representative in Congress from New York, who, although largely interested in navigation otherwise than by steam, and whose interests might therefore be supposed to be adverse to the Collins line, but who had nevertheless distinctly declared that this appropriation would not interfere with the other navigating interests of the country; for he said that if the Collins line were withdrawn from the ocean, the passengers, freight, and correspondence now accommodated by it, would not fall back upon our own sailing ships, but would be at once transferred to the Cunard, or British line.

The question was then taken upon the amendment of Mr. SUTHERLAND to the amendment, and it was disagreed to.

Mr. SAVAGE. I move to strike out all after the word "provided," and to insert the following:

That the additional allowance given by this act shall terminate on the 31st day of December, 1854.

Mr. STANTON, of Tennessee. I inquire whether that amendment be in order?

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair thinks the amendment is in order.

Mr. SAVAGE. It is not my object, on the present occasion, to go into a detailed consideration of the many arguments which, I think, might well be made against the policy of the original establishment of these lines. That question has been heretofore settled, and these lines have been established. Notwithstanding all we have heard said about patriotism, and the rivalry of Great Britain, I can only look at this as a contract between us and another party, and I can only regard E. K. Collins as a mail carrier. That we have a right to make a mail contract, I have no doubt; and that it is our duty to make a good contract—a good bargain, I am equally well satisfied. The amendment which I have proposed, in part, provides for that which the bill seems to secure—that is, the fixing of a time for the termination of the extra compensation proposed to be given by this bill. My amendment fixes the 31st of December, 1854. Those advocating the bill, I suppose, would not dare to propose that the extra allowance be perpetual; and yet every man here who knows anything of the legislative proceedings of Congress, knows that the passage of this bill would be to secure this extra allowance to these parties forever! There is no power to repeal it hereafter, and if the friends of the measure are acting in good faith, they can have no objection to my amendment. If it be intended to give protection to this line of steamers only for a short time, why not say so? No, sir, the object is to fasten this incumbrance upon the country now and forever! Now, there may have been in times past—and I do not intend to discuss this question now, for it has been heretofore discussed often—a period in our history when it was necessary to give temporary protection to a feeble domestic industry, that it might be sustained. That might have been wise policy, but we are now called upon to act upon the general principle of protection to a particular interest, now struggling in competition with a foreign Power. It is to encourage one branch of our Navy in competition with a third. In times past, we remember our manufactures had to be encouraged to the entire destruction of the commercial marine. Trade was cut off by tariff revenues, which bore oppressively upon our commercial marine. Now, to-day the scheme is to be reversed, and the power of Congress is to be involved to sustain the marine, at the expense of all the other interests of the country. This policy attempted to be ingrafted on the bill, might have been a good one from the necessities of the times heretofore; but I deny that there is any reason for its continuance. It is evident that both parties to the original contract have been disappointed. The Administration recommended this policy to the country, under the supposition that E. K. Collins and his associates could do what they proposed to accomplish, for the sum proposed to be given them. A future increase of proceeds of the Post Office Department, was held out as an inducement to the Government to enter into this contract. The pay which was to be given by the Government, and money received from passengers, it was alleged by the parties who undertook to establish this line, was ample remuneration for their services. Why is it not so? I have not the evidence before me, but I am satisfied that mismanagement and extravagance have caused the results detailed to us to-day.

Mr. SACKETT. I am opposed to the amendment, but in favor of the Senate amendment, as it now stands before the committee. I regard this question as involving, first, the kind of navy this Government ought to maintain; next, the mode and manner of maintaining that navy. First, is it wise to seek to maintain a steam navy? Next, is the mode and manner presented the best to enable us to maintain that navy, for all practical purposes, and is it cheaper and more economical than to maintain the same kind of navy independently of all private connection? I think there is no longer any doubt on these questions. I think the introduction of this new system of maintaining one of the necessary powers of the Government is a vast improvement upon the old. I can see many practical reasons why it is so. There is no reason why ships constructed in this navy should not be as valuable as others, or why they should not be equal to the emergencies of war, the purpose for which they were substantially built. There is no necessary reason why they are not as good as though they were constructed by the Government itself. I say there is no necessary reason. Next, by the introduction and maintenance of this system, we promote a great interest in time of peace. We make an element of war—one of our arms of defense of vast importance to the commerce of the country—an auxiliary to the business of the country. Now, I will ask the friends and foes of this measure; questions which I hope they will answer satisfactorily. Is not this system of maintaining a naval marine the cheapest? Does not the introduction of this new element cheapen the transportation of the products of the country? Does it not add facilities for the transportation not only of the products, but the population, from one portion of the world to any other? To my mind the proposition is readily answered. It manifestly does; then why should we forego these advantages, advantages of the highest importance to the nation? This is a contest not between individuals, but a contest between nations. The interests of individuals are involved necessarily in the controversy; but the contest really is one between two sovereignties—England and the United States—for the supremacy of the seas. It is a contest for the carrying trade, for the commerce of the world, and individuals are only connected with it so far as the nature of the contract the Government has seen fit to enter into is concerned. The contest is not theirs. It is flag against flag; Power against Power; and I shall never vote to pull down our flag in such a contest. It is a question of the supremacy of the seas; a question of commerce; and the contest, therefore, is between us and England, as to which shall have the triumph on the seas.

The question then being upon Mr. SAVAGE'S amendment—

Mr. MEADE demanded tellers; which were ordered; and Messrs. CHANDLER and MOLONY appointed.

The question was then taken, and there were—ayes 43, noes not counted.

Mr. STANTON, of Tennessee. I move to strike out "six," and insert "twenty-three." I do this for the purpose of presenting an idea which I was prevented in my five minutes' time from stating, when I occupied the floor this morning. It is contended that this payment to the Collins company is in the nature of protection—protection such as is provided in the tariff system. It is perfectly plain that there is nothing of the kind involved in this bill. I look upon it as a simple demand for services performed. The only question with us is, whether we are receiving an equivalent for the money to be given? I conceive that those gentlemen upon this side of the House, who are putting the question upon constitutional grounds, are injuring their own cause. I do not consider that proposition as worthy of notice, because there are few who will contend that we have not the right to carry the mail, or contract for carrying the mail, from the United States to England. There must be very few, also, who will contend that the Government may not maintain a Navy in the mode in which it is proposed to maintain it by this system, if it be efficient and effectual for that purpose. What do we pay in the first place, for the transportation of the mail? We could have it done cheaper, I admit. We could have the mail transported in smaller vessels, perhaps. They may be a few days or a few hours longer in crossing the ocean, but that would not be a matter of great consequence. These vessels are large and powerful, built for war purposes, and the best calculated for war purposes of any ships afloat. One of the most distinguished officers in the Navy told me with his own lips, that if he had his choice of all the vessels which are to-day afloat in any Navy of the world, he would take one of these steamers, and with alterations not costing over $15,000 would put such an armament on board, as to make her superior to any vessel in the English, French, or Russian Navy, or any other Navy of the world.

A Voice. What Commodore? and what would it cost to prepare them for an armament?

Mr. STANTON. Commodore Perry. He said a gentleman of responsibility had offered to contract to change them for $15,000, and he believed he would make $5,000 by the contract. I have no doubt with that sum these steamers could be put in order for carrying an armament. The question is now, whether we are paying, or about to pay, too much for carrying mails in such vessels as these, capable of being applied to such purposes? It is a question whether we are getting an equivalent for our money, and I think upon a full examination there can be no doubt of this. To be sure these contractors have been mistaken. They have built better and stronger war-vessels than they proposed to build in their contract, and after an experiment of two years in running them they find—and the whole country is aware of the fact—that they have been losing money. The simple question now is, whether it is of sufficient importance to justify us in paying the compensation asked. There is no question about it in my mind. It is no question of protection, of bounties, or of interference with the private enterprise of the country. You are only paying this man a fair equivalent for running a kind of vessels which private enterprise will never build, because they would be unprofitable. I say nothing is clearer or better settled than that private individuals cannot build such vessels as these for mail service without the support of the Government. Then in giving them the additional pay necessary to sustain them, you are only placing them upon an equality with private enterprise, by compensating them for the greater size and strength of their vessels. You are paying for those capacities in these ships which will be required in the event of a war. You are paying for the experience in building and working this immense machinery, and for the education of a corps of engineers which will be indispensable to you in the contingency of war, and which you cannot secure by any other means. In short, you are paying for a great and important experiment, which has already been of immense advantage to the country, and which, if tried in your own naval service, would cost twenty times as much. I regret that I have not time or opportunity to enlarge upon these points, for in my judgment they are susceptible of demonstration. Laying aside all national pride, all interest in the great contest against British supremacy, I am well satisfied that we receive a full compensation, in services performed, for the money asked for in this amendment.

Mr. SWEETSER. I rise for the purpose of opposing this amendment. The amendment which the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. STANTON] offers, proposes to increase the aid which has been given to this Collins line of steamers. The gentleman says that it amounts to no interference with private enterprise; but the manner in which he emphasizes that assertion shows that he attaches an importance to it. I concur with the gentleman in that point, and it is of sufficient importance to demand the attention of the House. I attempted, in the speech which I delivered this morning, to draw a contrast between the great fleet of steamers in the valley of the Mississippi, and those upon other waters. I would follow up that idea now—

Mr. GOODENOW. I rise to a question of order. I submit that the gentleman is not discussing the amendment. I do not make this point of order out of any disrespect to the gentleman. I desire to call the attention of the House to the fact that the debate has been increasing; and as I believe every gentleman of the committee has made up his mind how to vote on the question, I do insist that those who undertake to speak shall speak in order.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair thinks that the line of remark adopted by the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. SWEETSER] is not in order. The question under discussion is: "Shall there be thirteen months notice, instead of six," upon the propriety of limiting that notice.

Mr. SWEETSER. As it involves the whole question of propriety, I will barely remark, if the object is to confine debate strictly to the amendments proposed, I will yield the floor with great pleasure. I will inform the committee and Chair that I will feel authorized to make a point of order hereafter upon any gentleman who may depart from the strict line of discussion.

The question was then taken upon the amendment to the amendment offered by Mr. STANTON, of Tennessee; and it was not agreed to.

Mr. STANTON, of Ohio. I offer an amendment which I hope the friends of this bill will accept.

I move to amend by inserting after the word "Congress" these words: "The Postmaster General, with the advice and consent of the President."

One word of explanation. It will be observed that the bill now confers upon Congress the power to terminate the arrangement for the additional allowance, upon six months' notice. Every gentleman must know, if this contract shall prove profitable, that the means will be found to prevent the passage of any proposition diminishing this compensation. There is no difficulty about that. I propose, therefore, in addition to the power here conferred upon Congress, if they shall not exercise it, that the Postmaster General, with the advice and consent of the President, shall terminate the arrangement, which will make it a Cabinet measure. If the Postmaster General shall be satisfied that he is paying an exorbitant and unnecessary compensation, then the President and Cabinet may discontinue the allowance, and not encounter all the delays which operate, under our rules, to effect such an object. I hope the friends of the bill will consent to an amendment of that sort. I can see no reasonable objection to it.

The question was then taken upon Mr. STANTON's amendment, and it was not agreed to.

Mr. MEADE. I move to amend the amendment by striking out "$33,000," and inserting "$26,000."

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair will state that the amendment of the gentleman is not now in order—the question being the motion made by the gentleman from Georgia [Mr. STEPHENS] to strike out the proviso. Motions have been made since that time to amend it, previous to the question being taken to strike out. If the gentleman does not wish to propose his amendment now, and there be no further amendments to the proviso, the question can be taken on striking it out, and then the gentleman's amendment will be in order.

Mr. MILLSON. I move to amend the proviso, by striking out "54," in the 14th line, and insert "53."

I desire, in this connection, to reply to some of the remarks which fell from the gentleman from North Carolina, [Mr. CLINGMAN], who said, on yesterday, and repeated to-day—

Mr. FOWLER. I rise to a question of order. The gentleman proposes, if I understand him, to strike out "54," and insert "53." His argument must tend to that point, and if he departs from it, he is out of order.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair must be under the necessity of deciding that the gentleman from Virginia must confine his remarks to the change he proposes.

Mr. MILLSON. Any argument by which I can show that none of this appropriation should be voted, will apply to show that it shall be granted for a limited period only.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair thinks not. This part which the gentleman proposes to amend is in regard to the notice, and the propriety of extending or limiting that notice would be the only question.

Mr. MILLSON. There would be no stronger reason for limiting the duration of this appropriation than that there ought to be no appropriation voted at all. If I can succeed in showing this House that it ought not to grant any further relief to the proprietors of the Collins line, I think I can show that the grant should be limited to time.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair thinks not, and decides the gentleman to be out of order.

Mr. MILLSON. As a matter of principle, I will take an appeal.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair decides the question of order raised by the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. FOWLER] as well taken; and from this decision the gentleman from Virginia takes an appeal.

Mr. FOWLER. I move to lay that appeal upon the table.

Mr. MILLSON. I do not wish to take up the time of the committee, and I will withdraw my appeal. I desire to say—

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman's remarks will be in order after the question is taken upon striking out. The question recurs upon striking out the proviso.

The question was then taken on striking out the proviso, and it was not agreed to.

Mr. MILLSON. I move, sir to strike out "$33,000 in the ninth line, and insert "$20,000" in lieu thereof.

Mr. SACKETT. I rise to a question of order, and it is that the committee have been engaged in endeavoring to perfect the proviso, and until they come to a final vote upon the question of striking it out, and conclude to strike it out, the motion of the gentleman is not in order.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair overrules the question of order raised by the gentleman from New York, [Mr. SACKETT], and holds that the subdivision is yet open to amendment.

Mr. MILLSON. I was proceeding to remark, Mr. Chairman, that the gentleman from North Carolina [Mr. CLINGMAN] seemed to admit that this system was entirely wrong, and so objectionable did he regard it that he was willing to enter into negotiations with Great Britain for the purpose of—

Mr. CABELL. I rise to a question of order. It is important to me that I should leave the city to-morrow, and I am very desirous to have the vote taken upon the amendment of the Senate. The gentleman is proceeding with remarks of a general character, and is not confining himself to the question of reducing the $33,000 to $20,000. I must insist, as far as I can, that gentlemen should confine themselves to the question immediately before the committee. The gentleman from Virginia [Mr. MILLSON] is now replying to a speech made by the gentleman from North Carolina, [Mr. CLINGMAN].

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair thinks, upon a motion to reduce the amount appropriated, that it is legitimate to argue that there ought to be no appropriation at all. But if you must have an appropriation, the amount should be reduced.

Mr. MILLSON. The gentleman from North Carolina [Mr. CLINGMAN] intimated a willingness to put a stop to this competition between the steamers of Great Britain and those of the United States, by negotiating a treaty between the two countries. He admits that this system of governmental protection is altogether wrong, but says that, as Great Britain commenced it, it is necessary, upon the principle of retaliation, that we should vote this amount to enable the proprietors of the Collins line to maintain the competition. That is his argument. Now, sir, I will not say how far it may be proper to act upon the principle of retaliating wrongs, but I do not see either the wisdom or the morality of inflicting an injury upon ourselves, to prevent another nation from securing a benefit, in which we, to a great extent, participate.

The argument is this: Great Britain has commenced this system, and therefore we should prosecute it. It is presented also in the report of the Senate committee upon this subject. They say:

"It may not be improper here again to note, by way of illustration, the benefits to be derived from ocean steam mail transportation, when in successful operation, as manifested in the case of the British Cunard line under the auspices of the British Government. During the first six years of its existence, the line above-named received from the Government no less than $2,550,000, while the Government received from the company, in the form of postages, the enormous sum of $7,836,800, or $5,286,800 net revenue."

They then proceed to show what have been our receipts from the Collins line, which, with all their figuring, they cannot make more than $256,773 40 per annum, and say that the Government, at the end of two years, is only "out of pocket" $256,453 20."

That is to say, the British Government, according to the report of the Senate committee, have paid Cunard, in a period of six years, the sum of $2,550,000. They have received $7,836,800, and have secured a net gain of $5,286,800. Therefore, they seem to think this furnishes a strong reason why we should pay to the Collins line for a similar period, $5,148,000 for the sake of receiving $1,540,640 40, and thus incurring a net loss of $3,607,360 60.

This is the logic of the advocates of the appropriation. We ought to encounter a loss of $3,607,360 80, because Great Britain has secured a gain of $5,286,800. So much, sir, for this argument, plainly presented in the report of the Senate committee, and dimly shadowed forth to-day in the remarks of the gentleman from North Carolina.

Now, sir, in regard to the reduction of freights to which the gentleman from North Carolina [Mr. CLINGMAN] alludes, I beg leave to call his attention to a statement made in a paper which has been laid upon our tables by the friends of this line, in which it is distinctly stated that this reduction has not been the result of competition between the Collins and Cunard lines, but has been caused by the competition of the propellers, after the two lines were in operation. Here is the statement:

"Neither were the mail steamers between New York and Liverpool the cause of the reduction of freights on foreign merchandise. It was, as the memorialists cannot but know, the English propellers that began the system. Both the British and American mail steamers charged £7 10s. per ton, when the propellers commenced taking freight at £3 10s. per ton, which induced the mail steamers to put their rates down to £4 10s."

It is here claimed by the friends of the measure, that the reduction is not due to competition between the Collins and Cunard lines, as the gentleman from North Carolina argued, but to the competition between both these lines on the one hand and the propellers on the other.

Now, sir, in reference to the statement that Mr. Jefferson was in favor of this species of protection, I wish I had time to go into the consideration of the views presented by my colleague from the Accomac district, [Mr. BAYLY.]

I congratulate the protectionists of the country on the ally they have got in my colleague, in their hopeless efforts to make out Mr. Jefferson to be a protectionist. I have heard these arguments again and again—I have heard them from the stump and upon the hustings, but always from the lips of those who attempted to recommend or excuse the protective policy, and invoked the authority of Mr. Jefferson in support of that system.

Sir, I undertake to say, that the citation made of the opinions of Mr. Jefferson—but why need I vindicate the opinions of Mr. Jefferson in the presence of a Democratic Congress! What! Thomas Jefferson, the man who in 1826, in his letter to Mr. Giles, expressed the most earnest opposition to this whole scheme of granting bounties to a favored few! He is invoked here as the friend and advocate of a system of protection by governmental bounties.

Mr. MEADE. I rise for the purpose of opposing the amendment offered by my colleague, and, at the same time, for the purpose of declaring my entire concurrence with him in relation to the power of Congress to encourage enterprises of this kind by protective duties. In the remarks I made to the House yesterday, I said I based my advocacy—

Mr. SWEETSER. I rise to a question of order. My question of order is, that the views of Mr. Jefferson, and these other gentlemen, have nothing to do with the proposed amendment, and are therefore out of order. The Chair has, I think very properly, decided in my case that such discussion was not in order.

Mr. MEADE. I have not said anything about the opinions of Mr. Jefferson.

Mr. SWEETSER. The gentleman is discussing an hypothetical case.

The CHAIRMAN. As far as the gentleman from Virginia [Mr. MEADE] has gone, the Chair decides that he is not out of order.

Mr. SWEETSER. Certainly he is not in order.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair thinks he is in order.

Mr. MEADE, (resuming.) Mr. Chairman, the question with me is whether we shall increase our steam-navy. I am in favor of an increase. We have, I think, about five steamships in commission, and the great maritime nations of the earth have from one hundred to one hundred and fifty. It seems to me that the addition of five more to the steam-navy of the United States is but a very small amount compared with the immense naval force of other Powers; but, at the same time, I say I am not in favor of the large increase of compensation proposed by the Senate amendment; and therefore at the proper time I shall move to insert $26,000 in the place of $33,000. Having settled the preliminary point that we should keep on hand an adequate steam force, I now proceed to confute the arguments of my colleague [Mr. MILLSON] by showing that instead of a loss, we shall make a gain of upwards of $200,000 per annum for each vessel by making an appropriation of $26,000 to this line for each round trip.

Mr. SWEETSER. I submit that this discussion is not in order.

Mr. MEADE. I am opposing the reduction to $20,000. It is altogether wrong. I have a statement, sir, prepared at the Navy Department, which shows that steamers of the first class in commission cost the Government, in certain articles, $131,894 34. To that sum might be added the interest on the cost of a steam-frigate, say $36,000, which we should have to lose in case we constructed a vessel upon our own account. It is estimated that the depreciation in a vessel of that sort ranges from twelve to fifteen per cent. per annum, which would swell the annual expense $90,000 more. This would make the cost of a steam-frigate of the first class $257,894 33 per annum. The difference between the cost per annum of a steam-frigate owned by the United States and the amount that we should pay to the Collins line for one of their ships, at $26,000 per trip, I will show to be about $225,000 in round numbers. Twenty-six trips, at $26,000, would amount to $676,000, which, divided by five, the number of vessels in the line, will give $135,200 per annum for each vessel, which, subtracted from the annual cost of a Government steamer—to wit $257,894 33—would leave $122,694 33 in favor of the former.

Mr. STANTON, of Tennessee. The gentleman forgets to add the mail pay.

Mr. MEADE. I am coming to that. Now, sir, the mail-pay in 1851 for this line was $343,641, which was an increase of $173,744 over the year before, and if, during the year 1852, there should be a similar increase, as we may reasonably infer, the amount for the year 1852 would be $517,383, which, distributed among the five steamers, would reduce the annual pay of this line to $31,923 for each ship, being less, by $235,971, than the cost of maintaining a Government steamer. The total saving on the five vessels amounting to the sum of $1,129,825 per annum; the saving in five years would be $5,649,275, being $2,500,000 more than the cost or value of the vessels.

The question was then taken upon Mr. MILLSON's amendment to the amendment, and it was not agreed to.

Mr. MASON. Mr. Chairman, I desire to offer an amendment, to come in at the end of the proviso. I offer it in good faith. I hope the friends of the bill will listen to it, and I shall call for tellers upon it. The amendment I propose, is as follows:

Provided further, That any party to a contract with the Post Office Department, for carrying the United States mail, shall be remunerated for any loss he may have sustained by such contract, and that the sum of $100,000 be, and the same is hereby, appropriated for that purpose.

Mr. CLINGMAN. Is that proposition in order? It proposes to make a general law, with reference to all persons who may not have been remunerated under their contracts with the Post Office Department.

Mr. MASON. I understand that this appropriation is made because these parties are mail-carriers, and I want to put all the mail-carriers upon the same footing.

Mr. CLINGMAN. You have no right to make a general bill of this.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair thinks that is not in order as an amendment to this subdivision.

Mr. MASON. I move to strike out the word "six" in the sixteenth line, and insert the word "two" in lieu thereof. The proposition which I made just now, it seems, was out of order. I have no doubt, however, that those who give this $800,000, as a remuneration to this large steam line, will perhaps take into consideration the justice of paying the $100,000 to contractors throughout the United States, who have lost by carrying the mail service heretofore. The gentleman—the chairman of the Committee on Naval Affairs—makes this appropriation constitutional, expressly upon the ground that it is for carrying the United States mail.

Mr. FOWLER. With much respect for the gentleman who has the floor, I rise to a question of order.

Mr. MASON. I will get in order directly, if you will leave me alone.

Mr. FOWLER. The question is to reduce the time from six months to two. I trust that the gentleman will be made to confine his remarks to that point.

Mr. MASON. The number of petitions at the Post Office Department, and numerous petitions before the Committee on the Post Office and Post Roads of this House, show that there are hundreds of contractors in absolute want and desitution, who have been reduced to those circumstances by their patriotic services in carrying the mails of the United States. If, sir, patriotism requires that the proprietors of this large steam line shall be remunerated for their losses, the American people will demand that all those who carry the mails of the United States shall be likewise remunerated.

Mr. FOWLER. I insist that the Chairman shall decide my question of order.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Kentucky must necessarily confine his remarks to showing the propriety of reducing the time of notice from six months to two months.

Mr. MASON. Sir, I have heard gentlemen on all sides appealing to the patriotism of this House. May not I appeal to its sense of justice? Justice is one of the essential attributes of patriotism; and, sir, if it was proper and legitimate to appeal to the patriotism of the House, certainly it is in order for me to appeal to its sense of justice. I hope the gentleman from Massachusetts will now see that I am in order. [Laughter.]

Mr. FOWLER. I repeat that it was from no disrespect to the gentleman that I raised the question of order.

Mr. MASON. Oh, no; I am sure of that. Sir, if we are to appropriate this $800,000 for this Collins mail line, why should not we, at the same time, remunerate the hundreds of men who have been utterly ruined and made bankrupt in carrying the mails of the United States? Gentlemen should recollect that they will have to meet these men when they go home. They are not few, nor far between. Go to the room of your Committee on the Post Office and Post Roads, or to the Post Office Department, and you will find file upon file of petitions from these men, praying for relief in every form and manner, and crying aloud for your justice as well as generosity.

Mr. STANTON, of Tennessee. Let me suggest to the gentleman that this appropriation is not merely to pay the losses of the contractors, but it is to enable them to keep up the line. Without it the line must go down.

[Here the hammer fell.]

Mr. BAYLY, of Virginia. I rise to oppose this amendment, and as in advocating a similar one, my colleague [Mr. MILLSON] made, as I fancy, a most uncalled-for reference to me, I take it for granted that it will be in order for me to reply to him.

Mr. GOODENOW. I rise to a question of order.

Mr. BAYLY. I beg the gentleman to let me go on. I desire to make a personal explanation.

Mr. GOODENOW. I rise to a question of order. I know that the gentleman from Virginia will not take it unkindly. But I claim that the question of protection has nothing to do with the amendment before the committee.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Virginia will be necessarily confined to showing that the notice ought to be six months instead of two.

Mr. BAYLY. Well, Mr. Chairman, if I understand anything about parliamentary law—and I think it is time that I should, if I have capacity to do it—I know of no better-settled principle than that when one gentleman has been allowed in speaking on an amendment, to make reference to another, and especially to one of his colleagues, parliamentary liberality requires that the gentleman so referred to should have the privilege of reply, on a similar proposition.

Mr. GOODENOW. On that ground I withdraw my question of order.

Mr. MILLSON here made a brief explanation to his colleague, [Mr. BAYLY,] not a word of which was heard by the Reporters, in consequence of his having directed his remarks from them.

Mr. BAYLY, (resuming.) That is precisely as I understood the gentleman. Sir, when that gentleman has struck as many blows, and—though it may be vanity in me to say so—as many effective blows in favor of free trade as I have, it will be time for him to say, that in supporting such propositions as this, I am fighting under the banner of protectionists. When he has struck as many blows, and—I again, egotistically perhaps, add—as many effective blows in favor of Democracy as I have, he may undertake to talk about the Whigs receiving an ally in me. I am not one of those, however, who choose to bring Democratic doctrines into disrepute by running them into absurd extremes. Disciples are becoming worse than apostles, and men who follow in the footsteps of Jefferson are no longer Republicans.

My colleague says that this very report by Mr. Jefferson, which I have quoted, has been quoted by protectionists against him in support of a tariff. I know it, and it has always been misquoted. Neither Jefferson, Madison, Polk, Jackson, nor any other Democrat that I ever knew, questioned the power of Congress to regulate our commerce and our navigation.

Mr. JOHNSON, of Tennessee. I ask the gentleman from Virginia if he did not vote against the introduction of this scheme in 1847?

Mr. BAYLY. No vote was taken on it.

Mr. JOHNSON. I ask the gentleman if he was not opposed to it then?

Mr. BAYLY. I tell the gentleman frankly, that I was not in favor of forming a connection with this or any other company.

Mr. JOHNSON. Exactly. If it is Democratic now, why was it not Democratic then?

Mr. BAYLY. I never based my opposition to it upon the absurd ground that it was unconstitutional—never. Upon that occasion I made no point. It was recommended by a Democratic President; it was carried by a Democratic House; there was a strong feeling in favor of that law. How did the gentleman from Tennessee vote upon that occasion?

Mr. JOHNSON. I was opposed to it, and so were you.

Mr. BAYLY. Yes; but I never put my opposition to it upon the absurd ground of a want of constitutional power. I had other grounds of opposition. But having embarked our fortunes in a common bottom with these persons, even though against my wishes, in what has now become a national contest, I am not willing, through any demagogism or anything else, to back out of our partnership in a concern into which I never wished to enter.

Mr. FREEMAN. I ask the gentleman on what clause of the Constitution he relies for the power of Congress to pass this appropriation?

Mr. BAYLY. Will the gentleman tell me where Congress gets the power to require steamboats on the Western lakes and waters to take out licenses, and vessels engaged in the foreign trade to take out registers, to regulate the number of passengers that shall be brought into the country to the ton, to require vessels to have their names on their sterns, and that the letters shall be at least six inches long? Where the right to grant fishing bounties? where the right of exclusive legislation in reference to tonnage and navigation is found? If he will tell me where we find the power of marine defense—if he will, I will answer his question.

Mr. FREEMAN. In the power to regulate commerce with foreign nations and between the States.

Mr. BAYLY. The General Government has exclusive authority over the subject of navigation and tonnage. The States have been prohibited from making any regulations with respect to tonnage and navigation. Every vessel, I believe, over five tons burden, is required to take out a license, if engaged in the coasting trade, or to be registered, if engaged in the foreign trade. No State can legislate on the subject at all. The exclusive power over this subject of navigation is in Congress. Sir, this thing has nothing to do with the doctrine of a tariff for protection, and it is an utter misconception of the whole subject to suppose it has.

Mr. LETCHER moved that the committee do now rise.

Mr. GOODENOW demanded tellers.

Tellers were ordered, and Messrs. STANTON, of Tennessee, and HENDRICKS were appointed.

The question was then taken, and it was decided in the affirmative—ayes 83, noes not counted.

So the motion was agreed to.

The committee accordingly rose, and the Speaker having resumed the chair, the chairman [Mr. STUART] reported that the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union had had under consideration the state of the Union generally, and particularly the amendment of the Senate to House bill No. 207, "to supply deficiencies in the appropriations for the service of the fiscal year ending the 30th of June, 1852," and had come to no resolution thereon.

Mr. HENN, from the Committee on Enrolled Bills, reported back, as correctly enrolled, the following bills and joint resolutions, which thereupon received the signature of the Speaker, viz:

An act to amend an act entitled "An act providing for the sale of certain land in the States of Ohio and Michigan, ceded by the Wyandot tribe of Indians, and for other purposes," approved on the 3d day of March, 1843;

An act for the relief of Ichabod Weymouth;

An act for the relief of Francis Tribou;

An act for the relief of Amos Knapp;

An act making appropriation for the payment of invalid and other pensions of the United States, for the year ending the 30th of June, 1853; and

A joint resolution to establish certain post routes.

TRADE BETWEEN TEXAS AND MEXICO.

Mr. HOWARD. There is a bill upon the Speaker's table in relation to the regulation of trade between Texas and Mexico. I ask the unanimous consent of the House to have that bill taken from the Speaker's table, and referred to the Committee on Commerce.

There being no objection, the following bill was taken from the Speaker's table, read a first and second time by its title, and referred to the Committee on Commerce, viz:

An act authorizing imported goods, wares, and merchandise entered and bonded for warehousing in pursuance of law, to be exported by certain routes to ports and places in Mexico.

WITHDRAWAL OF PAPERS.

On motion by Mr. CHASTAIN,

Ordered, That the papers of William Smith, a revolutionary soldier, be withdrawn from the files of the House, and referred to the Committee on Revolutionary Pensions.

On motion by Mr. PENN,

Ordered, That leave be granted to withdraw from the files of the House, the papers in the case of the heirs of Elias Bleadwell, claiming compensation for the loss of a library, burnt during the war of 1812, for the purpose of reference to the Senate.

On motion by Mr. WALSH,

Ordered, That leave be granted to withdraw from the files of the House, the papers of Philip C. Friese, for the purpose of reference to the Senate.

BARRACKS AT SAVANNAH, GEORGIA.

Mr. STEPHENS, of Georgia. There is a joint resolution upon the Speaker's table, proposing to surrender the property of the barracks in the city of Savannah to the city authorities. I ask the unanimous consent of the House to have that bill taken from the Speaker's table and referred to the Committee on Military Affairs. The resolution came from the Senate some time since. It is entirely a local matter.

Mr. WALSH. Is it a general bill?

Mr. STEPHENS. No; it is entirely local in its character.

There being no objection, the following joint resolution was taken from the Speaker's table, read a first and second time by its title, and referred to the Committee on Military Affairs, viz:

A joint resolution for surrendering the site of the old Oglethorpe barracks to the city council of Savannah, Georgia.

URSULA E. COBB.

Mr. COBB. There is a bill upon the Speaker's table proposing to grant an invalid pension of four dollars a month to a poor old widow. I ask the unanimous consent of the House to have that bill taken from the Speaker's table, and referred to the Committee on Invalid Pensions.

There being no objection, the following bill was then taken from the Speaker's table, read a first and second time by its title, and referred to the Committee on Invalid Pensions, viz:

An act for the relief of Ursula E. Cobb.

On motion by Mr. McMULLIN, the House then adjourned until to-morrow at eleven o'clock, a. m.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

SATURDAY, July 10, 1852.

The House met at eleven o'clock, a. m. Prayer by the Rev. LITTLETON F. MORGAN.

The Journal of yesterday was read and approved.

RATES OF POSTAGE.

The SPEAKER. The first business before the House is the consideration of House bill No. 144, to amend an act entitled "An act to reduce and modify the rates of postage in the United States, and for other purposes," passed March 3d, 1851; and the pending question is the amendment proposed by the gentleman from Iowa to the second section, and to go in at the end of it, as follows:

The presidents of universities, colleges, academies, and of all scientific institutions, and also the Smithsonian Institution, may send by mail, free of postage, the printed copies of any regular paper, pamphlet, or book published under the authority of any such institution; and also the proof-sheets of such copies while the same are being published: Provided, such printed copies shall be distributed gratis.

Mr. OLDS. There is a motion pending to recommit this bill to the Committee on the Post Office and Post Roads.

The SPEAKER. The Chair has overlooked that motion. Does the gentleman withdraw it?

Mr. OLDS. I withdraw the motion. It is surprising, Mr. Speaker, that sectional issues must be dragged into every debate arising in this House. The gentleman from New York, with his usual ingenuity, has managed to bring a sectional argument against my poor postage bill. Now, sir, for the life of me, I cannot see what the question of slavery has to do with the postage on newspapers. This bill does not contemplate making the negroes mailable matter. The Committee on the Post Office and Post Roads do not propose sending all the negroes North, at a postage of one cent per ounce. I have no idea that the mails of the United States will ever be converted into a negro-stealing machine. The gentleman should have learnt ere this that there is an underground railroad for this purpose, which more appropriately comes under the jurisdiction of the Committee on Roads and Canals. I have no knowledge, sir, that our committee has any petition asking Congress to make this underground-railroad a mail route. I have said enough, I trust, to allay the gentleman's sectional fears, and again ask the attention of the House to the merits of the bill.

I wish to state one fact, for the information of the House and the gentleman from New York, [Mr. Brooks.] It is, that when the Committee on the Post Office and Post Roads had reported this identical bill, with the exception of the amendment just agreed to, changing the weight from two and a half ounces to two ounces, I forwarded to the publishers of each of the newspapers in the city of New York, and those of almost every other city in the country, a copy of the bill, together with a copy of the accompanying report. Within the last two weeks, a petition has been put in my hands, coming through the House of Representatives, from most of the publishers of newspapers and periodicals in the city of New York, asking what this bill provides for.

Now, sir, these publishers must have seen this bill before they signed that petition, for it had been in their hands for three months. My understanding of this petition is, that they desire the passage of this identical bill. I may, perhaps, be mistaken, but such is my construction upon it. I am sorry not to find among the number, the publishers of the New York Express; but I find here the names of James Watson Webb of the Courier and Enquirer, Greely & McElrath of the Tribune, James Gordon Bennett of the New York Herald—

Mr. BROOKS. Permit me to ask the gentleman, if they petition that the rates of postage should be increased?

Mr. OLDS. Yes, sir; I have said that those publishers who signed this petition had my bill in their possession when they signed it. In justice, however, to these publishers I must say, that I am satisfied that they are opposed to reducing the standard weight from two and a half to two ounces. I received a private letter from the publishers of one of the papers in the city of New York—the Journal of Commerce—objecting to the reduction of the standard weight below two and a half ounces. It is the only objection that has been raised by any of the publishers of newspapers in the city of New York.

Mr. SKELTON. Will the effect of this bill be to reduce the rates of postage?

Mr. OLDS. I have here some statistics, showing the rates of postage as they are under the old, and as they will be under the new law.

When I was interrupted by the expiration of the morning hour on yesterday, I was endeavoring to institute a comparison between the rates of postage charged under the law as it now stands, and those charged under this bill; and from remarks which were made to me by gentlemen of the House, after the adjournment on yesterday, what I then feared might be true, I find to be true—that I did not succeed in making myself understood by the House.

I have been to some trouble since the adjournment of yesterday, to rearrange my table making the comparison between the rates of postage on newspapers under the old law, and the proposed new one, so that it might be more intelligible to the House. This table may contain some inaccuracies, but is believed to be substantially correct. My figures will differ very materially from those of the gentleman from New York, [Mr. Brooks,] from the fact that he bases his calculation upon a weight of three ounces, as that is the minimum weight of the old law; whilst mine is based upon a minimum weight of one ounce, which will cover more than nine tenths of the entire press of the country. The New York Herald, Tribune, Sun, &c., single sheet, will all be covered by this rate.

On a daily paper per quarter under the old law, the postage under fifty miles would be twenty-five cents—under the new, thirty-nine cents; over fifty miles and under three hundred, the old would be fifty cents, and the new thirty-nine cents; over three hundred and under one thousand, the old would be seventy-five cents, and the new thirty-nine cents; over one thousand and not exceeding two thousand miles, the old would be one dollar, and the new thirty-nine cents; over two thousand and not exceeding three thousand miles, the old would be one dollar twenty-five cents, and the new thirty-nine cents; over three thousand miles, under the new law the postage is doubled. The average rate under the old law would be $5 25; under the new, $2 75.

On a tri-weekly paper, the postage, where the distance is under fifty miles, under the old law, would be fifteen cents per quarter; under the new nineteen and a half cents. Over fifty miles and under three hundred, the old would be thirty cents, the new nineteen and a half; over three hundred miles and under one thousand, the old would be forty-five cents and the new nineteen and a half cents; over one thousand miles and under two thousand miles the old would be sixty cents, and the new nineteen and a half cents; over two thousand miles and under three thousand, the old would be seventy-five cents and the new nineteen and a half cents; over three thousand miles, under the new law, he rate would be double. The average rate under the old would be, three dollars and fifteen cents, under the new one dollar and thirty-six and a half cents.

On a semi-weekly paper the postage per quarter under fifty miles, under the old law, would be ten cents, under the new thirteen cents; over fifty miles and under three hundred, the old would be twenty cents and the new thirteen cents; over three hundred miles and under one thousand, the old would be thirty cents, and the new thirteen cents; over one thousand miles and under two thousand, the old would be forty cents, and the new thirteen cents; over two thousand miles and under three thousand, the old would be fifty cents, and the new thirteen cents; over three thousand and the rate under the new law is doubled. The average would be two dollars and sixteen cents under the old law, and ninety-one cents under the new law.

On a weekly paper, the postage per quarter under fifty miles, under the old law, would be five cents, under the new six and a half cents; over fifty miles and under three hundred, it would be, under the old law, ten cents, under the new six and a half cents; over three hundred miles and under one thousand, the old law would be fifteen cents, and the new six and a half; over one thousand miles and under two thousand, the old would be twenty cents, and the new six and a half cents; over two thousand miles and under three thousand, the old would be twenty-five cents, and the new six and a half cents; over three thousand miles the rate is doubled under the new law. The average would be one dollar and five cents under the old law, and forty-five and a half cents under the new.

Mr. FOWLER. Will the chairman of the Committee on the Post Office and Post Roads have the goodness to state again the difference between the rates under the present law, and the proposed law, for distances under a thousand miles? I did not distinctly understand it, and others understood it differently from what I did.

Mr. OLDS. Then I shall have to go over the whole again.

Mr. BROOKS. We have the same tables before us. Let us compare. Take the table, where the distance does not exceed fifty miles, and what is the postage on a daily newspaper, according to your table?

Mr. OLDS. A daily newspaper under fifty miles per quarter, under the old law, is twenty-five cents; under the new, thirty-nine cents; that is by the ounce.

Mr. BROOKS. Now, let me ask another question. Suppose that paper should weigh an ounce and a grain, what would be the postage?

Mr. OLDS. It would be seventy-eight cents under that table.

Mr. BROOKS. I will now ask the gentleman another question in order to get the facts before the House. Under three hundred miles what is the postage now on a daily paper?

Mr. OLDS. Fifty cents.

Mr. BROOKS. What would it be under the proposed act, for a newspaper of an ounce or under?

Mr. OLDS. It would be thirty-nine cents.

Mr. BROOKS. What would it be for a newspaper weighing over one ounce?

Mr. OLDS. It would be double that sum, seventy-eight cents.

Mr. FOWLER. I understand the chairman of the committee to say, that over nine tenths of the papers of the country are under one ounce. Is that so?

Mr. OLDS. According to my calculation, nine tenths of the country circulation comes under an ounce. And nearly all the country papers will pass through the mail at a half cent postage.

I shall not trouble the House to extend these comparisons to transient newspapers. Suffice it to say, that the old law amounts almost to an exclusion of transient papers from the mails, while the new law, if it pass, will put them upon the same footing as other papers, only requiring that the postage shall be prepaid. That is all the difference; and it otherwise allows transient papers to pass through the mails of the United States the same as papers to regular subscribers.

I will not trouble the House, briefly comparing the effects of the old and the new law upon periodicals and other printed matter.

Periodicals weighing one ounce, under five hundred miles, by the old law would pay one cent—under the new one cent. Over five hundred miles and not over fifteen hundred miles, the old postage would be two cents, and the new one cent. From fifteen hundred to twenty-five hundred miles, the old is three cents, the new one cent. From twenty-five hundred to thirty-five hundred miles, the old is four cents. Up to three thousand miles, the new is one cent—over thirty-five hundred the old is five cents—over three thousand and the new is two cents. For two ounces the rate under five hundred miles, by the old law, is two cents, by the new one cent; from five hundred to fifteen hundred miles the old is four cents, and the new one cent; from fifteen hundred to twenty-five hundred miles the old is six cents, the new one cent; from twenty-five hundred to thirty-five hundred miles the old is eight cents—up to three thousand miles the new is one cent; over thirty-five hundred miles the old is ten cents; over three thousand miles the new is two cents. On three ounces weight, under five hundred miles, the old postage is three cents, the new two cents; from five hundred to fifteen hundred miles the old is six cents, and the new two cents; from fifteen hundred to twenty-five hundred miles the old is nine cents, the new two cents; from twenty-five hundred to thirty-five hundred miles the old is twelve cents—up to three thousand miles the new is two cents; over thirty-five hundred miles the old is fifteen cents; over three thousand miles the new is four cents. The ratio of increase per ounce continues, as in these illustrations, to the weight of four pounds under the new law; to the weight of two pounds under the old law.

The International and Harpers' New Monthly will weigh about eight ounces per number.

Under the old law these periodicals would pay eight cents for five hundred miles; under the new the postage would be seven cents. From five hundred to one thousand five hundred the old postage would be sixteen cents, the new seven cents; from one thousand five hundred to two thousand five hundred the old would be twenty-four cents, the new seven cents; from two thousand five hundred to three thousand five hundred the old would be thirty-two cents—up to three thousand miles the new would be seven cents; over three thousand five hundred miles the old would be forty cents; over three thousand miles the new would be fourteen cents.

Under the old law these rates are reduced one half when paid in advance.

It will be seen at a glance, Mr. Speaker, that the enormous postage charged upon periodicals, for long distances, amounts to an exclusion of those periodicals from the mails, and consequently seriously affects the revenues of the United States. You take, for instance, California, and it entirely excludes her from obtaining, through the mails, the intelligence which can be conveyed to her through the periodicals of the Eastern and Atlantic States. It will be perceived that the gentleman from New York [Mr. Brooks] is mistaken in supposing that the proposed changes make an increase of the postage upon newspapers, periodicals, and other printed matter. It is a reduction of the postage. It is true that, under fifty miles, and, perhaps, up to five hundred, the average might be as high as it is under the old law, but when you come to five hundred miles and over, there is a reduction in the rates on the newspaper circulation of the country.

Now, Mr. Speaker, there is an argument for this. A newspaper must be mailed at one office, and delivered at another office of delivery, and the same trouble of mailing and delivery occurs where a paper is sent fifty miles, as where it is sent three thousand. There is no difference in that respect, and really the expense of transportation of newspapers in the mails of the United States is not increased in proportion to the distance, and in proportion to the increase of charges under the old law.

I know, as the gentleman himself says, that the present law was passed at the close of the session. These amendments, in relation to the newspaper postage, were put upon it in the Senate of the United States, and the changes which I now propose by the bill under consideration, restores the bill merely to the shape in which it passed this House originally, before it went to the Senate at the last Congress. The bill was sent back to us from the Senate at the close of the session, and we had not time to act upon the amendments separately, and reject them, and thus have a committee of conference. We were obliged to reject the whole bill, or take it as it passed the Senate. The whole country was clamorous for its passage; from one end of the country to the other, the cry was for cheap postage.

Why, sir, the very editors of the newspapers in New York are not satisfied under the old law. They have petitioned Congress to have it changed. I am free, sir, to admit that the new bill may be subject to objection. But it has been prepared with much care, upon consultation, by the committee of the House and the committee of the Senate, with the Post Office Department. As it now stands before the House, it has received the sanction, unanimously, of both committees of Congress, and of the Post Office Department. It may not be perfect, but the old law has been found, by experiment, to fail, so far as newspaper postage is concerned. This law must be an experiment, and if it shall be found to fail as signally as the old law has failed, let the next Congress try their hand upon it, and change it again. The country demands a change, and I venture to say, that this law gives a change that will prove satisfactory. I hope, therefore, that these amendments proposed by the committee, may be agreed to, and the bill be speedily passed.

Mr. GIDDINGS. I want to put an interrogatory to my colleague, [Mr. OLDS.] He has given us the rate of postage upon weekly newspapers of one ounce weight, and under. I wish to inquire of him the weight of our ordinary weekly newspapers in the country. Are they not over one ounce?

Mr. OLDS. They are nearly all under one ounce.

Mr. GIDDINGS. I will observe, that I have taken the pains to weigh the National Intelligencer, and that weighs an ounce and a half.

Mr. OLDS. Is it this morning's issue?

Mr. GIDDINGS. It is.

Mr. OLDS. You will find that the law requires the paper to be weighed dry. This Globe which I hold in my hand, as it came from the press this morning, will weigh one quarter of an ounce less when dry than it does now.

Mr. GIDDINGS. What is the weight of that paper when dry?

Mr. OLDS. About one ounce.

Mr. WASHBURN. I do not like this bill very well. I have no doubt that the country demands an alteration in the laws as to postage, but I think this is the worst alteration that can be made, and that it will be exceedingly unpopular. I believe the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. OLDS] is mistaken in supposing that the country papers do not ordinarily weigh over an ounce. The country papers are, any of them, as large, and weigh as much as the National Intelligencer. What I say with reference to my district is true as regards nine tenths of the country papers of New England. I have no doubt of that as a matter of fact.

Mr. OLDS. If the gentleman will allow me, I will make a simple statement. I will state that the committees of the House and Senate met at the Post Office Department, and they went through the process of weighing the country papers, and gentlemen can rest assured that nine tenths of the country press will not weigh to exceed one ounce. We tested the experiment fully and fairly at the Post Office Department.

Mr. WASHBURN. I wish to inquire whether, as the gentleman understands, there is not a provision that one ounce shall be the maximum of size which will permit a reduction?

Mr. OLDS. No reduction under the bill will take place if the paper weighs over one ounce.

Mr. WASHBURN. That is as I understand it. I move to strike out the word "one," and to insert the word "two" in lieu thereof; so that there shall be a reduction if the paper does not weigh over two ounces.

The SPEAKER. These words being inserted by the amendment made on yesterday are not amendable.

Mr. SKELTON. I would suggest to the gentleman to move to insert "one and a half" instead of "two," that the uniformity of the bill may be preserved.

Mr. WASHBURN. Would an amendment of that kind be in order?

The SPEAKER. It will not be in order to strike out any portion of the amendment inserted on yesterday, and the section is not amendable unless it be by an entire substitute for the whole section. It is certainly not if the amendment proposes to embrace any portion of the amendment adopted on yesterday.

Mr. WASHBURN. I move to strike out the following words from the bill:

"All newspapers and periodicals not weighing over one ounce, published regularly as often as once in three months, and sent from the office of publication to actual subscribers, shall be chargeable with only one half of the foregoing rates."

The SPEAKER. That was stricken out on yesterday.

Mr. WASHBURN. I then move to strike out the balance, and to insert in lieu thereof the following:

All newspapers published regularly from the office of publication, to actual subscribers, not weighing over two ounces, shall be chargeable with only half the foregoing rates.

Mr. OLDS. I rise to a question of order. The only way the gentleman can arrive at his object will be to offer a substitute for the section.

The SPEAKER. It is not competent for the gentleman to amend by striking out any portion of the amendment inserted on yesterday.

Mr. WASHBURN. I then move to add after the word "one," "and one half," so that it will read, "one and one half ounces."

The SPEAKER. That amendment is in order as it is an addition.

Mr. WASHBURN. I hope that amendment will be adopted, because it will confer upon the country papers the benefit of the reduction in postage which is proposed, whereas the bill as it now stands excludes them, or the most of them, notwithstanding what the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. OLDS] has stated. I know, in relation to the papers of my district, and of Maine generally, that it will exclude more than one half—I am inclined to think more than three fourths of them from the benefits of this law. I will say further, Mr. Speaker, that I do not like the provision in the first section which reduces the weight of newspapers from two and a half to two ounces. It seems to be a discrimination against the large papers, and those printed on the best paper, and which are, as a general thing, the most ably edited. The bill seems to have for its object a discrimination in favor of the poorest papers—the small daily penny papers, printed with small type on light, thin, and poor paper—and against those papers which are large in size, printed with good type, on good clean paper. I do not believe in the propriety, expediency, or profit of legislating in that direction. I hope this bill will be altered, if it is to be passed, and that it will include the two and a half ounces, as proposed originally. In that way justice would be done to the large newspapers, and by the adoption of the amendment I have submitted justice would be done to the papers in the rural districts. There should be a provision in the bill, and which I shall offer an amendment to secure, in order to protect the Treasury against this reduction, and to give the country papers the protection to which they are entitled. It is, that the reduction shall not extend to papers to be circulated outside of the States in which they are printed. The reduction should apply to papers circulating within the States. In that way justice would be done to the large newspapers and to the country papers. At any rate I hope the amendment I have now offered, which will enable country papers to obtain the advantages of this bill, will pass.

Mr. OLDS. I only wish to say to the gentleman from Maine, that I represent a rural district as well as himself. I think I have endeavored to attend to the interests of the rural portion of the country, and that we have given to it the full benefits of this bill, so far as regards postage on newspapers. The remarks of the gentleman are the same as those made by the gentleman from New York [Mr. Brooks] on yesterday. My remarks in reply to him will apply equally well to the argument of the gentleman from Maine. The gentleman's amendment destroys the symmetry of the bill. That is the very thing the House is now fighting for. The Senate last year undertook to amend the House bill, but destroyed it, and the country have called upon this House to restore the bill to the shape in which it passed this House at the last session of Congress. The present is nearly the same as the bill then passed. Every member of the Post Office Committee, not only of the House but of the Senate also, and the Postmaster General, have had their minds fixed upon this question, and it has received the closest scrutiny and investigation from them—a scrutiny, I am quite sure, equal to that which the gentleman from Maine [Mr. Washburn] can possibly give it. They have made it as perfect as they can. What shall we do? If you undertake to rearrange the tariff of postage fixed by the Committee and the Department, you will destroy the symmetry of the bill, and you will destroy that simplicity which the Committee on the Post Office have endeavored to approximate. The local press of the country have been provided for in the bill.

Mr. WASHBURN. I would inquire of the gentleman how it is to destroy the simplicity of the bill by permitting the amendment I have proposed, and by which papers published in the country may be circulated for one half the postage provided for in the bill?

Mr. OLDS. I will say that you have prepared and sent all over the country at an enormous expense a set of scales prepared for the use of the post offices of the country adapted to the even ounce weights. The bill originally proposed fixed upon two and a half ounces. The objection urged to it by the Post Office Department was, that it made all the computations of postage by fractions of an ounce. That is, in all computations of postage, you must be guided by half ounces up to a weight of four pounds. If you confine the operation of the gentleman's amendment to the circulation of papers in the State where published, it would be less objectionable. Again, we have provided for the rural districts of the country. We permit the papers of rural districts to circulate in their own counties free of postage. You charge no postage at all on weekly papers, and these are the ones which need the indulgence of the country. Under the old law and under the construction placed upon it by the Postmaster General, it did not permit, in fact, those papers to be sent free to persons who lived in the county, but who received their mails at post offices out of the county. When the office of delivery was out of the county, postage was demanded upon their country papers; but this has been remedied in this bill, and we provide that papers may be sent through the mails to subscribers living in the county, although they may be taken at post offices outside of the county.

Does this bill amply provide for the interest of the rural districts by giving the country newspapers a freer circulation in their own counties? I ask the House, if the committee have not attended to the rural interests of the country? I do not presume that the bill is perfect, but perhaps the wisdom of the next Congress, in connection with one year's experience of the Post Office Department, may suggest amendments, and perhaps the very amendment which the gentleman now offers; but the committees of the two Houses, and the Post Office Department, have, together, in their wisdom, fixed upon this as the best which can be done without detriment to the revenues of the Post Office Department. The committee only desire to accommodate the country with cheap postage, and the diffusion of intelligence. I trust, therefore, that the House will permit the bill to be passed without amendments being made, and if it should be found not to have the effect which the committee and the Department contemplate, then let the next Congress amend it again.

Mr. JENKINS. I should like to ask the gentleman a single question. Will the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. OLDS] allow me to say that the Globe printed yesterday, and dried, weighs an ounce and a quarter? It is proposed to charge such papers as that with double postage.

Mr. OLDS. Will the gentleman allow me a single suggestion? He will find the quality of the paper on which the Globe is printed exceeds in weight the country press.

Mr. JENKINS. Will the gentleman discriminate against a good quality of paper? Will he drive the country press to the use of poor paper?

Mr. OLDS. Not at all. The committee have no such intention. They have drafted this bill to meet the facts as they now exist in the country. Taking the quality and size of the country press, they have met them precisely. The gentleman has taken an extraordinary quality of paper, and the committee could not provide for every contingency of that kind.

Mr. BROOKS. I am glad that the gentleman from New York [Mr. JENKINS] has brought out this fact before the House, that the Globe, when dry, weighs an ounce and a quarter; and in order to get such a newspaper within the weight proposed by the Post Office Committee, it will have to be printed on a quality of material which would damage the eyesight of every man in the community who reads it—nay, such a newspaper as can be hardly read by people who are over forty years of age.

Mr. STANTON, of Tennessee. The Globe of yesterday had a supplement.

Mr. JENKINS. The supplement was not included in the weight.

Mr. BROOKS. This whole policy of weighing newspapers is an unwise policy from beginning to end, and in a country like ours, it ought never to have been considered. If any reformation is intended in the size of newspapers, and if it is intended that there must be smaller journals in the United States, carry out this great measure of retrograde reform by limiting, not the weight of the newspaper, but the size of the sheet. Reduce not the number of ounces, nor calculate the number of grains, but limit the number of square inches, and then you will not interfere with the quality of the material, upon which intelligence should be printed. You can have good paper then, if you insist upon having small sheets. But, sir, I do not see why this weighing of journals should be a thing more insisted upon in carrying the mails, than the weighing of passengers to go with the mails. There would be a general outcry, I think, if it should be demanded that a man weighing two hundred pounds, should not be transported over the mountains for the same compensation as a man who weighs one hundred and fifty pounds.

I think I could see what a storm would gather, if men should then be estimated by their weight. The little man even would be indignant at the privilege thus to be conferred upon him, if thus, as freight, he was to be transported by the pound! Sir, it does not at all follow, that because a journal may be small, it may not be very good, nay, better, and worth more than the journal of bulkier proportions or more imposing weight. We measure not intellect or men's appetites by the pound; and it would be just as reasonable, for a hotel keeper to be measuring and weighing men for their breakfast and dinner, as to be measuring or weighing journals, that the public appetite may be craving for intelligence.

The whole policy of limiting what should be carried by weight in the mails, is unwise and impolitic, when applied to newspapers, and one which a wise Congress should never entertain. If it is to be carried out and persisted in, in addition to these scales which are furnished the postmasters throughout the country, there should be furnished to each post office an oven where he can dry the paper, before he weighs it, as required in this bill. [Mr. JENKINS interposed.] My colleague suggests an argument of very great importance, to wit: that the religious newspapers in the country—and I believe it is a fact, so far as my knowledge extends—weigh over an ounce, and they have a circulation far and wide for great distances. This fact alone will have great effect when it comes before the country, and I trust it will have considerable weight when it comes before the House.

Another argument of the chairman of the Post Office Committee is this, that the Postmaster General and the committees of the two Houses have examined this subject thoroughly, and have agreed upon this bill. If I were willing that any one man should legislate for the country on postages, and make a Post Office law, I do not know of a gentleman whom I would rather select than the chairman of the committee, because he has given the subject much attention; but I am unwilling, upon a subject of this character, that any gentleman, or any committee, should thus legislate; and I am the more unwilling, when I reflect, that at the last session of Congress, the existing law applicable to newspapers was agreed upon by the two committees of the two Houses of Congress, and in some degree sanctioned by the executive head of the Department, and I believe it is generally admitted Congress could not have done worse, if it had tried. This fact, then, goes far to show that this is a subject which we should examine and understand ourselves, and that we should not leave it to the Post Office Committee, the Postmaster General, or anybody else, to provide for us, without our giving it a full and thorough consideration. There are great difficulties surrounding the whole subject. It is almost impossible, I admit, to frame a Post Office law which will give general satisfaction. The great radical and the pervading mischief of this bill is, that it first limits the size or weight of newspapers, encouraging bad quality of paper; and the next is, that while it reduces the rates of postage upon papers over one thousand miles, it increases it upon those under one thousand. There can hardly be any disagreement about these facts. There is no doubt that there is a reduction of postage in the bill when taken for the whole country from Texas, Oregon, and California, to Maine. I admit that fact, because, under the existing rates of postage upon weekly newspapers from the city of New York or from the city of Washington, to the city of San Francisco, the postage is thirty cents per quarter upon a weekly newspaper—a most outrageous postage, and one which ought never to have been established. In all distances the postage over one thousand miles is enormous, and because we should do right in this matter over one thousand miles, it is not a reason why we should do wrong under that distance. Why the wrong should not be done under one thousand miles is, that the great mass of the people of the country live under this one thousand miles prescribed in the bill, and the great body of newspapers are circulated in this circle of a thousand miles.

I intend, at the proper time after this amendment is disposed of, to try and amend this first section as far as possible, and perfect it. If I am not able to effect this, I intend to submit at the proper time a substitute for the first section of the bill, which shall preserve the symmetry of the existing bill.

Mr. CABLE, of Ohio. I admire the gentleman's zeal in the cause he professes to advocate. When you simmer down his argument it amounts to this: that he has determined that this Government shall become a common carrier for the city press, to break down the country press. That is the sum and substance of the gentleman's argument. It is well known to those who live in the West that the country press has to pay for the paper which they use twenty-five per cent. more than the city press. If the gentleman can make the Post Office Department a common carrier, it imposes much of the burden upon the country press of becoming a carrier for the Eastern press. But still the argument does not stop there. He must have it. If the Post Office Department carry one ounce for a certain price, it should carry two ounces, or a ton, as it were, for the same price. I do not see any justice or any common law in that matter, and neither do I see any common sense. It is a subterfuge to baffle the understanding of this House, and accomplish a certain purpose. When his argument is understood, then the House can determine; but the subterfuge is what I am attempting to expose. When we come to the second section of this bill, I wish to offer an amendment to make the phraseology more clear; but at present I shall add no more upon this subject.

Mr. SKELTON. I hope this amendment will prevail, and for two reasons: The honorable gentleman from Ohio, [Mr. CABLE,] who has just taken his seat, has given perhaps the true reason for limiting the circulation of these papers to one ounce. That is, they wish to exclude the large and more valuable papers of the large cities from coming into competition with the small papers of the rural districts.

Mr. CABLE. I do not wish the gentleman to misrepresent me. My point was that I was opposed to this Government, or the Post Office Department, becoming a common carrier to carry papers from the East to the West free of charge.

Mr. SKELTON. I will answer the gentleman upon that subject when I have disposed of the first point. This appears to me to be the only reason for the adoption of the one ounce weight. The most valuable papers published in the United States are all the publications of our large cities. Now, in advocating the free circulation of these large and valuable papers, I am sensible that is opposing perhaps the wishes of the publishers of the small rural papers in our districts; but I believe the view which these men have taken of the interests of the small rural papers to be ill founded. I am sure that it is conceived in narrow prejudice, and should not be indulged in this House. How, sir, can the country press be injured by the circulation of the large and more valuable papers of the large cities? Can you prevent the circulation of those large papers through the rural districts by putting upon them a heavy postage?

What is the effect of this high rate of postage at the present time, upon the circulation of the large papers of cities weighing over one ounce? Notwithstanding that nine tenths of the papers weigh less than one ounce, yet the other one tenth of these papers published in the United States are the most valuable papers, papers most worthy of being read, and placed in the hands of every citizen throughout the country. And it is for the purpose, in the first place, of giving extensive circulation to the intelligence of the large cities, of the religious and more moral papers of our country, that we ought to adopt the amendment offered by the honorable gentleman from Maine, [Mr. WASHINGTON.] The gentleman on my left [Mr. CABLE, of Ohio,] asks, Shall we make the United States mails the common carriers of the country? For what purpose were the mails established but for the circulation of written and printed intelligence through the country? And we have this additional inducement to pass this amendment: while it will contribute to the circulation of intelligence, and promote morality throughout our country, it will at the same time contribute to increase the revenue derived to the Post Office Department. What would be the effect of placing these rates of postage, high as they now are, on the circulation of the larger papers? Why it is to take them out of the United States mail. I know, from my personal knowledge, that a large amount of the papers published in the larger cities are passed through private carriers, and not through the United States mail—and why? Because the rate of postage is so high that an individual can engage in carrying these papers in packages, and circulate them extensively through the country, thus depriving the Post Office Department of the revenue which it ought to receive. Now, sir, I have two reasons for advocating this amendment. First, for the more general diffusion of intelligence and morals; and secondly, for increasing the revenue of the mail service of the United States. If these two objects are not sufficient to induce honorable members of this House to vote for this proposition, I know of no consideration that will be of sufficient weight to induce gentlemen to vote for the amendment.

Mr. CHANDLER. I have a few observations to make upon this matter, but as the gentleman from New York proposes to offer a substitute for the first section, I may as well postpone the remarks I have to make. It appears to me that the committee overlook what has been the intention of Congress for a long time, and that is to cheapen the price of the conveyance of all valuable articles by mail. We have reduced the postage upon letters, and the result has been satisfactory to the country, and is, I believe, likely to be profitable to the nation. A letter, after all, is nothing but a luxury, or a convenience, at any rate. While daily our people ask through the mails their daily bread from the public papers, any attempt to augment the expenses of receiving those papers would operate against the common sense of the community. My friend here from New York, [Mr. Brooks,] complains that the effect of augmenting the prices of conveying newspapers, would be to injure the character and appearance of the press; and he also complains, having been closely connected with the press, that a reduction in the quality of the paper, with a view to reduce the price to the subscribers, has been an injury to the public sight. My friend has, according to Shakspeare, got him spectacles like scurvy politicians, and seems to see what is scarcely visible in the papers. But the gentleman on my left, the chairman of the committee, [Mr. OLDS,] says that we shall spoil the symmetry of this bill by introducing something like justice into it. The only remark I have to make upon that is, to refer to the anecdote of Paul Jones's father, who shut up little Paul in the right, hand summer-house of the garden, because he had in the left-hand summer-house a boy who had been stealing plums, and the reason assigned to the master of the garden was, that it destroyed the symmetry of the garden to have a summer-house with a boy in it on one side, and an empty summer-house on the other. Now, sir, my friend is going to do great injustice, in order to preserve the symmetry of the bill. I cannot comprehend, even admitting that nine tenths of the public papers weigh less than one ounce, why the small number, only the one tenth, must be called upon to pay higher prices. If evil results from conveying heavy papers, the smaller the number of those papers, the less will be the injury. Why, we shall, by-and-by, have to construct a small door for small members to get into this Hall, and a larger one for you, Mr. Speaker, and my friend from Massachusetts, [Mr. FOWLER,] "goodly corpulent men, pleasant with all, and of a merry disposition," who shall come in at the side door, in order to preserve the symmetry of this House.

True is it that the whole country has been asking for years past for a reduction of the postage upon mailable matter. The reason that it was not effected upon newspapers was by an oversight, I believe, in the action here, and haste in the legislation of the country—a haste, I believe, that is not to be charged upon any of our legislation during this year; but it may be chargeable upon that which we shall have to do.

The periodical press is concerned in this matter, and if I read aright that bill, it will destroy the symmetry of every monthly and quarterly periodical published in the country at the present time. If I remember correctly, there is not a periodical that can pass through the mail at the rate set up here, and the result will be, that they will make their papers smaller. Not that they will publish them more frequently—that cannot be done—but they will find other means of conveying their periodicals to their readers than by the public mails; and instead of gaining, we shall lose by this symmetry of the bill. Every one knows that it is now much cheaper to send periodicals from the place of publication to the place of distribution in large towns and cities, by the ordinary express general conveyances, than it is by the mail, and therefore we see books distributed in that way, because the price of postage is so large; and thus the very object had in view of encouraging the public press, is entirely defeated by an attempt to screw something more out of the readers of the papers and periodicals. I do not wish to press this any further; but I call the attention of the House to the fact, that we are legislating here against the public press—the character and appearance of the press—while in England, the greatest place for publicists in the world; the public newspapers that weigh from one to three ounces—and I presume to say that the London Times, the double sheet, does not weigh less than three ounces—go over every part of the United Kingdom without postage, because they are public papers.

Now, Mr. Chairman, we seem to be levying a tax upon knowledge by augmenting the price of our papers from the place of publication to the places where they are most read, and I protest against it, not merely on behalf of the publishers of the papers, but in the name and behalf of the people who are benefited by the distribution of these papers. It is no argument against this that a portion of the public press is not what it ought to be. All I have to say is, that if any part is deficient in morality and respectability, it is the more necessary that we should extend the circulation of the better portion. I shall defer my argument upon the principal provisions of the bill until the gentleman from New York has offered his substitute for it. In the mean time, I hope this House will not be carried away by any of the recommendations of the committee that merely proposes symmetry in the bill.

Mr. HOUSTON. Has the morning hour expired?

The SPEAKER. It has.

Mr. OLDS. I move to recommit the bill to the Committee on the Post Office and Post Roads.

Mr. HOUSTON. I move that the rules be suspended, and that the House resolve itself into the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union.

Mr. DANIEL. I should be very glad to have the bills upon the Speaker's table disposed of, if I could; but the gentleman from Alabama having submitted his motion, I will submit a motion which will have priority over it; and that is, that the House will resolve itself into Committee of the Whole upon the Private Calendar.

The SPEAKER. The question must first be taken upon the motion of the gentleman from North Carolina.

The question was then taken, and it was decided in the negative—ayes 45, noes not counted.

So the motion was not agreed to.

The question recurred upon Mr. Houston's motion, and being put, was agreed to.

So the rules were suspended, and the House resolved itself into the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union, (Mr. STUART in the chair.)

DEFICIENCY BILL—COLLINS LINE.

The CHAIRMAN stated as the first business before the committee the consideration of the amendments of the Senate to House bill No. 207, "to supply deficiencies in the appropriations for the service of the fiscal year ending 30th of June, 1852," and that the amendment immediately under consideration was the following, viz:

"For additional compensation for increasing the transportation of the United States mail between New York and Liverpool, in the Collins line of steamers, to twenty-six trips per annum, at such times as shall be directed by the Postmaster General, and in conformity to his last annual report to Congress, and his letter of the 15th of November last to the Secretary of the Navy, commencing said increased service on the 1st of January, 1852, at the rate of $23,000 per trip, in lieu of the present allowance, the sum of $236,500: Provided, That it shall be in the power of Congress, at any time after the 31st day of December, 1854, to terminate the arrangement for the additional allowance herein provided for, upon giving six months' notice."

The question immediately pending is the proposition of the gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. MASON] to strike out "six," and insert "two," in the sixteenth line of the amendment, in reference to the Collins steamers.

The question was then taken upon Mr. MASON's amendment, and it was not agreed to.

PUBLISHED AT WASHINGTON, BY JOHN C. RIVES.—TERMS $3 FOR THIS SESSION.

32D CONGRESS, 1ST SESSION.

TUESDAY, JULY 13, 1852.

NEW SERIES....No. 109.

The CHAIRMAN stated that the question recurred upon agreeing to the first clause of the Senate amendment.

Mr. HOUSTON demanded tellers; which were ordered.

Mr. ORR. What did the Chair state was the question?

The CHAIRMAN. It is on agreeing to the first division of the Senate amendment.

Mr. ORR. I have an amendment to offer if it is in order.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman will send up his amendment.

Mr. ORR. I propose, Mr. Chairman, to strike out the entire amendment, and insert that which I send to the Clerk's desk to be read.

Mr. WALSH. I rise to a point of order; and it is that this amendment comes too late. The committee had divided already, and tellers were called for.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair thinks the amendment is not too late. It may be offered any time before the vote is taken. There is a motion pending to strike out the clause.

Mr. ORR. I suppose that this motion to strike out and insert would take precedence over the motion to strike out?

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair will state to the gentleman what the rule is upon this subject: "A motion to strike out and insert shall be deemed indivisible, but a motion to strike out being lost, shall preclude neither amendment nor a motion to strike out and insert." The Chair was in error in stating the question first in order this morning. The pending question is upon the motion of the gentleman from Georgia [Mr. STEPHENS] to strike out this clause.

Mr. ORR. Suppose the House refuses to strike out, will it then be in order for me to offer my amendment?

The CHAIRMAN. It will.

Mr. ORR. Then I shall offer it.

Mr. STEVENS, of Pennsylvania. I offer the following amendment to come in at the end of the section:

In order to raise revenue to defray the money appropriated by this and other laws—

Be it enacted, &c., That the duties to be levied on goods, wares, and merchandise, imported into the United States, shall be assessed on the average price which such articles bore in the principal markets of the United States on the 1st day of December, 1846; such price to be ascertained by the Secretary of the Treasury.

Mr. HART. I rise to a point of order, which is, that that is not germane to the bill.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair thinks the amendment of the gentleman from Pennsylvania is not in order.

Mr. STEVENS. I offer that amendment in order to raise the revenue hereby appropriated. I think it is in order to see who wants general protection instead of special protection, and I appeal from the decision of the Chair.

Mr. HOUSTON. I wish to ask the Chair, or the gentleman from Pennsylvania, a question. I want to understand this amendment. Do I understand that the gentleman proposes to increase the duty upon iron for the purpose of paying the additional expenses of the Collins line?

Mr. STEVENS. I ask that the amendment may be again read.

The Clerk read the amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair decides this amendment to be out of order. From that decision the gentleman from Pennsylvania takes an appeal. The question is, Shall the decision of the Chair stand as the judgment of the committee?

Mr. STEVENS. I ask for tellers upon the amendment.

Tellers were ordered, and Messrs. CHANDLER and MASON were appointed.

The question was then taken, and the tellers reported—ayes 82, noes not counted.

So the decision of the Chair was sustained.

The question recurred on Mr. STEPHENS's motion to strike out the clause.

Mr. STEVENS, of Pennsylvania. I now move to amend the amendment by striking out "$33,000" and inserting "$20,000."

The CHAIRMAN. That amendment has already been voted down.

Mr. STEVENS. Then I move to insert "$21,000."

Mr. S. said: Mr. Chairman, as those who vote against this appropriation have been denounced by several fervent gentlemen, as wanting in patriotism and deficient in nationality, I deem it proper to give a few reasons why I shall be found among that class. This is essentially a measure of protection, not by the imposition of duties, but by the donation of a large bounty to a particular firm. I am in favor of the protection of American enterprise, when it is made general, so that every American citizen may partake of its benefits—may compete for its possession. Now, a law giving a million of dollars a year to any American citizens who shall carry the mail from New York, Boston, or Philadelphia, to England, in the shortest time, and in the best vessels, I will vote for. That is impartial reward to honest competition. But to bestow a large bounty on a particular firm to the exclusion of all others, is, in my sight, profligate favoritism. I am for encouraging all American mechanics and manufacturers by equal and general laws. But to select particular mechanics or manufacturers, cotton mills or iron works; and sustain them alone by bounties against foreign competition, is not fair American legislation; but is unwise, unjust, if not corrupt favoritism. That is the identical case before us. This separating a particular interest from all others, and giving it isolated protection, is suicidal to the system of general protection. It takes away a portion of its friends.

But we are told that this is patriotic, because it is sustaining American enterprise against British competition. Sir, it is sustaining this line against all American competition. It is enabling this company, by governmental aid, to reduce the price of freight and fare below what any other American steamers can afford to carry for. In short, it is giving a monopoly to them of all the passengers, specie, and valuable freight between the two countries.

But this is sustained as a great measure of defense, by building up a steam war navy. Four merchant steamers to compete with the eight hundred war steamers of England! Sir, it is simply absurd. Beside, they are not fit for war vessels, and never can be made so. Wheel vessels have been found wholly unfit for war. A few broadsides carry away their wheels and totally disable them. They are abandoned by the British Admiralty, who are building all their war steamers with screw-propellers, hid under the stern, out of the way of gunshot. Their large frigates, nearly a hundred of them, have already been thus altered. No, sir; these paddle boats to skim the ocean in a race, are fit for nothing but to flee from the enemy. But national glory is concerned! In what? In being the swiftest vessels? Why, sir, this was accomplished before ever Collins became a mendicant on the Government. American ship-builders had long ago distanced all rivals on the ocean, and that at their own expense. Why not make it a matter of national glory to have the swiftest breed of horses and hounds?

But, sir, I admit that this discussion has rebounded to the honor of the nation, by elevating the tone and improving the taste of parliamentary oratory. Why, the gentleman from Tennessee, [Mr. POLK,] and others, in their furious patriotism, have evoked the martyrs of the Revolution from their peaceful graves at Lexington, Concord, Bunker's Hill, and Yorktown, and seated them at this feast on board the Collins steamer. This is a slight departure, to be sure, from the classical injunction, not to enlist a god unless the service be worthy of him. What has produced this glowing fervor among certain advocates of this grant? If a proposition is before you to appropriate money to pay just debts, loan-office certificates for money advanced the country in time of need, or pensions to old soldiers, it can hardly find a hearing, and is sure to be rejected. But put millions into the bill, and it is impossible to defeat it. Any bill can be carried by those who have millions at their command, with hampers of champagne annexed.

The friends of this special protection have just voted against my amendment, to give general protection by an equal tariff, and I will vote against this grant.

[Here the hammer fell.]

Mr. MASON. Mr. Chairman, I am opposed to that amendment, and I am opposed to it partly because it increases the donation to this company.

Now, sir, those gentlemen who advocate this increased appropriation to the Collins steamers, do it on the ground that it is absolutely necessary in order to keep the line in operation, and they charge those who are opposed to the increase of compensation with being opposed to the line, opposed to the mail steam service altogether, and with being, if not traitors to the American side of the question, at least in favor of the British side. Now, sir, it would not be difficult to prove that the very individuals who are for this increased compensation, are acting against mail steam service in general; for they are making these lines cost so much that the nation will not be able to keep up many of them, and therefore they will be reduced to few in number. Cannot a system of economy be introduced into this steam mail service, which will extend it instead of reducing it? We had a sample of these mail steamers sent round for the American Congress and American people to examine. We are told that the expense of these steamers per trip, is so heavy that the company cannot bear it. Well, sir, cannot a steamer run as fast, beat a British steamer just as well, and protect American commerce just as well, with $5,000 worth of looking-glasses in it, as with $10,000 worth? Cannot it perform this important service to the country by carrying the mails, and protecting our commerce, just as well by having its furniture made out of plain American walnut, as by having it made out of rosewood and mahogany? Could not it compare as advantageously with other steamers that float the ocean, with a tea-service that cost $1,250, as with one that cost $2,500? Cannot all these expenses be reduced to a certain rate of economy, such as we and our constituents are accustomed to at home? Cannot these steamers do just as important service to the Government, and reflect just as much honor and credit to the Government, by going on a more economical scale, as by going into extravagances such as were manifested to every one who visited the Baltic?

The question was then taken on Mr. STEVENS's amendment, and it was disagreed to.

Mr. EWING moved to amend the amendment by striking out "January" and inserting "July" instead thereof.

Mr. E. said: By the excellent example shown us upon both sides of this question, I discover that it is quite possible to give, within the space of five minutes, at least the principal reasons which induce us to vote for or against the proposed Senate amendment.

If I remember rightly, Mr. Chairman, the proposition for the reduction of postage, which was adopted in the last Congress, came from the city of New York. This House was then flooded with printed memorials, and there was the same outside pressure brought to bear upon it then as now, in order that those large firms, with an immense correspondence, might get their postage at the rate of three cents, that being to them, at least, a considerable object, and they having, besides, railroads, steamboats, and every other facility for intercourse and travel, totally independent of the Post Office Department. Now, sir, in the sparsely populated portions of this country the people are dependent on the Post Office Department for the facilities of intercourse so essential to the progress and prosperity of the country. By this reduction of postage in the first instance, it was necessary to pass laws compelling the Department to grind down contractors to the lowest limits, to have the mails carried in the cheapest possible form, having them weighed to see whether two horses could haul them, or whether it would be necessary to hitch on four horses. Let a contractor go to the Department with a bushel of memorials asking for the reestablishment of some old line which formerly existed, but has been abolished in consequence of the reduction of postage, and he will be told that the mails must be weighed, and if they are too heavy for two horses, then, and then only, will he be paid for four. And then, if he comes to the Department for indemnity upon a losing contract, he will be laughed at. Sir, I know something about these things. I have had some experience in these matters, because I had the honor of being a mail contractor myself before I came down in the world to the position which I now occupy. [Laughter.]

Well, sir, after reducing the postage, chiefly for the benefit of New York and similar communities, we are now called upon, after having made a contract with certain trans-Atlantic mail contractors, at their own prices—for, I believe, the contract was not given, originally, to the lowest bidder—we are now called upon to pay them a bonus out of the Treasury. This is cheap postage with a vengeance. A great deal is said about the excellence of these steamers. They are certainly the deepest draught steamers I have yet heard of—drawing thirty-three feet in the National Treasury. [Laughter.] Sir, if it is the cheapest mode of sustaining a navy, to have our vessels hired out and pay men for using them, let us keep up the Navy on a system of that sort, applied to sail vessels as well as steamers. If there is any advantage in it, it ought to be general. After we have worked out a correct system, I like to have everything conform to that system.

Mr. MOLONY. Mr. Chairman, I will briefly give the reasons for my opposition to the amendment now pending before this committee. It is not a question simply involving dollars and cents; if so there would not be, in my mind, insurmountable objections to it, although in that regard the objection is not a light one.

As a means of transporting the mails of the United States from New York to Liverpool, the proposition is nakedly to give to the "Collins line" $600,000 per annum from the National Treasury more than Mr. Tibbets proposes to carry them for, with all of the guarantee that the Government might demand for their transportation according to contract; a difference in proposals, amounting in 1860, the termination of the Collins contract, to not less than $5,000,000. An out and out bonus to that company from the National Treasury, for which the nation will receive no consideration whatever.

The consideration of dollars and cents, therefore, presents to my mind objections to the passage of this amendment, which, if not insurmountable, are of great weight.

But there is an objection to which there has been repeated allusions in the course of this debate, which makes it impossible for me, as a Democrat, to support it, having in view the principles of Jacksonian Democracy and the Constitution of my country. It is the principle of protection that is involved in this proposition—not protection to a great American interest, embracing and benefiting all connected with that interest, but protection of an individual enterprise, and that, too, to the injury of the whole commercial marine of the country. Yes, sir, this amendment, if passed, appropriates in the next eight years, $5,000,000 of the people's money, for which they receive no equivalent, and the shipping interests of the country an injury from the unjust discrimination against them.

It has been, for a long while, a cardinal doctrine of the Democratic party, that the great iron and cotton interests, in which are involved hundreds of millions of capital, and upon the prosperity of which hangs the fortunes of so many thousands, and the bread and raiment of millions of American citizens, should not be supported by a tax upon the whole nation; and to the amendment of the gentleman from Pennsylvania, [Mr. STEVENS,] which has just been voted down, and properly, too, because of the principle of protection contained in it to the iron interests of Pennsylvania, the Democracy presented an unbroken front of opposition, as they ever have done, to protection to a class at the expense of the whole people.

Yet, sir, some gentlemen, to whom the Democracy of the country have long looked as champions of their cause, turn right round, leave the rank and file upon the Democratic side of the House, and are found standing shoulder to shoulder with the Whigs, in support of this very principle of protection, as embraced in the Senate amendment now before us;—only differing from the principle of a protective tariff in its application, being in this amendment applied in the most objectionable form ever presented to an American Congress—the protection, nakedly and solely, of an individual enterprise, at the expense of our National Treasury. Protection to any portion of our people at the expense of the whole nation, is a Whig, not a Democratic principle. But if I could be induced to sustain the principle as applied in any form, I would most certainly sustain the amendment of the gentleman from Pennsylvania in preference to the Senate amendment now pending. The former would be voting a given amount from the people's Treasury into the pockets of the iron interests of Pennsylvania, embracing thousands of our citizens, while the proposition before us proposes to give the same to an individual.

Mr. MOORE, of Pennsylvania. If we continue to make five minute speeches upon the general principles and features of this bill, we will never get a vote upon it. And I feel it my duty to give notice to the House, that I will endeavor to enforce the rules of the House, so as to confine gentlemen in their remarks to the subject of their amendments.

The question was then taken on the amendment offered by Mr. EWING, and it was not agreed to.

Mr. JOHNSON, of Georgia. Is a motion to strike out and insert in order?

The CHAIRMAN. If it applies to the entire clause it is not in order.

Mr. JOHNSON. Then I move to strike out "Liverpool" and insert the word "Trieste." The recital in this bill, and the objects stated in it, for which this appropriation is asked, differ from the arguments proposed for the consideration of this House. Why should we make this appropriation? What are its objects, and what its purpose? It is to transmit the mail, as provided for in the bill. And what are the arguments to support it? One is, as I understand, that we have entered into a contest, as a nation, with Great Britain, and we must come out of that contest victors.

Another is, we must add to our greatness as a nation; that we must build up a navy that will protect the nation, and be the admiration of all the world; that England has a splendid navy, and that we, too, must make preparations for having one of a like or similar character.

Mr. MOORE, (interrupting.) My friend from Georgia [Mr. JOHNSON] will understand that it is not out of any discourtesy to him that I interrupt him, but that I feel bound to enforce the position I assumed a few moments ago. I ask the Chair if the gentleman's remarks are in order?

Mr. JOHNSON. I wish to make these remarks apply to the amendment I proposed. If this sum will authorize them to go to Liverpool, it will authorize them to go to Trieste.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair does not as yet see the gentleman's application. [Laughter.]

Mr. MOORE. I did not understand the Chair's decision.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair states that the gentleman intends to show, that his remarks are applicable to prove that if the sum proposed to be given by this amendment will carry one of these vessels to Liverpool, it will carry it to Trieste. The Chair does not yet see the application.

Mr. JOHNSON. One argument used by these gentlemen is, that we must prepare for war, and that these vessels can be converted into vessels fitted for service in times of war. Well, the testimony is, Mr. Chairman, that they are unfit for war purposes, except for vessels for transport, and if that is our purpose, march up boldly and directly, and say that our purpose is not to transport a mail, but to build up a navy for the purposes of war. If it be for the purpose of transporting the mail, let us transport it across the waters as we transport it across the land.

Mr. CARTTER. On horseback?

Mr. JOHNSON. Let out the contract to the lowest bidder.

If, sir, the object is to enable a competition to be sustained between the United States and Great Britain, in the transportation of merchandise and passengers, let us, as has been remarked by the gentleman from Pennsylvania, [Mr. STEVENS,] enable all our vessels to compete with Great Britain in that respect.

Has this Government the power to grant a bonus of this character? Under what clause of the Constitution is it to give it? We have power to transmit the mails, but in transmitting the mails it is necessary to have regard to the principles of justice and equity.

Mr. GOODENOW. The gentleman is out of order.

Mr. JOHNSON. I have said all I desire to say, and I will take my seat. [Laughter.]

Mr. BROOKS. I rise to oppose the amendment of the gentleman from Georgia, [Mr. JOHNSON,] and I hope, if I am not strictly in order, the rules of the House will be enforced. I want to try an experiment to see if there is any way of bringing this debate to a close.

The proposition now before the House is to transfer the terminus of the line from Liverpool to Trieste; and if I am in order, it will be my duty only to show why the transfer should not take place.

The CHAIRMAN assented.

Mr. BROOKS. Then, sir, as these steamers, in order to reach Trieste, would have to pass by the Straits of Gibraltar, I propose to descant for a while upon the Pillars of Hercules, then to give loose to my fancy on the classic shores of the Mediterranean, and to evoke here, for the consideration of the committee, the departed spirits and living remembrances of Italy and of Greece. It will not be difficult for me to show, I am sure, that a much more beautiful prospect will be presented to the traveler in these steamers, thus coursing in these seas by such coasts, and amid the islands that gem these seas, than if he were to go to the cold and rocky shores of England.

Mr. FOWLER, (interrupting.) I rise to a question of order. [Laughter.] The gentleman's remarks are out of order.

Mr. BROOKS. Then it will be my duty to sit down, if the point of order is decided against me.

Mr. FOWLER. I insist that the Chair shall decide the question of order. He is not opposing the amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. So far as the gentleman from New York proceeded, the Chair could not tell whether he was in favor of the amendment, or not. He was giving a beautiful illustration of what the trip would be, provided the amendment prevailed. [Laughter.]

Mr. BROOKS. I am glad that I have been able to proceed thus far in my speech without a successful arrest by the astute gentleman who sits before me upon this point of order.

In arguing this question, and I hope I shall not be interrupted again, as I have only five minutes allowed me, it is my purpose to show that whoever embarks in these steamers for Trieste, must pass by the Pillars of Hercules, and have on either side the classic shores of the Mediterranean, all rich in historical renown. There is Sicily, with Ætna upon it, whose base is surrounded with villages and clothed with vineyards, and there is the beautiful bay of Naples, and the far-famed Vesuvius, with Pompeii and Herculaneum disintegrated from lava at its foot. It would not be difficult to show, sir, that the tourist would be more tempted to take, and would be more enlightened in taking, this trip than in coasting the English channel amid the rocks and fogs of England. It would not be difficult to make him linger as he ascended the Adriatic, either at the base of the hills, near which is the little Republic of San Marino, or where is the sea-born Venice; but if I attempted all this it might not be strictly in order, as it would rather show "Liverpool" should be struck out and "Trieste" put in, to which I am—

Mr. GOODENOW. The gentleman's remarks are not in order. The gentleman from Georgia moves to strike out the word Liverpool and insert Trieste. It seems to me that the argument of the gentleman from New York [Mr. Brooks] was to show that it would be much more pleasant and beautiful to go to Trieste, and therefore is in favor of the proposition, when it should be against it, for the mover of this proposition [Mr. JOHNSON] spoke in favor of it.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair thinks the argument of the gentleman from New York [Mr. BROOKS] is upon the affirmative of the proposition, and not in opposition to it, and therefore not in order. [Laughter.]

Mr. KING, of New York. Is this question debatable?

The CHAIRMAN. It is not.

The question was then taken on adopting the amendment offered by Mr. JOHNSON, and it was not agreed to.

Mr. MOLONY. I move to strike out thirty-three, and insert twenty-four.

Mr. CARTER. I think that amendment has been once offered.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair thinks that amendment has not yet been made.

Mr. MOLONY. Strong appeals have been made to the patriotism of this House in behalf of the pending amendment.

[Cries of "Order!" "Order!" and "What is the amendment?"]

Mr. TAYLOR. Will the chairman have the amendment reported? We do not understand it.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman proposes to strike out thirty-three and insert twenty-four.

Mr. MOLONY. Wherever American industry and American capital is struggling for ascendancy over British or any foreign competition—for America, my liveliest sympathies are always enlisted. But, sir, those sympathies are subordinate to my convictions of constitutional duty, which forbid that I should vote moneys from the Treasury of the nation into the pockets of a class, and for a stronger reason—for individual enterprises. We have been told here, that President Polk recommended, and the Democrats of that Congress unanimously voted for an appropriation to this line. What were the objects contemplated in that recommendation, and the reasons which induced the Democracy to adopt his recommendation? Was it not for the purpose of increasing our naval steam-marine? Also for the purpose of effecting the transportation of our transatlantic mail, in the most economical way? Was not, sir, President Polk and the Democrats in Congress at that time made to believe that this mail arrangement with the "Collins line" would not only be the most economical, but that in a short time it would be self-supporting; in other words, sustained by postage alone, without one dollar's expense to the Treasury? Such, Mr. Chairman, were President Polk's reasons for that recommendation, and which justified it. But, sir, have these constitutional and proper objects been realized, and have we now any reason to expect them?

Sir, the concurrent testimony of all naval architects, and naval commanders, whose testimony is before us, establish one fact beyond a doubt, and that is, that these steamers are not fit for war purposes. Commodore Perry, who is a friend of the line, and who is before us as a witness for the line, admits that they are not fitted for naval conflict with ships-of-the-line, but that they could only be useful in keeping up a guerilla warfare upon the commercial marine of the enemy, and first-rate for running away from an enemy when danger should be imminent! He thinks that they would be useful for the transportation of men and the munitions of war, and for the convey of our Navy, a service, all of which our commercial marine would be competent and ready to render when the exigency shall arise. The increase of our steam naval marine is not accomplished, then, as contemplated by President Polk. Is the postal arrangement an economical one, as it was expected to be, or is the tax upon the Treasury for the transportation of the mail growing less and less, and rapidly approaching the point of self-support, without any aid from the Treasury? After the "line" has been in operation two years, the company are begging us to give them $364,000 more for carrying the mail per annum than their contract entitles them to, and $598,000 per year more than a responsible bidder offers to take it for. Disguise the matter as gentlemen may, and can, this amendment of the Senate does not contemplate the increase of our Navy—nor does it the economical transportation of the mail. Such were President Polk's hopes and expectations, when the combination of war and commercial purposes in the same vessel was an untried experiment; but, sir, the experiment has been tried, and signally failed through these steamers; neither is the naval arm of our defense strengthened, or our mails transported economically; and the only object which has been urged that remains for this appropriation is, to enable an American to beat a British steamer in a boat race!

Mr. MOORE, of Pennsylvania. I am opposed to the amendment, and call for a vote on it.

The question was then taken, and the amendment to the amendment was disagreed to.

Mr. STEVENS, of Pennsylvania, moved an amendment pro forma, and addressed the committee five minutes upon it. [The remarks will be found embodied in his first speech upon the same subject, in a preceding column of this day's proceedings.]

Mr. STANTON, of Tennessee. There are two ideas which have been presented in this discussion to which I wish to reply in the few moments allowed me by the rules under which we are discussing. One of them was alluded to by the gentleman from Pennsylvania, who has just taken his seat, and it is, that these steamers are unfit for war purposes, because they are side-wheel steamers. The gentleman seems to have the idea that in future times the new element of steam in operation, and with all the power which it gives vessels, will be applied for the purpose of going out on the ocean, and standing side by side, to fire at each other, as was the fashion in former days when we sent out these old hulks of the line-of-battle ships and frigates to do that sort of thing. That will not be the case in future wars; but if it were, a side-wheel steamer is not so vulnerable as the gentleman seems to imagine. Unless a shot strikes the shaft fair, full, and perpendicular, there would be no injury done. You might shoot one hundred shots through the wheel, and knock off a few of the paddles, but in all probability the speed of the ship would be increased in consequence; because the error heretofore has been that we have had too many instead of too few paddles. The shaft could not be struck perpendicular, once in a million of shots. Besides, sir, the old system of fighting with thirty-two or forty-four pounders has been or will be entirely superseded, and the mode of contest will be with shells weighing from sixty-four to one hundred and thirty-two pounds, from eight to eleven inches in diameter. To plant one of these shells in the proper place, at the water-line, going into the hold of a vessel will destroy it.

Now, sir, so far as the vulnerability of the machinery is concerned, an idea which has been presented by some one in the discussions here, the experiments at our navy-yard have shown that a very simple coal bunker, some four or five feet in width, filled with coal, will arrest the force of a sixty-four pounder, and render it perfectly harmless. One of the shells fell into that coal-bunker, passing through the side of the vessel into the coal, exploded there without even setting fire to the bituminous coal. So the machinery of these steamers will be entirely shielded by ordinary coal bunkers, with the exception of the shaft of the wheel, which may or may not be struck; so that, sir, it is not by any means settled that the propellers, which never can attain as high a speed as side-wheel steamers, are superior even for many purposes of war to the side-wheel steamers.

Another idea has been presented by the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. STEVENS]—if not by him, at least by some other gentleman this morning, that costly furniture and other costly arrangements about these ships have swollen the costs, and therefore increased the expenditure very largely. Now, I have information which I believe to be entirely correct, that the gilding and the mahogany and maple panels, stained glass and everything about any one of these vessels—that is merely put there for ornament—did not amount to $8,000 or $10,000 for each vessel, and that upon a sum of about $700,000. Of $3,000,000, $8,000 or $10,000 to each vessel, amounts to a very small item, and does not, to any considerable extent, swell the expenditure. As to champagne, I can only say when I went on board the Baltic, the people got—

Mr. STEVENS demanded tellers upon his amendment; which were not ordered.

The question was then taken on the amendment to strike out "33,000," and in lieu thereof insert "32,200," and it was disagreed to.

[Cries of "Question!" "Question!"]

The CHAIRMAN. The question recurs on the amendment of the gentleman from Georgia, [Mr. STEPHENS.]

Mr. ORR demanded tellers; which were ordered.

Mr. MEADE here made some statement in regard to the receipts and expenditures of the Collins line, to show that there was no necessity for an increase of appropriation to sustain that line.

Mr. FOWLER. I am opposed to the amendment, as I am to the further consumption of time on this subject, and therefore call for the question.

Mr. MEADE. I think this is an important amendment. I am thoroughly convinced, in my own mind, eleven per cent. profit is amply sufficient, and therefore demand tellers.

Tellers were ordered, and Messrs. STANTON, of Tennessee, and HENDRICKS were appointed.

The question was then taken on the amendment of Mr. MEADE, to strike out "33,000," and in lieu thereof to insert "32,000," and it was not agreed to; the tellers having reported—ayes 47, noes 74.

Mr. SAVAGE. I move to amend by adding the following:

And that the additional allowance given by this act shall terminate on the 1st day of December, 1854.

It is not my purpose on this occasion to urge any serious objection against the additional compensation proposed to be given by this bill. I shall be content to limit it to that which the bill itself seems to propose—a protection for a short time.

I am one of those who doubt the policy of establishing this line of steamers—but I waive that point. I am not convinced that they require the aid that they are now asking of us, or if they do require it, that it is not the result of want of economy on the part of the managers. I believe this project will prove one of the most profitable speculations that could possibly be entered into by these contractors, and will sustain itself and afford ample remuneration to its owners. If the company needs protection, it is only for a short time, as the profits which are necessarily attached to the business will soon be sufficient to sustain it. But if this compensation is given in the form proposed by the bill, it is given forever, and will be a perpetual tax upon the Treasury.

I have no doubt but that the stock in the Collins line will, in a short time, be the most valuable in the country, and the object I have in view by the amendment, is to provide that this extra compensation shall cease in two years from this time.

It is alleged that this line is in great pecuniary difficulty—and I admit that I may be mistaken in regard to their immediate necessities—but if we are to give money to every company that asks for it, and which may come with some show of justice to demand it at our hands, we shall not have a dollar in the Treasury in a very short time.

A great noise is made about patriotism, which I do not understand as being involved in the issue. I remember that a few months since, we were lectured upon patriotism and the rights of "down-trodden humanity throughout the world." Some of us were then abused because we could not bow to the prevailing spirit of Kossuthism which swept over the country, and by the very men who are to-day lecturing us for standing up for the Treasury against this line of steamers.

According to this new creed, patriotism consists in a lavish expenditure of the public money to build up this line of steamers in rivalry to Great Britain. Why do not gentlemen go further, and carry out the principle—rival her House of Lords, her laws of primogeniture, her national debt, her immense navy and standing army? The argument is simply ridiculous. There would be as much patriotism and rivalry of Great Britain in passing a bill in favor of Jackson, the American Deer, who, like the Collins line, for a pecuniary reward, has been engaged in a contest of speed with Her Majesty's subjects, and triumphed over the swiftest of their runners.

Mr. FOWLER. I have not heard a single amendment which I would be willing to adopt. I desire to oppose this among the rest, and call for the question.

The question was then taken on Mr. SAVAGE's amendment, and it was disagreed to.

Mr. McMULLIN. The hammer fell on yesterday when I was in the midst of a sentence. I desire now to close that sentence, and call the attention of the House—

[Cries of "Order!" "Order!" "Order!"]

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman from Virginia [Mr. McMULLIN] propose an amendment?

Mr. McMULLIN. I move to strike out "$33,000," and insert "$19,100."

I desire to address myself particularly to Democratic gentlemen upon this side of the Hall.

Mr. STEPHENS, of Georgia. I rise to a question of order. My point of order is, that it is not in order to move to amend my amendment. The only question pending before the House is to concur with the amendment of the Senate to our bill. I move to amend the Senate amendment by striking out certain words. That is an amendment in the second degree. The amendment of the Senate is an amendment in the first degree. My motion to amend that is an amendment in the second degree; and now any motion to amend mine is an amendment in the third degree. I call for the reading of the rule, on the 189th page in the Manual:

The Clerk then read the rule, as follows:

"A motion to amend an amendment from the other House takes precedence of a motion to agree or disagree. A bill originating in one House is passed by the other with an amendment. The originating House agrees to their amendment with an amendment. The other may agree to their amendment with an amendment—that being only in the second, and not the third degree. For, as to the amending House, the first amendment with which they passed the bill, is a part of its text; it is the only text they have agreed to. The amendment to that text by the originating House, therefore, is only in the first degree, and the amendment to that again by the amending House is only in the second, to wit: an amendment to an amendment, and so admissible. Just so, when, on a bill from the originating House, the other, at its second reading, makes an amendment; on the third reading, this amendment is become the text of the bill; and if an amendment to it be moved, an amendment to that amendment may also be moved, as being only in the second degree."

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair feels constrained to overrule the question of order raised by the gentleman from Georgia, [Mr. STEPHENS,] and decide the amendment, such as is proposed now to the clause proposed to be stricken out, to be in order.

Mr. STEPHENS. Does the Chair think that it is in order to amend an amendment in the second degree?

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair does not conceive that question to be involved in the point raised. If it were, the Chair would not hesitate to decide that the question of the gentleman from Georgia was well taken. The Chair thinks it is not an amendment to the amendment. The gentleman will recollect that the Chair has not put the question in that form, at any time, to the committee, as he considered that the motion made by the gentleman from Georgia was suspended during the time the committee were engaged in amending the clause proposed to be stricken out. Each amendment has been stated to be an amendment to the Senate amendment in the second degree.

Mr. STEPHENS. I think the Chair is wrong, but I will not take an appeal.

Mr. JOHNSON, of Tennessee. I wish to see if I understand the proposition. I understand the original proposition is an amendment from the Senate to the House bill. I understand that the gentleman from Georgia [Mr. STEPHENS] moves to amend the original proposition, which is the amendment of the Senate to the bill; and his amendment, therefore, is an amendment in the second degree, and he is clearly in order.

Mr. STEPHENS. The gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. JOHNSON] is entirely wrong. The original proposition is not the Senate's amendment. Our text is the original bill, and the Senate's amendment is an amendment in the first degree as to us. My amendment is an amendment in the second degree as to us. There can be no question about that.

The CHAIRMAN. That is the view which the Chair takes of it. But suppose an amendment is made to the clause here, and adopted. That is an amendment to the Senate amendment, and is as far as we can go upon that amendment. You cannot entertain a motion to amend that amendment. Suppose the question is taken upon the gentleman's motion to strike out, and his motion is carried, and the clause stricken out, why; the whole thing is ended. If it fails, we stand with an amendment to the Senate amendment.

Mr. JONES, of Tennessee. I ask, if the motion which the gentleman from Georgia makes to strike it out, can be put? If you strike it out, would it not be a rejection of that provision? The Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union have no authority to reject a proposition referred to it. You have no right in Committee of the Whole to strike out the enacting clause of the bill, if the original bill is before you.

Mr. STEPHENS. How can you put a question to strike out anything? If I cannot strike out six lines, how can I strike out a word? It is perfectly competent to amend by striking out one word, or any number of words.

Mr. CABELL. I rise to a question of order. The Chair has decided the question, and there has been no appeal taken.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair would not be captious. He has made his decision. The Chair will state in reply to the gentleman from Tennessee, if this had been a motion to strike out the entire Senate amendment, the Chair would think that to be out of order; but an amendment to strike out a portion of the Senate's amendment, the Chair thought was in order. The Chair entertains some doubt now whether it was in order, but is inclined to think it was—at all events, that question is not before us.

Mr. JOHNSON, of Tennessee. I understand the Chairman to state that the House bill is the original text. I want to raise this point with the Chair: Suppose a bill goes from this House to the Senate, and comes back here with an amendment, why, then, the original bill is beyond the reach of the House; the House can make no amendment in the original bill, but must act on the Senate amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman is correct in that.

Mr. JOHNSON. Then, sir, the Senate amendment being the original proposition, an amendment to an amendment to the Senate amendment is only in the second degree, and is plainly in order, according to the Manual.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman is correct in saying that the House cannot amend the original bill; but he is incorrect in supposing that the Senate amendment is our text. Our text is the original bill. The Senate amend that, and we cannot entertain an amendment to an amendment to the Senate amendment.

Mr. CARTTER. I would like to inquire if there is any question of order now before the committee?

The CHAIRMAN. There is not.

Mr. STEPHENS, of Georgia. I do not think we shall ever end this debate in any other way, and, therefore, I take an appeal from the decision of the Chair, and I ask for tellers on the appeal.

Tellers were not ordered.

The question was then put, "Shall the decision of the Chair stand as the judgment of the committee?" and it was decided in the affirmative.

So the decision of the Chair was sustained.

Mr. McMULLIN, (resuming.) I will endeavor to bring myself within the rules of order, and address myself to both sides of the House. I desire to call the particular attention of this committee and of the country to the platform adopted the other day by the Democratic party in their Convention at Baltimore.

Mr. GOODENOW. I call the gentleman to order. The Democratic platform has nothing to do with this amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Virginia must confine his remarks to the amendment which he has submitted.

Mr. McMULLIN. I will show the gentleman that my remarks are pertinent.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair will say to the gentleman from Virginia that an argument to prove that the Senate amendment is unconstitutional is not in order.

Mr. McMULLIN. I am going to advance arguments to prove that the amendment is just. I do not mean, as I said yesterday, to discuss the constitutional question. I am going to discuss the propriety and expediency of the amendment which I have offered, and the inexpediency of the Senate amendment, as it comes to this House. Sir, the Democratic party declare in their platform, that justice and sound policy forbid the general Government to fortify one branch of industry—

[Loud cries of "Order!"]

Mr. GOODENOW. I insist that the gentleman is out of order, and I ask for the enforcement of the rule which provides that if a member is decided to be out of order he shall take his seat.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair has already decided that an argument to prove that Congress has no power to make such an appropriation as this is not in order on the amendment submitted by the gentleman from Virginia. But if the gentleman wishes to argue the policy of making the appropriation provided for in the Senate amendment, it is in order.

Mr. McMULLIN. I have not raised the constitutional question. I desire to show that the amendment I have submitted ought to be adopted because it is less partial in its character than the Senate amendment. I hold that the Senate amendment is partial legislation; that it confers special favors upon a few individuals—Collins & Co.—to the detriment of a large majority of the American people. Is there a gentleman on this floor who will deny that proposition? Is not legislation of this kind sectional and partial? There can be no doubt about it.

Sir, the gentlemen belonging to the Democratic party who support this appropriation, have read themselves out of the Democratic church, if the platform as laid down at Baltimore is to be relied on. I have not time to read it, but I beg gentlemen to read it for themselves. Sir, if this House has the power, and shall exercise that power, of passing this amendment of the Senate for the benefit of Collins & Co., you will be called upon next, perhaps by my colleague from the Accomac district, [Mr. BAYLY,] to make appropriation for the benefit of a line of steamers from Norfolk, and perhaps next for lines of steamers from Boston, New Orleans, and from every port in the Union.

Mr. Chairman, I asked the friends of this amendment, yesterday, to tell the House and the country whether or not, when this company first undertook this contract, they were not $1,000,000 in debt, and whether they are not giving exorbitant and extravagant salaries to their officers—as high as $6,000 per annum? They have not answered those questions. I now desire to know one or two more facts in reference to the company. It has been said by Madame Rumor, that foreign capitalists have invested capital in this company. We hear a great deal about patriotism, and about protecting the interests of our country. Sir, I claim to be as much an American as any gentleman here. I claim, too, to be as pure a patriot as any of the gentlemen who choose to vote for this unjust and iniquitous appropriation. But I ask the committee to pause before they sanction by their votes this unjust system of legislation. Sir, if rumor is to be believed, foreign capitalists hold stock in this Collins line, and I have also understood, from rumor, that the same foreign capitalists hold stock in the Cunard line. Is that true? Is it possible that there can be any truth in that report?

Mr. CARTTER. I will answer the gentleman. It is not true.

Mr. McMULLIN. I ask the American Congress to appoint a committee to investigate these matters before they pass this appropriation.

[Here the hammer fell.]

[Several cries of "Question!"]

Mr. ALLISON. I think it is evident that the committee is tired of this boy-play, and I move that the committee rise.

Mr. STEPHENS, of Georgia. I am tired of sitting here hearing these speeches. I think it would be better to adjourn at once than to stay here all day doing nothing. I call for tellers on the motion of the gentleman from Pennsylvania.

Tellers were ordered; and Messrs. STEPHENS, of Georgia, and VENABLE were appointed.

The question was then taken, and it was decided in the negative—ayes 34, noes 89.

So the committee refused to rise.

The question recurred upon the amendment proposed by Mr. McMULLIN.

Mr. CAMPBELL, of Illinois. Has there been any speech made in opposition to the amendment of the gentleman from Virginia?

The CHAIRMAN. There has not.

Mr. HOUSTON. Did not the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. ALLISON] make a speech?

The CHAIRMAN. He did not; he merely submitted a motion that the committee rise.

Mr. CAMPBELL. There has been a great deal said upon this subject, and gentlemen seem to be getting very tired of it. I apprehend there is time enough to get this money; it is not expected that it will go out by the next mail however. I have been somewhat amused at the different reasons which different gentlemen have assigned for their support of this amendment.

Mr. GOODENOW. I submit to the Chair that the gentleman is not in order.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair thinks that the remarks which the gentleman has made so far are not in order.

Mr. GOODENOW. Then I hope the Chair will enforce the rule.

Mr. CAMPBELL. It would be difficult to tell what would be in order here, to suit the gentlemen on the other side of the House.

Mr. GOODENOW. "The gentlemen on the other side of the House" are willing to take the vote. That is what would suit them.

Mr. CAMPBELL. I can tell the gentlemen on the other side that I am opposed to this grant of money. Is that in order?

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair thinks it is not in order in opposition to this amendment.

Mr. CAMPBELL. I ask to have the amendment read.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair will state the amendment. It is to strike out $33,000 and insert $19,100. The argument which the Chair decided would be in order in support of this amendment was to show that the Senate amendment ought not to prevail; that there ought not to be any appropriation; but if any, a less one than the amount proposed by the amendment of the Senate.

Mr. CAMPBELL. Well, sir, I am opposed to the amendment. I am opposed to giving the Collins line $100 in addition to the $19,000. I apprehend that I have a right to give my reasons for that opposition, if I desire to do it.

Mr. FOWLER. I raise a question of order on that point. The proposition is to strike out $33,000, and insert $19,100; the gentleman must argue against striking out $33,000 and inserting $19,100.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair has decided, again and again, that the only argument in order is an argument in favor of the Senate amendment.

Mr. CAMPBELL. What does the Chair decide?

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair decides that the only argument which can be made in opposition to this amendment, is one to show that the Senate amendment ought to be adopted, and that this amendment to it ought not to be agreed to.

Mr. CAMPBELL. Well, sir, I cannot make a speech upon that side of the question. [Laughter.]

The question was then taken on Mr. McMULLIN's amendment, and it was not agreed to.

Mr. CAMPBELL, of Illinois. I move to amend the amendment by striking out $33,000, and inserting $19,150. Now, I hope gentlemen will not interrupt me. I have not troubled them in their speeches upon this subject.

In listening to this discussion for two or three days—and I have been highly gratified, too—I have been rather amused at the different reasons which different gentlemen have assigned why they support this amendment of the Senate. Some gentlemen do it under one provision of the Constitution, and some gentlemen do it under another provision of the Constitution. I am astonished that they have not come out openly and independently, and taken the true ground—and that ground, in my judgment, is simply this, that the Collins company want this amount of money.

But the most miserable pretense of all which I have heard set up as a reason why this donation should be made is, that our power and glory as a nation hang upon the result. This has been repeated, echoed and reechoed, ad nauseam. Its supporters have made it a test of patriotism, and all those who are unwilling to admit that E. K. Collins & Co. are the nation, are set down as enemies of the country, and as pandering to British interests and to British power. Why, sir, this has been the old war-cry of the protection party for the last thirty years, and has long since lost all its terror with the American freemen, if it ever had any.

The gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. CHANDLER] went into a long argument for the purpose of showing that it would reduce the price of freight from England to this country. Now, I understand that gentleman to be the head and front of the increase of duties on iron in which his State seems more interested than it is in any other question. If, then, this appropriation of money will reduce the price of freight of that article to this country, and bring it here cheaper, I would ask him if he expects to benefit the interest of which he is the peculiar representative in this House by advocating a policy that will decrease the price of the staple of his own State? But, sir, it is a strange thing to me that here are a few individuals who can come into this House and ask for a protection of this character when the voice of ten millions of people in the valley of the Mississippi, proclaiming the nationality of the great Father of Waters, and asking for a comparatively small appropriation to remove the difficulties which the interior commerce of that vast region of country are compelled to encounter, and they are not heard, and if heard, are not listened to, but are met at the threshold by the objection that there is no power in the Constitution to authorize an appropriation for any such purpose. The great Father of Waters is not national, but E. K. Collins & Co. are very national.

I tell you, sir, that if this amendment is permitted to prevail, the old protection party of this country will have achieved a victory, the influence of which will not end with the Collins line of steamers, but will be the entering wedge to a still greater and more stupendous scheme of protection and monopoly, which then we can resist not. I for one, sir, say, if we must have a protective policy, let it be one that will be diffusive in its operation, reaching whole classes, instead of this local, individual protection, the most odious and objectionable shape in which it was ever presented before. We are told that we must emulate the example of Great Britain in this particular, and thus justify a departure from the settled and fixed policy of the Government. Sir, I have always been taught that the extravagance and consequent public debt of Great Britain afforded us an example not to be followed, but to be shunned, and from which we have derived the most salutary lessons of economy.

I am accustomed to this cry about "British interest." The Democratic tariff of 1846 was, according to the American ideas of these same gentlemen, a "British tariff." But I can assure them it has no terrors for me; and if opposition to this proposed gift to be taken out of the public Treasury—if opposition to this special protection will, in the estimation of its friends, array me against the best interests of my country, then, sir, my vote shall be recorded on the British side of the question.

The question was then taken on the motion of Mr. CAMPBELL, and it was not agreed to.

Mr. OLDS. I move to amend by striking out all down to the word "provided," and insert—

That the Postmaster General, with the assent of E. K. Collins & Co., advertise in the usual manner and at the usual time for the transportation of the mail between New York and Liverpool, in semi-monthly trips, and that he award the contract to the lowest responsible bidder, said bidder to be an American citizen.

I desire, sir, that when gentlemen vote for this amendment for the Collins line, that they do not vote for it supposing it to be necessary for the mail service of the United States.

I am opposed to this special contract system—this making a contract for transporting the mails for a period of ten years at a certain sum. Why, sir, what has been the effect of that system? You made a contract for transporting the mail from New York to San Francisco for a period of ten years.

Mr. McCORKLE. To Oregon.

Mr. OLDS. Yes, to Oregon, and now, sir, although only two years of that time has expired, we have before the Committee on the Post Office and Post Roads, offers for transporting that mail at a saving of half a million of dollars annually to this Government. That, sir, shows the folly of making a contract of this kind. And now, sir, while they are asking for this appropriation for the mail service, as they say, we have responsible bidders before that committee—and a bill to carry it into effect was reported by my colleague on the committee [Mr. GRAY] the other day—for transporting the mail from Jersey City to Galway, Ireland, at the sum of $10,000 the round trip. If there are offers to carry this mail for $10,000 the round trip, why is it necessary for the mail service of the country to give E. K. Collins & Co. $33,000 for the same service?

If gentlemen wish to give this as a bonus to E. K. Collins & Co. for bearing the British, let them say so, and not do it under the pretense that it is necessary for the mail service of the country, for it is not.

I say you have responsible bids for carrying this mail for $10,000 the round trip, and they do not even ask that.

Mr. SEYMOUR, of New York, (interrupting.) I wish to ask one question right here. Whether they are war steamers or not?

Mr. OLDS. That is the very question. I am arguing that this appropriation is not necessary for the mail service of the country. I do not care what other matters are put upon it. If it is for a protection to E. K. Collins & Co., call it protection. Call things by their right names, and vote for things by their right names, and not vote for appropriations for post office services, to the amount of $33,000 a trip, when you have responsible bids to do that service for $10,000 a trip. And I say they do not ask even that. They only ask, that the Postmaster General may advertise for proposals, and make the contract at a sum not exceeding $10,000, and letting competition go below that sum.

Now, sir, gentlemen here say it is necessary for the mail service of the country to let them give E. K. Collins & Co., $33,000 per trip. I deny it. The mail service requires no such appropriation. And gentlemen may as well understand, at once, that they are voting nearly a million of dollars to protect E. K. Collins & Co. against the competition of American citizens, for the carrying trade between this country and Europe.

Mr. WASHBURN. And I take issue with the gentleman, and maintain that it is for the mail service of the country that this amount is required, and that it is indispensable, if we are to keep up this international mail service, that it should be granted. If we are to have the mails carried between this country and England, by our own lines as the gentleman's proposition implies, we must make such provision as will secure the establishment of a line or lines that will carry them. And how can you accomplish that? How can you obtain the carrying of any just portion of the mails between New York and Liverpool? Simply by having a line established that will carry the mails quicker and more regularly than any other line can, or does, or at least as quick and regularly as any other. If we establish a mail line we want a good line, the best, the quickest, and the most regular, and certain, that can be placed upon the route, and we must have it; and in order to accomplish it, this contract with Collins & Co. is, I think, necessary. You must pay this amount, or an amount equivalent, to them or to somebody else, and, inasmuch as it is to be paid to somebody, why not as well to E. K. Collins as to any other company?

I am satisfied that the mail cannot be carried for the present rate of compensation. The value of the stock of that line in the market, settles this conclusively and incontestably to my mind. So to have the mails carried, it requires a greater compensation than we are now paying. Shall we increase it, in order to have the mail service continued? That a line of this description should be successful, we must have speed, and in order to obtain the speed necessary, there must be size. Size is a great element in this question of speed. We must have large ships, and the machinery of those ships must be of the best and most improved character. Size and expense are the conditions of speed and success in an enterprise of this character. The whole establishment must be a costly one, if it is to be successful. It is not the expense of fitting up its saloons, the cost of carpets, mirrors, sofas, and the like, that constitute any great portion of the cost of one of these steamers. This kind of expenditure is an infinitely small portion of the whole cost of one of these ships. The great cost is in the size, and in the superiority of the workmanship and machinery, which you must have, or the whole enterprise will be a dead failure. With the aid now solicited, every dollar of which, and more too, will be returned, to be continued only so long as till we shall have broken up the British monopoly and secured fair play, this line can compete with any other line. And, sir, do you want to see this line, which is the glory of our country, and of whose triumphs every American is justly proud, swept from the ocean now, by withholding the amount necessary to keep it up? I am opposed to the policy involved in the gentleman's amendment. His experiment would be a total failure, and would cover us with mortification. Our noble ships—the fleetest and the safest in the world—are to be abandoned for a contract with the lowest bidder. Does any one believe that such a contract would bring us ships that would successfully compete with the British line?—that would succeed in performing the mail service that would be expected to be performed? Certainly not, for the simple reason that the speed and regularity of that line cannot be obtained at an actual expense less than what you now propose to pay. Experience has taught this. And your now lowest-bidder line would fail, because it could not help it. If the proprietors of such line should make expenditures not warranted by the contracts with the Government, and place ships upon the route equal or superior to the Collins ships, they would be driven, inevitably, to ask for increased compensation, or would be driven from the seas, as you now propose to drive Collins. Does any man believe, or pretend to say, that the mail service between America and Great Britain can be performed at the present time, and under existing circumstances, as well as it is performed by the present line, for less money than we are asked to pay that? Certainly not. Then why talk about new contracts? Either maintain the present line or have nothing to do with any.

[Here the hammer fell.]

Mr. SWEETSER demanded tellers upon the amendment; which were ordered; and Messrs. CHANDLER and OLDS were appointed.

The question was then taken on the amendment of Mr. OLDS, and it was disagreed to; the tellers having reported—ayes 72, noes 75.

Mr. MEADE made some remarks, in continuation of those previously made, with the view to show that the financial condition of the Collins line was such that no increase of appropriation was necessary.

Mr. DEAN. I am opposed to the amendment of the gentleman from Virginia, from the simple reason that two committees, one of this House, the Ways and Means, and the Post Office Committee of the Senate, who have had ample opportunities to acquire all the necessary information, and who have thoroughly examined the whole subject, have reported to us the amount contained in the Senate's amendment as necessary to carry on this enterprise. A majority of the Committee on Finance, in the Senate, have also made a similar report.

Mr. MEADE. I am relying on that report by which I can prove what I have said.

Mr. DEAN. I ask whether we are to act differently upon this subject from what we do upon all others, or whether we are to rely upon the report of those men who have had all the means of information within their reach, and who, after a full investigation, say this amount of money is sufficient—barely sufficient; that this company, in endeavoring faithfully to execute their contract, have already lost about $500,000? Or whether we are to take our own opinions, without having the necessary facts to attain a proper result on which to found our opinions? I do not wish to detain the committee, and I hope that the friends of the enterprise will cease to occupy the time of the committee, and come to a direct vote on the proposition, whether the Senate's amendment shall pass or not. I trust, also, that no factious opposition will be offered by the opponents of the measure; but that we shall be permitted to vote upon the amendment, and ascertain whether there is or is not a majority of the House in its favor.

Mr. MEADE demanded tellers upon his amendment; which were ordered; and Messrs. CAMPBELL, of Ohio, and HIBBARD were appointed.

The question was then taken upon the amendment of Mr. MEADE, and it was disagreed to—the tellers having reported ayes 52, noes 73.

Mr. ABERCROMBIE moved that the committee rise; which motion was disagreed to.

The question was then taken on the motion of Mr. STEPHENS, of Georgia, to strike out the clause with regard to the Collins line, and it was disagreed to.

Mr. ORR. I offer, as a substitute for the entire clause, the following:

That there shall be allowed the Collins line of steamers, for transporting the mails between the ports of New York and Liverpool, for making twenty-six trips per annum, at such times as the Postmaster General may direct, the whole amount of postages received on mails carried by said steamers to which the Post Office Department is entitled to receive under our postal treaty with Great Britain: Provided, That the same shall be in lieu of the compensation now paid the Collins line of steamers under an existing contract: And, provided further, That the owners of the said Collins line shall consent to the arrangement herein provided.

I think this system of the Government entering into partnership with individuals in the construction and ownership of steamers for war purposes, under pretense that they were to be used for mail transports in time of peace, was wrong originally, and if I had been a member I should have voted against it in the first instance. I find, however, that system fastened upon us so far as this Collins line is concerned, by a contract which I am willing shall be executed by the Government in good faith. They were to make, originally, twenty trips annually, but at their own request, submitted to the Postmaster General, they were permitted to increase the trips to twenty-six. This gives them a pretext for coming here and asking additional compensation; and to carry out the original contract in a spirit of generosity to them, I proposed on yesterday to give them $19,250 per trip for the six increased trips, that being the sum paid for each of the twenty trips as the first contract stipulated. The friends of the line, however, declined to accept that amendment, and voted it down by a decided majority. That vote indicated on their part an unmistakable purpose to change the original contract entered into by the Government. Well, sir, if this is to be the policy—if the original contract is to be varied at the solicitation of Collins and his associates, then the faith of the Government no longer stands pledged to them, and in entering into a new contract, this Government should so construct it as to prevent it becoming so heavy a charge upon the Treasury. I insist this Congress shall make now a better arrangement than the previous one, and for one I am utterly opposed to placing any obstacles whatever in the way of Collins renouncing or abandoning the original contract.

The new contract I now offer Collins is found in the amendment. It proposes to give the line the whole proceeds of the postage on the mails carried by them between New York and Liverpool, which is a more liberal allowance than most mail contractors receive from the Post Office Department, and my proposition not recognizing their vessels as war steamers allows them the privilege of carrying the mails in any description of vessels they may choose. I suppose it is almost idle to assume, with any degree of seriousness upon this floor, that these vessels are well adapted for war purposes, or that they could ever be converted into efficient war steamers. We are to regard this, therefore, merely as a Post Office arrangement for the transportation of the United States mail. And let me ask members upon this floor when they desire to have a horse mail route established from one point to another within their districts, costing $50 or $100, whether or not it is the policy of the Post Office Department to allow such route to be established unless there is a reasonable probability that the postages received will defray the expenses of the transportation. Why is a different rule to prevail with reference to these steamers?

Gentlemen talk about building up a steam navy, to be used for war purposes in the event of war. Why, Mr. Chairman, I do not profess to be thoroughly informed upon this subject, but so far as my investigation has gone, there is not a single officer of the British navy—and many of them have been examined before a committee of the House of Commons, the British Government having entered largely into contracts with individuals for transporting their ocean mails on steamers which it was once supposed could be readily converted into efficient war steamers—that has ventured to express any other opinion than that such vessels are not well suited for war purposes; that the side-wheel steamers with the machinery above the water line, such as the Collins steamers, cannot be relied on in naval warfare. Two shots from the vessel of an enemy could entirely disable them, should they happen to strike the wheels, leaving the vessel to the mercy of the waves and the guns of the enemy, the machinery being impotent for an advance or retreat. The screw-propeller is the only steamer adapted for such purposes, if the testimony of all the British naval officers, and a majority of our own, is to be credited. It may be said—and the argument was used in the other end of the Capitol, by a distinguished Senator from Michigan, [Mr. CASS,]—that the Collins steamers would be useful for transporting troops, supplies, munitions of war, &c. Now, I ask whether you want these splendid Collins steamers, described by my friend from Kentucky, [Mr. MASON,] with chandeliers, mirrors costing thousands of dollars, Brussels tapestry and carpets, mahogany and rosewood furniture, for transporting beef, pork, bacon, flour, beans, and cornmeal? It would be a novel spectacle to see the superb state-rooms of the Baltic filled with barrels of pickled pork, and the saloons with rusty bacon sides. But these vessels never will be needed for transport ships. If you get into war with an enemy having a strong naval power, your merchant vessels—sailing and steamers—will be driven into port, and you can get hundreds of them for transportation purposes.

But, sir, we have been told with emphasis to make this appropriation, that it will not do for us to be outstripped by the British Government. The national honor is, in this argument, reduced to a small point; it is made to depend on our keeping the Collins steamers, although at a cost of nearly a million annually, running between New York and Liverpool, because they have beat the Cunard line, owned by British subjects, a few hours in a voyage of 3,000 miles. Do you want to keep up with the British Government in her extravagance? In her system of bounties, of favoritism to the few, in her taxation of the toiling millions? Do you want to have her pension system? Her retired list, not only from the army and navy, but from civil life? Do you want to have her public debt? Imitate Great Britain, and you will have all these delectable luxuries to feast your constituents upon. Much of the prosperity and glory of America is traceable to the fact, that our statesmen, in legislating, have heretofore studiously avoided following the example she has set, and have shunned the ruinous policy she has pursued towards her oppressed subjects.

Mr. TAYLOR. I am very anxious to have the vote taken upon this subject, and I will state the grounds of my opposition to the proposition of the gentleman from South Carolina [Mr. ORR] in a very few words. I have heard it intimated this morning that there was no evidence that these steamers were fit for war purposes. Let me say to gentlemen, that if they had examined the Executive documents sent to Congress this session, they would have found there the testimony of one of the highest officers of the American Navy, to the effect that these steamers were fit for war purposes. I have the document before me, and I will read from it. It is Executive document No. 50, sent to the Senate, the report of the Secretary of the Navy in relation to ocean steamers in the employment of the United States. I find a letter from Commodore Perry, addressed to the Secretary of the Navy, which I have not time to read in full. I will read, however, a few sentences from it, which give the contradiction, in so many words, to the declaration which has been made so repeatedly by intelligent gentlemen upon this floor, that these steamers are unfit for war purposes. Here is the extract from Commodore Perry's letter to the Secretary of the Navy, dated February 18, 1852:

"I now proceed to reply to the first division of the inquiry, as follows:

"Question first. 'Whether the steamships employed in the transportation of the United States mail, under contract with the Navy Department, or any other steamships employed in the transportation of our foreign mails, are in all respects suitable for immediate conversion into steamers for war purposes, capable of carrying the armament or battery appropriate to the class specified in the contract?'

"In answer to the foregoing (first) question, I am of opinion that they are not, in all respects, suitable.

"Question 2d. And if not suitable for such immediate conversion, whether they could be altered so as to make them efficient war steamers?"

"Answer. The following named Atlantic steamers may be converted, by slight alterations, into war steamers of the first class: Of Collins line—The Atlantic, Pacific, Arctic, and Baltic. Of Law's line—the Ohio, Georgia, and Illinois. Of Mortimer Livingston's line—the Humboldt and Franklin.

"Pacific steamers. Of Aspinwall's line—first class—the Golden Gate; second class, the Panama, Oregon, California, and Columbia.

"The foregoing vessels of the respective contracts are variously constructed as to materials, fastening, strength, and model.

"According to my calculation, the cost of conversion of either of the beforementioned vessels, exclusive of armaments, repair of machinery, and ordinary repair, would not, or certainly ought not, exceed for steamers of the first class, $20,000, and for steamers of the second class, $15,000; and it would be readily done for this at any of our navy-yards—provided, that useless alterations were not made."

What necessity or propriety is there for gentlemen rising in an American House of Representatives, and informing members of this House, and the people of this country, that four Atlantic steamers, costing more than any other in the world, constructed under the supervision of your own officers of the Navy, at a cost of $700,000 or $800,000 each, and built in such a way as to make them available for war purposes, are not suitable for war steamers, in the opinion of British officers, when we have here the proof, from one of the most distinguished officers in the Navy of the United States to the contrary? Gentlemen say that no application has been made for this increase of compensation to the Collins line from any large number of American citizens. I am informed—and if I am not correctly advised the chairman of the Naval Committee will correct me—that there are thirty-two petitions, numerous signed, by the principal business men in the large cities of the United States, praying Congress to aid in upholding and continuing this Collins line as a national enterprise, greatly conducive to the public interests, and of immense benefit to the country, in the transportation of your mails, and in strengthening your naval marine in time of war, if we should unfortunately be engaged in war hereafter. The establishment of this line has already effected great benefit to the country. I will state, in answer to the gentleman from Illinois, [Mr. CAMPBELL,] who says that we, who support this increased appropriation to keep up this line for the transportation of the mail between the United States and England, withhold appropriations necessary for the improvement of Western harbors and rivers, that he is greatly mistaken. I have always been the advocate of liberal appropriations for these objects. During the last Congress, I made a speech in favor of the passage of a bill to improve the condition of Western rivers and harbors, and the Whigs of Congress generally voted in favor of liberal appropriations for the improvement of Western rivers and harbors. But it was killed in the Senate by Democratic members, after having passed this House. I have many reasons for upholding this Collins line. It is no longer a private enterprise wholly—the Government having a very large interest in it, and now holding liens on all the vessels for moneys advanced; and the Government and people are deeply interested in keeping up this American line of ocean steam navigation.

[Here the hammer fell.]

The question then being upon Mr. ORR's amendment,

Mr. JOHNSON, of Tennessee, demanded tellers; which were ordered; and Messrs. STANTON, of Tennessee, and HENDRICKS were appointed.

The question being put, the tellers reported—ayes 50, noes 73.

So the amendment was rejected.

Mr. MARSHALL, of Kentucky, moved that the committee rise.

Mr. ORR demanded tellers; which were ordered; and Messrs. BRIGGS and VENABLE appointed.

The question was then taken, and there were—ayes 67, noes 74.

So the committee refused to rise.

Mr. VENABLE. I propose to amend the amendment by moving as a substitute the substitute offered by the gentleman from South Carolina, [Mr. ORR,] with the addition of $50,000.

Mr. STANTON, of Tennessee. I rise to a question of order. My point of order is, that this particular clause has been voted upon, and every amendment which has been offered to it, until the substitute was offered. The substitute has been voted down, and now, according to the rule repeated again and again, it is too late, and it is not in order to offer an amendment to the original clause.

Mr. VENABLE. This is a different proposition.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair understands that the point of order raised by the gentleman from Tennessee is this: that a motion to strike out and insert having been lost, another motion to strike out and insert different matter is not in order.

Mr. STANTON. My point of order is, that it is not in order to amend the original proposition.

The CHAIRMAN. If the motion of the gentleman from North Carolina [Mr. VENABLE] is to strike out the original proposition, and insert other matter, the Chair thinks the gentleman will be in order.

Mr. VENABLE. Mr. Chairman, I have taken no part in the debate upon this question since the five-minutes rule has been adopted. I am reluctant to consume the time of the House now, and feel so unwell as to be particularly disinclined to engage in the discussion. But a desire to place myself right upon the Journal of this House, and an abiding confidence that the country will be informed concerning its action, constrains me to offer the substitute now submitted. Should this appropriation pass as reported in this deficiency bill, I feel peculiarly anxious that those interested in my character as a statesman and a Representative, may find the evidence that I am clear of the whole responsibility. The advocates of this measure have uniformly defended it upon the certainty of the return of the advances made by the Government through the postages accruing from the line. This was the assurance upon the first suggestion of the measure, and has been urged as a reason for every advantage which has been conceded them on their repeated applications. Indeed, it is the only resource of reimbursement which has ever been suggested. It is true that much has been said of those ships as war steamers, much more of the glory which is to be secured for our country. Of the fitness of those vessels for our naval defense, I will not now speak. The advances already made are amply sufficient to entitle the Government to any aid which they may be able to give, especially when it is known that we shall have to pay for them before they are used; and as to the glory, I know of no system of calculation which will enable me to come to an exact conclusion as to its actual value.

But of the money concerning which such promises have been made—the postages which are to be poured into the Treasury—I had assumed that the estimates were real and candidly made. But, sir, the vote upon the substitute of the gentleman from South Carolina [Mr. ORR] has disclosed the most naked state of facts that I have ever known to be exhibited. It fixes the conclusion that those who have furnished the estimates of the income from postages had no faith in the statements which they made. I now add $50,000 to the whole amount of postages, and tender this to answer the demands of this company of stockholders. I have known a tailor who made large advertisement of his skill in making garments, refuse his own handiwork in part pay for the bill for making them. I have often known men indisposed to take their own paper in payment of their debts. But here is a case in which there is a positive refusal to take the work and the bill and all the income and profits arising from the whole enterprise, together with the debt due, and still it has been declined. We offer the ships, with all their tonnage and capacities for profitable employment, the postages increased and increasing, and all the glory to be especially the property of those adventurers, and it is rejected. I offer $50,000 more, and suppose that will also be rejected. Sir; they claim compensation for conveying the mail, and refuse all the postages in part payment. They tell the Government of immense revenue to be derived from postages, and yet utterly eschew any reliance upon their own declarations. Sir, the people ought to be informed; they will know the full extent of this delusive scheme sought to be fixed upon them. Sir, this is a test question, an experiment of the Collins line to ascertain whether the influences and the pressure which they can command, can open the Treasury door. The report of the Senate's committee as to the other lines, gives us a glimpse of the future. It is an instinct, not confined to the human race, to watch and take advantage of inroads upon the resources of others. The cattle and stock of every neighborhood soon learn the habits of any mischievous animal that breaks down inclosures and follow him in his expeditions, that they may enter fields through the breach he has made. So this clamorous mendicant now urging his necessity of appropriations for relief, stands in front of a long line of others who are watching for the success of the application, preparing themselves for similar favors. If there be truth in the arguments which are resorted to, to sustain the measure, those who speak so confidently of profits ought to be willing to take the profits and postages for pay, or every sensible man, and the country at large, will consider the whole scheme as a deliberate foray upon the Treasury.

Mr. EVANS. Will the gentleman from North Carolina [Mr. VENABLE] inform me how many post offices and post routes can be sustained in his State by means of the postages alone which accrue there? I believe that in North Carolina, and indeed in every State south of Maryland, the postages never have amounted to anything like a sufficient sum to sustain the expenses incurred in carrying the mail, and in supporting the postal establishment in those States. Suppose any one were to predict, what will undoubtedly happen, that the growing resources, the enterprise, and the industry of those States, will at some no distant period make the receipts more than the expenditures, would the gentleman not think the proposition a most unjust one which would require that every post office and post route not capable now of sustaining itself should immediately be abolished? Yet that is his proposition with regard to this line.

And pray what is it that he is willing to give the Collins line? Not the whole amount of postages which it has been instrumental, directly or indirectly, in bringing into the Treasury. Not all that the postal convention, brought into existence by this line, gives us—but only the postage on letters carried by the Collins ships; and yet I venture to predict, that in a few years the gentleman will be very unwilling to make any such arrangement with the line, because the postages will have increased to more than the sum now proposed to be paid; but no private company without unlimited capital can afford to wait for this accretion.

Now, sir, what does the gentleman from South Carolina [Mr. ORR] propose? He offers for the six additional trips to be performed $19,500 per trip, without reflecting that these additional voyages are to be made in mid-winter, when scarce any passengers or any freight will be carried, and when the voyage is a charge of its whole cost, and that $19,500 is the pay for a summer trip.

Let him give $65,000, the cost of each trip, as a remuneration for making it. This, for six trips, will amount to $390,000, which, added to $385,000, the amount now paid, will be, for a year's service, $775,000, being almost as much as is proposed to be paid by this Senate amendment.

The honorable gentleman from Virginia [Mr. MEADE] has made a labored argument about the profits of the Collins line. I have not time in five minutes to follow him; but I am prepared to say that he is altogether mistaken.

The stock of the Collins line is only worth sixty cents on the dollar, and sells for that in the market. Now ordinary six per cent. being everywhere from ninety-five to one hundred and seventeen, will the gentleman inform me how it is that this stock, which he makes a twelve per cent., is only at sixty?

The gentleman's computations thus sufficiently refute themselves.

Mr. ORR. I would like to ask the gentleman one question.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Maryland has yielded the floor, and further discussion is out of order.

The question was then taken on Mr. VENABLE's amendment, and it was not agreed to.

Mr. ABERCROMBIE. We shall never get this vote taken. I move that the committee rise.

Mr. GORMAN demanded tellers; which were ordered; and Messrs. JOHNSON, of Tennessee, and HOWARD were appointed.

The question was then taken, and it was decided in the affirmative—ayes 80, noes 74.

The committee accordingly rose, and the Speaker having resumed the chair, the chairman (Mr. STUART) reported that the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union had had under consideration the state of the Union generally, and particularly the amendments of the Senate to the deficiency bill, and had come to no resolution thereon.

On motion by Mr. FLORENCE,

The House then adjourned until Monday, at eleven o'clock, a. m.

IN SENATE.

MONDAY, July 12, 1852.

Prayer by the Chaplain, Rev. C. M. BUTLER.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore laid before the Senate a communication from the War Department, made in compliance with a resolution of the 25th May last, requiring statements of the amounts expended for printing, binding, and public advertising, executed by order of that Department, from the 4th March, 1849, up to 25th May, 1852; which was ordered to be laid on the table and printed.

Mr. CLARKE. Mr. President, I have been requested to present to the Senate some resolutions that have been passed by the corporate authorities of the city of Georgetown, remonstrating against the reconstruction of the Potomac Bridge on its present site, and recommending some point above that city as a suitable location. I think it would be better to have them read, and then referred to the Committee on the District of Columbia.

The resolutions were accordingly read, and so referred.

PETITIONS, ETC.

Mr. DAVIS. Mr. President, I have a petition, signed by a large number of the principal merchants and ship-owners of Boston, Massachusetts, setting forth that this Government has never recognized the independence of the Government of Hayti. They go on to represent the magnitude of the commerce of the United States engaged in the trade with that country, and the importance of that trade; and they pray that this Government recognize it as an independent State, they deeming it essential to the interests of the commerce of the country that it should receive the protection which grows out of that consideration. I move to refer the memorial, without reading, to the Committee on Foreign Relations.

It was so referred.

Mr. SHIELDS presented a petition of citizens of Jacksonville, Illinois, and a petition of citizens of the city of New York, praying Congress to pass the bill commonly known as the "homestead bill," which were referred to the Committee on Public Lands.

Mr. JONES, of Iowa, presented the petition of William D. Arnett, who complains of the heavy fees charged to persons who make applications for patents, praying that suitable persons be appointed in the Patent Office to consult and advise with inventors about to apply for patents; which was referred to the Committee on Patents and the Patent Office.

Mr. BRADBURY presented the memorial of Harlow Spaulding, praying compensation for services as acting naval storekeeper at Spezia from 1847 to 1851; which was referred to the Committee on Naval Affairs.

Mr. SEBASTIAN presented the memorial of Samuel H. Hempstead, praying compensation for services rendered as district attorney under the act of 17th of June, 1844, in defending claims to lands in Arkansas; which was referred to the Committee on the Judiciary.

Mr. HAMLIN presented a petition of citizens of Bangor, Maine, praying that the bill granting land to the States for railroads, and for other purposes, may become a law; which was referred to the Committee on Public Lands.

Mr. CHASE presented eleven petitions of citizens of Ohio, praying that the bill now before Congress, known as the "homestead bill," may become a law; which were referred to the Committee on Public Lands.

Mr. RUSK presented the memorial of Daniel Searle & Co., mail contractors, praying compensation for additional services required of them by the Post Office Department; which was referred to the Committee on the Post Office and Post Roads.

REPORT FROM A STANDING COMMITTEE.

Mr. MILLER, from the Committee on Finance, to which were referred the memorial and papers of Edwin Lord and Francis Bacon, praying a release from certain judgments obtained in favor of the United States on bonds given for duties on goods imported prior to 1839, submitted a report, accompanied by a bill for their relief; which was read and passed to the second reading. The report was ordered to be printed.

PENSION AND BOUNTY LAND LAWS.

Mr. GEYER, from the Committee on Pensions, submitted the following resolution:

Resolved, That the Secretary be directed to purchase five hundred copies of the pension and bounty land laws, with the opinions, decisions, and regulations in relation to those laws, recently compiled by Mayo and Moulton: Provided, The price does not exceed $3 50 per copy.

NEW CUSTOM-HOUSE.

Mr. HAMLIN submitted the following resolution; which was agreed to:

Resolved, That the Committee on Commerce be directed to inquire into the expediency of making an appropriation for the erection of a custom-house at Waldoboro', Maine.

NOTICES OF BILLS.

Mr. CLARKE gave notice of his intention to ask leave to introduce a joint resolution directing the Secretary of War to cause the harbor and river of Providence, in the State of Rhode Island, to be surveyed, and an estimate made of the cost of clearing out said harbor.

Mr. GWIN gave notice of his intention to ask leave to introduce a bill making a grant of land for the construction of a canal from Tulare Lake to the San Joaquin river, in the State of California.

BILLS PASSED.

The following engrossed bills were severally read a third time and passed:

An act to regulate the terms of the district court of the United States for the district of Iowa;

An act for the relief of the heirs and representatives of the late Robert Sewall;

An act to provide for the promotion of certain officers in the Engineer, Topographical Engineer, and Ordnance Corps;

An act for the relief of John Duff; and

An act to amend an act entitled "An act to incorporate the Washington Gaslight Company," approved July 8, 1848.

IMPROVEMENT OF THE CHICAGO RIVER.

On the motion of Mr. SHIELDS, the Senate proceeded to consider the bill to authorize the Mayor and Common Council of Chicago, Illinois, to excavate a portion of the public reservation at that place, with a view to the improvement of the navigation of the Chicago river.

The bill was read a second time and considered as in Committee of the Whole. It provides that the corporate authorities of the city of Chicago shall have authority to excavate such portion of the reservation at Chicago, not exceeding the limits described in their memorial of January 5, 1852, as may be necessary, according to the plan set forth in the memorial, for the improvement of the Chicago river.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, and ordered to be engrossed and read a third time.

BILOXI BAY INDIANS.

On the motion of Mr. SEBASTIAN, the joint resolution authorizing the examination of the claims of the Biloxi Bay Indians was read a second time and considered as in Committee of the Whole. It proposes to authorize the Secretary of the Interior to cause to be examined and reported upon, the claim of that portion of the Choctaw Indians residing east of the Mississippi river, known as the Biloxi Bay Indians; and when it shall appear from the evidence taken before, or reported by, the former Choctaw Commissioner, that the claimants were, at the date of the treaty, Choctaw heads of families, residing within the Choctaw territory, and had signified their intention to remain and become citizens of the States, and to take reservations, and that they resided on said lands for the period of five years next ensuing, or were dispossessed by reason of the Government having disposed of their lands, or on account of their fear of being forcibly dispossessed, or through threats of persons engaged in the emigration of the tribes; to allow and award to those, falling within this provision, certificates for like quantities of land, provided for others of the tribe under the third section of the act of August 3, 1842—to be issued and patented to them in full, without the restrictions of the act of 1842, or the act of March 3, 1845.

Mr. FELCH. I should like to understand the nature of the bill before us.

Mr. ADAMS. It is precisely in conformity with what has been done in the case of other Indians. Testimony was taken under a former commissioner, but was not completed in time to be reported by him before the expiration of the law under which it was taken. The object of this joint resolution is to authorize the Secretary of the Interior to act as if the law had not expired. It only extends the time for the Secretary to investigate and determine upon the testimony which has been reported. The object is only to extend to these Indians the same privilege which has been extended to other Indians in the same condition.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment; and ordered to be engrossed for a third reading.

SUSPENDED LAND ENTRIES.

On the motion of Mr. FELCH, the Senate proceeded, as in Committee of the Whole, to consider the bill to revive and continue in force for a limited time, the provisions of an act relative to suspended entries of the public lands.

It proposes to enact that the several provisions of the act of August 3d, 1846, entitled "An act providing for the adjustment of all suspended preemption land claims in the several States and Territories" be continued in force for the term of one year from the date of this act; and those provisions are declared applicable as well to cases which were inadvertently omitted to be acted on under that act, as to those of like character and description which have arisen between the date of that act and the present time, and shall be regarded as applying to locations of bounty land warrants, as well as to ordinary entries or sales. It further provides that in all cases where patents have been issued on entries which were entitled to be confirmed under said act, such patents may be surrendered, and the officers, at the time of such surrender, who, by said act of 1846, are constituted a board of adjudication are, by this act, authorized and empowered to confirm such entries, and upon the canceling of the outstanding patent, the Commissioner of the General Land Office is to be authorized to issue a new patent, on such confirmation, to the persons whose title is confirmed to their heirs or assigns.

Mr. FELCH. The act to which allusion is made in this bill, has been extended in its operation, I believe, by two several acts. It is now proposed merely to extend it for a further length of time. When I drew up the bill in the first instance, I framed it so as to provide for the extension of the act for the term of one year. I propose now to amend the bill, by striking out "one year," and inserting "five years." This bill is merely intended to enable the Department to dispose of many cases of conflicting land claims, where land offices have been changed, or where, from other causes, entry has been suspended, without the necessity of coming to Congress in every particular instance. The act has been found to operate very beneficially heretofore, and having expired, it is merely proposed to renew it.

Mr. DOWNS. Entirely approve of the amendment which has been offered by the chairman of the Committee on Public Lands, but I could never see any reason why the law should be limited at all. The only purpose for which I rise now is to inquire why it is that this law may not be perpetual. Why should it be temporary? Certainly it has been very useful heretofore, and constant applications are made here session after session for its renewal. I really could never see why a law so beneficial and so desirable, and which seemed to be so necessary to carry on the land system satisfactorily, should be made from time to time, of temporary duration. I would therefore suggest to the chairman, whether it would not be better to strike out the limitation, and make the bill perpetual.

Mr. FELCH. I do not see any good reason why the law should not be made perpetual. The fact is, however, that the cases are much less numerous now than they were when the act was originally passed. I believe the adjudications, at an early day under the first act, amounted to some two or three thousand cases, which were reported to Congress. I have no objection to increasing the time to ten years, if the Senator prefers that, or even to make the law perpetual.

Mr. DOWNS. Say ten years.

Mr. FELCH. I will modify my amendment by inserting "ten years," instead of "five years."

The amendment was agreed to, the bill was reported to the Senate as amended, and the amendment was concurred in.

Mr. DODGE, of Iowa. I hope the bill will be postponed until to-morrow. It is one of considerable interest to the new States and Territories. I have not had an opportunity to look into it, and I am anxious to confer with a member of the House who has the subject under consideration, to know whether it will meet certain suspended entries. I move to postpone the further consideration of the bill until to-morrow.

Mr. FELCH. I would suggest to the Senator, to allow the bill to be ordered to its engrossment, and then to-morrow, when it comes up upon its passage, he can present his objections to it, if he has any.

The PRESIDENT. The bill will not be subject to amendment after it is engrossed.

The motion to postpone was agreed to.

JAMES R. CREECY.

On the motion of Mr. GWIN, the bill for the relief of Colonel James R. Creecy was read a second time and considered as in Committee of the Whole. It proposes to authorize the payment to him of the sum of $552 50 in consideration of money expended and services rendered by him in raising a regiment for the Mexican war. The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, and ordered to be engrossed for a third reading.

ELIZABETH F. THURSTON.

A message from the House of Representatives was received by Mr. HAYS, its Chief Clerk, announcing that it had passed a joint resolution for the relief of Elizabeth F. Thurston, of the Territory of Oregon.

It was read a first and second time.

Mr. DOUGLAS. I ask that the resolution be now considered. I will explain its provisions. Mr. Thurston was a Delegate from the Territory of Oregon in the last Congress. Before he started for home, he franked documents and books printed by order of Congress to himself in Oregon. On his way home he died. The postmaster in Oregon refused to deliver up the books to his widow, and this resolution is simply to authorize the postmaster to deliver them to Mrs. Thurston. I hope it will be passed immediately.

There being no objection, the Senate proceeded to consider the resolution as in Committee of the Whole. It provides that: whereas Samuel R. Thurston, deceased, late Delegate in Congress from the Territory of Oregon, did, during the period of his official term, frank to Lynn City, in that Territory, to the address of himself and wife, sundry books and documents; and whereas the acting deputy postmaster at Lynn City refused to deliver them up to Elizabeth F. Thurston, his widow, under the allegation that the same were improperly franked, and demanding the payment of postage as a condition precedent to their delivery,—the Postmaster General be directed to cause the acting deputy postmaster at Lynn City, in the Territory of Oregon, to deliver up to Elizabeth F. Thurston, widow of Samuel R. Thurston, deceased, all such books and documents so withheld, franked by, and belonging to Samuel R. Thurston, without post office or other charges thereon.

The joint resolution was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to a third reading, read a third time and passed.

ISAAC COBB.

On motion by Mr. HAMLIN, the Senate proceeded, as in Committee of the Whole, to consider the bill of the House of Representatives for the relief of Isaac Cobb. It proposes to direct the Secretary of the Interior to place the name of Isaac Cobb, of Abbot, in the State of Maine, on the pension list, at the rate of $24 per annum, commencing on the 4th of March, 1841, and to continue during his natural life.

Mr. HAMLIN. This bill has at two or three different times passed the House of Representatives, but has never before been reached in the Senate. It has been, at this session, passed very early by the House. It allows only one fourth of a full pension, and has been recommended by the Commissioner of Pensions, and I hope there will be no objection to it.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to a third reading, read a third time and passed.

SAFETY OF PASSENGERS ON STEAMBOATS.

The Senate resumed the consideration of the bill to amend an act entitled "An act to provide for the better security of the lives of passengers on board of vessels propelled in whole or in part by steam," the question pending being upon the amendment made in Committee of the Whole to insert the following additional sections:

Sec. 42. And be it further enacted, That the supervising inspectors appointed under the provisions of this act, shall, within their respective districts, under the direction of the Secretary of the Treasury, take the examination, and receive the statements in writing, of persons of practical knowledge and experience in the navigation of steam-vessels, the construction and use of boilers, engines, machinery, and equipments, touching the form, material, and construction of engines and their appurtenances; the causes of the explosion of boilers, and collapse of flues, and the means of prevention of fires, and the kind and description of safety-valves, water and steam-gauges or indicators; equipments for extinguishment of fires, and for the preservation of life in case of accident, on board of such vessels, and all other means in use or proper to be adopted, for the better security of the lives of persons on board vessels propelled in whole or in part by steam; the advantages and disadvantages of the different descriptions of boilers, engines and their appurtenances, safety-valves, water and steam-gauges or indicators, equipments for the prevention or extinguishment of fires, and the preservation of life in case of accident, in use on board such vessels; whether any and what further legislation is necessary or proper for the better security of the lives of persons on board such steam-vessels; which examination and statements so taken and received shall be transmitted to the Secretary of the Treasury, at such time as he shall prescribe.

Sec. 43. And be it further enacted, That it shall be the duty of the Secretary of the Treasury to cause such interrogatories to be prepared and published as in his opinion may be proper to elicit the information contemplated by the preceding section, and upon the receipt of the examination and statements taken by the inspectors, shall report the same to Congress, together with the recommendation of such further provisions as he may deem proper to be made for the better security of the lives of persons on board steam vessels.

The amendment was concurred in.

The next amendment made, as in Committee of the Whole, was to insert, as section forty-four, the following:

Sec. 44. And be it further enacted, That all penalties imposed by this act may be recovered in an action of debt, by any person who will sue therefor in any court of the United States.

The amendment was concurred in.

The next amendments made as in Committee of the Whole, were to insert:

Sec. 45. And be it further enacted, That all parts of laws heretofore made, which are superseded by or are inconsistent with this act, are hereby repealed.

Sec. 46. And be it further enacted, That all parts of this act shall be in force on the 1st day of November next, except the requirement to have pumps and hose to extinguish fires, and life-boats, which shall take effect on the 1st day of January next.

The amendments were concurred in.

The PRESIDENT. The twenty-eighth section was amended on a previous day, and passed over. It was now again considered. That section as amended is as follows:

"Sec. 28. And be it further enacted, That the collector or other chief officer of the customs, shall retain on file all original certificates of the inspectors required by this act to be delivered to him, and shall give to the master or owner of the vessel therein named, two certified copies thereof, one of which shall be placed by such master or owner in some conspicuous place in the vessel, where it will be most likely to be observed by passengers and others, and there kept at all times during a voyage, and while such vessel is receiving freight or passengers; the other shall be retained by such master or owner as evidence of the authority thereby conferred; and if any person shall receive or carry any passenger on board any such steamer not having a certificate of approval, as required by this act, and a certified copy thereof, placed and kept as aforesaid; or who shall receive or carry any gunpowder, oil of turpentine, oil of vitriol, camphene, or other explosive burning fluid, or materials which ignite by friction, as freight on board any steamer carrying passengers, not having a certificate authorizing the same, and a certified copy thereof placed and kept as aforesaid; or who shall stow or carry any of said articles, at a place or in a manner not authorized by such certificate, shall forfeit and pay for each offense one hundred dollars, to be recovered by action of debt in any court of competent jurisdiction."

Mr. GEYER. At the suggestion of the Senator from Massachusetts, I propose further to amend the section by striking out the words "during a voyage and while such vessel is receiving freight or passengers." The object of the amendment is to require the certificates to be kept up at all times after they are delivered.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. GEYER. I have another amendment to offer to the same section—to insert between "a" and "certificate" the words "certified copy of the;" and to strike out after the word "act" the words "and a certified copy thereof."

This section as it stands, provides that the owners shall be subjected to penalties for navigating vessels unless they keep exposed the certificate of inspection and a copy thereof. I propose to require only a certified copy.

The amendment was agreed to.

The section as it now stands is as follows:

"Sec. 28. And be it further enacted, That the collector or other chief officer of the customs shall retain on file all original certificates of the inspectors required by this act to be delivered to him, and shall give to the master or owner of the vessel therein named two certified copies thereof, one of which shall be placed by such master or owner in some conspicuous place in the vessel, where it will be most likely to be observed by passengers and others, and there kept at all times; the other shall be retained by such master or owner as evidence of the authority thereby conferred; and if any person shall receive or carry any passenger on board any such steamer not having a certified copy of the certificate of approval, as required by this act, placed and kept as aforesaid; or who shall receive or carry any gunpowder, oil of turpentine, oil of vitriol, camphene, or other explosive burning fluid, or materials which ignite by friction, as freight on board any steamer carrying passengers, not having a certificate authorizing the same, and a certified copy thereof placed and kept as aforesaid; or who shall stow or carry any of said articles, at a place or in a manner not authorized by such certificate, shall forfeit and pay for each offense one hundred dollars, to be recovered by action of debt in any court of competent jurisdiction."

Mr. DAVIS. On looking over the bill, I was surprised to find that there was an omission which I supposed had been supplied. The intention was that this bill should not apply to the public vessels of the United States, or to vessels coming from foreign countries. I therefore offer the following amendment as an additional section, to come in before the present section forty-one:

And be it further enacted, That this act shall not apply to public vessels of the United States, or vessels of other countries.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. DAVIS. I wish to offer an amendment to the ninth section, relative to the duties of inspectors, so as to place the construction of the bill out of doubt. It is to strike out the word "such," and insert "all;" so that it will read: "they shall also, once in every six months, inspect the boilers of all steamers," &c.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. DAVIS. For a like purpose, I move to insert "for one year," so as to authorize the inspectors, if satisfied that an applicant for pilot is qualified, to "give him a certificate to that effect, authorizing him to be a pilot within the limits prescribed in the certificate for one year."

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. DAVIS. I move to amend section twenty, which provides for the compensation of the supervising inspectors, by inserting after the words "traveling expenses" the words, "and the actual reasonable expenses, both to them and to other inspectors, of transporting from place to place instruments used in inspections." The object is to cover a little expense that may be necessary in transporting from place to place the instruments used in making test trials.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. DAVIS. I move to amend the thirty-sixth section, by inserting the word "each" after the word "shall," so that it will read: "the inspectors in the following districts shall each be allowed," &c.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. HALE. The fourth section of the bill now provides—

"That every such vessel, carrying passengers, shall have at least two boats, supplied with oars, in good condition at all times for service; one of which boats shall be a metallic life-boat, fire-proof, of approved model, not less than twenty-five feet long, six feet six inches wide, and two feet deep, and in all respects a good, substantial, safe sea-boat, capable of sustaining, inside and outside, fifty persons."

I move to amend this provision by striking out all after the word "service," down to and including the word "deep;" and after the word "respects" strike out "a;" and after the word persons insert "each;" so that it may read—

That every such vessel, carrying passengers, shall have at least two boats, supplied with oars, in good condition at all times for service, and in all respects good, substantial, safe sea-boats, capable of sustaining, inside and outside, fifty persons each.

I offer this amendment to avoid what I understand to be the effect of the bill, which is to compel everybody to buy Francis's metallic life-boats. The question was suggested the other day by the honorable Senator from Pennsylvania, [Mr. BRODHEAD;] and the honorable Senator from Massachusetts, [Mr. DAVIS,] who has charge of the bill, said it was not the intention of the framers of the bill to compel the owners of steamboats to buy these particular metallic boats. It is well enough known to all of us, that when the courts come to construe this act, if it ever becomes a law, they will not ask what the honorable Senator who had charge of the bill meant, but they will ask what the bill itself means.

Now, I understand that there is but one metallic life-boat known in the country; and I understand further—and if I am in error in this, I would like to be corrected—that that metallic life-boat is a patented boat, known as "Francis's metallic life-boat;" that its model and size, as to length, and depth, and width, are just exactly and precisely, to a foot, and an inch, what is prescribed here as the necessary length, depth, and breadth which these boats are obliged to be; that is, twenty-five feet long, six feet six inches wide, and two feet deep. I do not know that the information which I have is correct, but I am told by those who pretend to know, that the description covers exactly Francis's life-boats.

If the bill is amended in the manner in which I propose, then the provision compulsory upon steamboat owners to buy Francis's metallic life-boats will be left out, and they will be left at liberty to purchase the best boats that can be bought for the purpose. I think that this, if nothing else in the bill, may be left to those inspectors who are provided for in this bill.

I am told further, by gentlemen who have some practical knowledge upon this subject, and who have not been specially consulted as to the particulars that were to be put into the bill, that the size of these boats would be very inconvenient to some steamboats in some waters that are not rivers; that is, that there are some steamboats navigating some bays and inlets of large bodies of water, which would—instead of being benefited and made more safe for the lives of passengers by having such boats—be actually incommoded, hindered, and obstructed by them. It will be seen that the bill makes no sort of provision that the life-boat shall bear any proportion to the length of the steamboat. No matter how small the steamboat is, she must have a metallic life-boat twenty-five feet long, six feet six inches wide, and two feet deep. It is that provision to which I object; and this amendment brings up the whole question, whether the Senate will compel all the steamboat proprietors in the United States to purchase Francis's metallic life-boat.

It strikes me that the bill is obnoxious and liable to this objection. Now I think, with all deference, that Senators had better advise themselves a little more as to what is a life-boat, and what constitutes a safe, manageable, and reliable life-boat, before they compel the whole country to purchase Francis's boat. If I am not misinformed, it is the opinion of some of the most practical men of the country, that this is no life-boat at all; and that without other equipments, accompaniments, or accoutrements, it is not a safe boat, and cannot be relied on. I may give as an instance, an individual whose name I suppose is known to a great many members of the Senate, who has sustained that opinion. Captain Forbes, of Massachusetts, I understand, gives that as his opinion. The amendment which I have offered raises the question, whether we shall compel persons to purchase that boat.

Mr. DAVIS. The remarks of the Senator from New Hampshire require a word or two of explanation. I think that if the gentleman had a little more faith in those who have examined the subject, and if he were a little less influenced by speculations made in the lobby, he would be more likely to arrive at correct and sound results. I take it to be a matter too clear to admit of controversy that the construction of such a life-boat as the bill refers to, and which should be, in every sense of the word, a good and sufficient life-boat, cannot be possibly an infringement of the patent of Mr. Francis. I have had occasion to know that such is the case from various interviews with that gentleman, and also with the gentleman with whom, as I suppose from his remarks, the Senator from New Hampshire has consulted. I have had them both before me; and I know how anxious both are that Congress should adopt a provision compelling the purchase of a patented article. It has been my intention to steer clear of such a proposition, and to leave the supply of these boats open to competition. I have been assured again and again by Mr. Francis that he does not claim to be the sole patentee of the metallic life-boat, but that he claims to be merely the patentee of a peculiar kind of life-boat. I do not propose to compel any steamboat owner to purchase a boat of that structure. I have been careful in that respect, and have no doubt at all as to the construction that will be generally put upon that section of the bill. I am actuated by a principle that I avowed here on Friday; that is, that we should not introduce any clause into our legislation which would have the effect of compelling a person to purchase any article of a particular individual.

The Senator says, "How is it that I adopted just the dimensions of the life-boat registered by Mr. Francis in the Patent Office?" If the Senator is correct, and the dimensions mentioned here are similar to those in Mr. Francis's patent, it does not follow that I am indebted to him for them. I obtained them more than a year ago from a distinguished officer of the Navy, to whom I addressed a letter requesting information as to the proper dimensions. That officer, who is now in this city, and at the head of a bureau, sent the information I desired, and I adopted it at once, feeling more safety in trusting to his judgment than to my own. I think it is a material point to stipulate that the boat should not be of a less size than that mentioned in the bill, for a boat of considerable size possesses many great advantages. She is safer, and more capable of performing the service required of her, than a small boat in a rough sea; and it is well known that these small boats, on many occasions, have proved not only inefficient but dangerous. For this reason I thought it best that we should adopt such a size as was adequate in the judgment of able and experienced men.

The Senator says that in some cases—for instance in rivers—it would not be safe for steamers to carry several boats of this large size; but I think I have rendered the observation unnecessary, having provided that vessels navigating interior waters and still waters should be compelled by the inspectors to carry but one life-boat, of proper dimensions, and made of metal.

Mr. HALE. Where is that provision made?

Mr. GEYER. In the fourth section.

Mr. DAVIS. It is in these words:

"Provided, however, That ferry and tow-boats shall be exempted from the obligation to carry the life-boats herein provided for; and the inspectors are hereby authorized to grant a like dispensation to steamers of light draught, navigating small or shallow rivers, and also to allow any other steamers navigating rivers only to carry but one life-boat, the same being of suitable model and dimensions, and made of metal."

I thought that I had made all the accommodation which could be required, when I provided that the smaller class of boats should be freed from the operation of this bill, in that respect, and in the other cases referred to in the proviso, having granted the inspectors a discretionary power.

Now, on this point, Mr. President, allow me to say one word. I put it to you, and I put it to the Senate, whether suitable and adequate provisions were ever made for the preservation of life, by any measures which have hitherto been adopted? Look into the statistics which have been furnished from the Treasury Department, and see what an immense sacrifice of human life there has been in cases where steamboats have been wrecked in our rivers by snags or by rocks, or where they have been destroyed by fire. The sacrifice of life is generally enormous, and in almost all these cases, so far as I have been able to trace out the particulars of their history, that loss of life has been owing to the want of proper and suitable means to take passengers from the boats to the shore, although the wrecked or burning steamboat might be within a very short distance of the shore. It is but a short time since a boat was destroyed upon Lake Erie, and although she was so near the shore as actually to run aground, two hundred and fifty persons perished for the want of suitable means of escaping to the shore. It has been against accidents of this sort that I have endeavored to provide in this bill. Some suitable means are necessary to take passengers to the shore, however near the boat may be, and that is all that I wish to insure by this provision. I had no idea in my mind of introducing into the bill anything that should encumber the commerce of the country, or cause any inconvenience to the provisions of commercial business. Hence, after this bill was drafted, I was induced to make some modification, and to leave it in the discretion of inspectors of boats, whether they should carry more than one life-boat upon the steamboats navigating the rivers. I have stated my reasons for requiring metallic life-boats. In the first place, they endure a much longer service; in the next place, they will never leak, if properly made; in the last place, they are incombustible in their character, and meet all those contingencies which spring up where it is necessary to escape from a burning boat. I have left the provisions of the bill so that the gunwales may be constructed with such floats as they see fit to use.

If Mr. Stanton, with his vulcanized float, as he calls it, can turn any vessel into a life-boat—as he says he can—if a metallic boat, or any other structure sustained by these floats, will, in the judgment of the inspectors, answer the purpose, they will pass them, and if not, they will not pass them. I would rather have the question settled by the inspectors, than to undertake to settle that complicated question here in the Senate.

Mr. HALE. The very object of the Senator from Massachusetts is the object at which I am aiming. I would remark, however, that I was a little surprised that he should say I had not taken pains to inform myself in regard to this matter by other means than by consulting with persons in the lobby. Sir, if the Senator from Massachusetts has not had behind and around him a whole corps of persons with whom he has been in consultation—

Mr. DAVIS. Yes, sir; but they were not patentees.

Mr. HALE. I did not say whether they were patentees or not; neither did the Senator from Massachusetts. The honorable Senator has not answered the objection which I made. He has described a metallic life-boat, so many feet long, and so many feet and inches wide, and so many feet deep. I am told, by a reference to the Patent Office, that exactly such a boat as that described in the bill—or so nearly so that it varies only one inch—is a boat which has been patented. The honorable Senator says that he did not obtain his dimensions there, but from an officer of the Navy. I have been told—and I have no doubt it is the fact—that these are the dimensions of Mr. Francis's life-boat. If it is, then you compel these gentlemen to get a metallic life-boat, answering, in every particular, to the length, width, and depth of Mr. Francis's life-boat. Well, sir, what makes it a life-boat? There is but one metallic life-boat, that I know of, and that is the one having air chambers in it. Then it seems to me that, by this section, as it now stands, you compel all owners of steamboats to purchase this very boat. I want to strike all that out, and leave it to the owners of steamboats, and others concerned, to get the best boats they can. I want to leave them at liberty in this respect. I do not want to give them Hobson's choice—take this or nothing. The honorable Senator, no doubt, got his information from somebody who is not a patentee in regard to the proper dimensions of this metallic life-boat; but notwithstanding that, it appears to me that he has got in the bill just precisely such a provision as will compel everybody concerned to purchase this boat, and no other, whether it should turn out, on investigation, to be the best boat or not; and that is a provision which I want the Senate to refuse to adhere to. Let them have two boats, the best that can be found, composed either of metal, or of any other material, as the inspectors may think best. But if we are to compel this particular patented boat to be used, then say so at once, and right out; and do not indicate it by giving the precise dimensions of this boat, as well as the material of which it is made.

But, sir, this bill appears to me to be liable to another objection. It provides that there shall be two boats, one of them of a given size, but the other may be no larger than the hull of an acorn:

"Every vessel, carrying passengers, shall have at least two boats supplied with oars, in good condition at all times for service, one of which boats shall be a metallic life-boat, fire-proof, of approved model, not less than twenty-five feet long, six feet six inches wide, and two feet deep, and in all respects a good, substantial, safe sea-boat, capable of sustaining inside and outside fifty persons, with life-lines attached to the gunwale."

Such is the language of the bill as it now stands. Thus, while you have all the dimensions of one boat, with a variety of other particulars in regard to what it shall be, there is no description whatever of what the other boat shall be. Now, I will ask the Secretary to read from the desk the amendment as I propose it.

The amendment was read by the Secretary, as follows:

Strike out of the fourth section, lines four, five, and six, the following words:

One of which boats shall be a metallic life-boat, fire-proof, of approved model, not less than twenty-five feet long, six feet six inches wide, and two feet deep.

Mr. HALE. Now read that part of the section as it will read with the omission of these words.

That portion of the section was accordingly read, as follows:

"That every such vessel, carrying passengers, shall have at least two boats supplied with oars, in good condition at all times for service, and in all respects be good, substantial, safe sea-boats, each capable of sustaining fifty persons," &c.

Mr. HALE. Should the Senate see fit to adopt this amendment, it will throw the whole thing open; it will give the inspectors the discretion of taking what they believe to be the best boats. It may be possible to amend the bill in other respects, but in regard to these boats I propose to give the widest latitude—the world at large—to get these boats from, so that the best may be had, and not to confine the selection to this one particular boat of the dimensions prescribed in the bill. I charge upon the bill that it compels every man who owns or sails a steamboat, whether he will or not, to purchase the patented life-boat of Mr. Francis; and the Senate has already declared that it is not their intention to pass a provision having such a meaning, or that they should be compelled to purchase any patented article. But if the Senate insist upon the principle that they will compel the best article to be bought, whether it is patented or not, then I have an argument with them as to whether this boat of Mr. Francis is the best that can be got. Till that, however, is settled, I have nothing in the world to say. I think the best way would be to leave the whole subject open.

Mr. DAVIS. I think the Senator from New Hampshire does not understand the purpose aimed at in drawing this section of the bill. I suppose that every steamer which floats carries at least one boat; ordinarily, I believe, they carry two. This provision requires that they shall have two, one of which at least shall be a life-boat, and made of metal. I did not undertake to prescribe the dimensions of the other boat, for this reason: that is the boat in the ordinary use of the vessel, and those who navigate the vessel are the best judges of the dimensions and character of the boat which they wish to employ in daily service. I leave that to their judgment, for the very obvious reason that they are the best judges of what suits their convenience. A boat of the size which the Senator from New Hampshire intends to provide, competent to carry fifty persons, with life-lines attached to the gunwales, would be a very inconvenient boat for the ordinary service of a steamer, and therefore it is that I think that portion of the bill should not be changed, and that the owners or masters of vessels should be left to determine upon the size of the boat employed in ordinary service.

The Senator leaves out of sight the fact that for every addition of fifty persons, we require an additional life-boat, except upon the rivers, made to carry at least fifty persons. We, however, require but one boat to be metallic, leaving it at the option of those who furnish the boats to have them of metal or of wood, only requiring that they shall be safe boats, and capable of carrying fifty persons. This is putting to a close shift enough to sustain life, and you necessarily will put a portion of them even then into the water upon the life-lines. It was never supposed that all could, in every case, be sustained by boats, but that the weaker, the children and the females, and those who would be incompetent to sustain themselves in the water, might take their position in the boats. The very terms in which the provision is expressed show that it will be in many cases, and in many circumstances, impossible to save life in the way that it is desirable. The provision is not large enough for it. The only cases in which the life-boat for every fifty persons is dispensed with, is upon the rivers, and where the inspectors shall be satisfied that the other provisions made by the owners are adequate and ample for the preservation of human life. The reason why I do not go on and require an additional boat for each addition of fifty persons, in boats navigating the rivers, is this: It is said that it will be an encumbrance to vessels. To vessels of a large size I am aware that it would be an encumbrance to have to carry a life-boat for each of the fifty passengers on board. I leave it, therefore, to the judgment of the inspectors who are upon the spot, and who can see what provisions are made for the preservation of life, and who understand that they are required to see that they are ample. If they are satisfied with the description of means for escape, required by this act, then we are content that they shall say that the vessel shall engage in business with other means for the preservation of the lives of passengers. But I do think the Senate should make some suitable and adequate provision for the preservation of life, the destruction of which has been enormous; and it is quite time that some provision was made for its better protection. Before the Senate strikes out the provision requiring a metallic life-boat, I hope they will consider the matter well, and not be carried away with the idea that the bill subjects the owners of boats to purchase such life-boats as are patented. I do not understand it so at all. If it was so, I should ask to have this very provision struck out. The Senator from New Hampshire says, that this provision will require the purchase of a patented boat. But what evidence does he bring that it is so? He says the dimensions of the boat as described in the bill are precisely the same as those of a particular patented boat. Suppose that is true. Does he undertake to say that any man can patent the size of a boat? No man undertakes such a thing as that. That is out of his reach. This size is taken because it is a convenient one for this particular purpose.

I should not have the least objection to varying the dimensions, provided it can be done without impairing the usefulness of the boat. Experience, I suppose, has shown that a boat of about that size, is the right kind of boat for passing through the surf and be employed in service of this description. I have also the word of Mr. Francis himself, and made complainingly, too, that the bill does not touch his patent at all. He is a very respectable man, and he was very anxious that I should embrace his patent. I have tried not to do it; and he says that the bill does not embrace it. He has a boat which is patented, made of corrugated iron, made in a particular way, by which he considers the iron is greatly strengthened. He has said to me again and again, that the privilege of making metallic life-boats is open to all the world. That is the way in which I understand it too. There is no purpose of touching the patent of any body. I meant to steer clear of the whole of that thing, and I hope the provision will be maintained.

Mr. HAMLIN. The Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. Davis] has stated some of the reasons which would induce me to go with him in opposing the amendment proposed by the Senator from New Hampshire. But there are some other reasons to which he has not alluded, and to which I will ask the attention of the Senate.

The bill has been prepared with great attention by the Senator from Massachusetts, [Mr. Davis,] and much credit is due to him for the degree of perfection which it now possesses. In my judgment there is no one provision of the bill of more importance in regard to the security of public life than that one which provides that steamboats shall be provided with fire-proof boats. If that is stricken out I know of no other provision that may not as well be erased. The Senator from New Hampshire tells us that he designs to leave the matter open; to give to parties the right of competition; or in other words, to leave it to the discretion of the owners of the boat to say which is the best for the purpose. If the argument of the Senator proves anything it proves altogether too much. It simply goes to the extent that you should place no restriction upon those who undertake the business of transporting passengers from place to place, but that he should be allowed to do everything according to the best mode which his judgment may suggest. Now, it is to obviate that very thing that the provisions and penalties in this bill have been provided. It is for the purpose of compelling those persons who own boats to have them inspected by competent and disinterested persons for the purpose of making them safe for the public.

If the Senator from New Hampshire had looked into the statistics which have been collected in regard to this matter, he would have found that, in nearly one half of those instances in which boats have been destroyed by fire, the great loss of life has been caused by the want of fire-proof boats; and yet, in the face of this, he would leave it open to competition, and there might, after all, be no fire-proof boat there, as it might not be in accordance with the interests or the wishes of those who own or sail the boat. I repeat, that this is one of the most important provisions of the bill. It may not be of such vital importance to vessels on our rivers as to those upon the ocean and the lakes; but let those who have witnessed or heard of the sad calamities from fire, where no metallic life-boats have been found, answer whether or not these boats should be adopted. Sir, we all know that the cry of "fire" on board a vessel is as horrifying to all on board as is the sound of the breakers on a lee-shore to the ear of the sailor. The Senator from New Hampshire would have this provision in regard to metallic life-boats stricken out. He would have no life-boats which are patented. He would not compel those who own steamboats to purchase those life-boats which are patented! Very well, sir; neither would I. The Senator will, perhaps, allow me to ask him if, by this amendment, he does not intend so to construct the bill as to have Stanton's boat? I suppose so. I suppose that the friends of that boat have had the ear of the honorable Senator. Why did they not go to the Committee on Commerce, and ask for an investigation, instead of going about the lobbies of the Capitol in this way, for the purpose of getting this provision stricken out? I may be mistaken; but I apprehend that, if the Senator will answer me frankly, he will say, that it was his design to bring in this boat as within the class of boats to be used by the steamers.

The Senator from Massachusetts, I think, has very well answered the objection raised by the Senator from New Hampshire to this provision. I think the Senator from Massachusetts is perfectly right in the construction put by him on that portion of the bill, and that there can be no mistake about the correctness of his assertion, that it will not compel the owners of steamers to purchase Mr. Francis's patent life-boat; that boat may be as long, as wide, and as deep as the one which steamboat owners will be obliged to obtain under this law, but those are not the qualities patented by Mr. Francis. In his application for a patent, he may have described his boat as being of similar dimensions, for aught I know, but that is not the thing for which Mr. Francis claims a patent; it is for the material, and the manner in which that material, corrugated iron, is worked into the boat, that he claims the patent, so that if any other person were to construct a life-boat of plain iron—even though it were of the same dimensions with Mr. Francis's boat, yet it would not be an infraction of his patent. The air chambers, and all the other matters which render his boat peculiar, are also described in his application, and every one, on comparing it with this bill, must perceive that it is not the boat described here. They are both metallic life-boats which are spoken of, it is true, but it is incorrect to suppose that the metallic life-boat which steamboat proprietors would, in accordance with the terms of the bill, be obliged to procure, is identical with Mr. Francis's boat. In reply to the argument of the Senator from New Hampshire, in favor of leaving it to the discretion of the persons who will have to purchase, to decide what kind of life-boat they will get, whether metallic, or otherwise, it might be asked: what necessity is there for imposing any restrictions on them at all? Why compel them, by another provision of this bill, to submit for examination by the inspectors, the iron of which the boilers are to be made? Why not leave them open to purchase the best article in the market, according to their own judgment? Why place any restrictions on the manner of constructing the boats?

There is no provision in the bill of more importance, in my opinion, than that which renders it compulsory to have a fire-proof life-boat on board steamers. That is my view of the matter; and I hope that the Senate will reject the amendment of the Senator from New Hampshire.

Mr. HALE. I rather despair of being understood by the Senate, if I have failed of being understood by so intelligent a gentleman as the chairman of the Committee on Commerce, [Mr. HAMLIN.] I will in the first place, however, answer his question. He wants to know if I have not spoken to somebody out of the Senate Chamber; and the inquiry was put with an air that seemed to imply that it was a crime, which should at least subject a man to the censure of the Senate. Now, I have seen in the newspapers accounts of persons coming here, who were interested in getting the ear of members of Congress, and giving dinners, and having hampers of champagne come by the railroad, and everything of that sort, and I have seen accounts of very sumptuous entertainments, to which members of Congress were invited by persons interested in matters before Congress, and as I have been questioned by the Senator from Maine, I will make a clean breast of it. I do not know that I ever dined with any of these gentlemen that come here for the purpose that I have suggested, and as for ever having drank with them, I never did, for I have not tasted a drop of spirits for twenty years; but I believe I did once smoke a cigar with a gentleman of that description, for I recollect that on one occasion when I had been smoking with a gentleman, he told me that he was an agent for some patentee, who had something before Congress. I admit that a gentleman has actually spoken to me—[laughter]—a gentleman has spoken to me on this matter, outside of the Senate Chamber. But gentlemen have not come to wing my seat on both sides of me for several days, while a matter has been going on; nothing of that sort.

The Senator seems to suppose that I propose to strike out the provision which requires life-boats. No such thing. The Senator asks me a question, and desires a candid answer, which I will give him. He wants to know whether, if we strike out Francis's life-boat, which is now in the bill, I have not another to offer? I will say that I do not intend to offer any. I have no other motion to make. If the Committee on Commerce will put in a provision which shall secure to the public the best safeguards which the inventions of science and the discoveries of practical men can bring to their purpose, that is all I ask, and all I want.

I have been peculiarly fortunate in my position in the Senate. I have been so well known by the outsiders that they never come to me for influence. I recollect that when I was making a speech on one occasion in the State of New Hampshire, I remarked that it was a peculiarly fortunate circumstance in my position here that no candidate for public favors or public influence ever troubled me. A man at once responded, "That is true, for I went there for an office, and I avoided you as I would the plague." Whatever else I have done, in these things gentlemen must exonerate me. I have walked as safe from all appeals for such influence as if I was all covered with a leprous disease, amongst these harpies that come here to feed and fatten upon the public Treasury. There is that advantage in being an Abolitionist or a Free-Soiler. [Laughter.] You do not have such vermin as that around you. They will keep away from you, and I will submit to any other charge under heaven but that of having anything to do with them, and whenever that charge is brought I will tell you my hands are clean. I claim no approbation for that, as though I was the most virtuous man in the world, but because none have been here to apply to me. No man having a patent and coming here for a fat job has been such a fool as to come to me; he knows better, and goes somewhere else. I claim in this matter to stand here, and to have suggested the views which I did without any sinister influences of applications or offers. Neither myself nor any friend that I have on earth, that I know anything about, is to be benefited a thousandth part of a hair by this or any other amendment, and the only interest I have in it personally, is, that I hope some time or other to go as far South and West as I can, with safety, [laughter,] and without danger from accidents upon steamboats and from other casualties; and I want the legislation of the country, in common with all other citizens, to be such as to give equal and impartial protection to everybody.

How can gentlemen, lawyers, educated men—men who are familiar with the forms and phrases of common and of legal language, get up here and tell me, that if a man has got a patent life-boat, in which the proportions enter into the patent, and that he has described it, and then come forward and describe in their bill just exactly such a boat—just so long, just so wide, and just so deep, and a metallic life-boat, and no other metallic life-boat being in existence except that one which is patented, how can they tell me that the boat they describe is not the patented boat? I do not believe either of these gentlemen can stand up and look himself in the face in a mirror and tell himself so. [Laughter.] They would feel in a ridiculous position if they were to attempt it. It is in the bill, and I want it stricken out; and I do not wish to have anything put in except that which shall best subserve the object of this bill—the safety, and the greatest degree of safety, to everybody; and the very pertinacity with which this provision is adhered to, convinces me with tenfold force of the propriety of striking it out.

Sir, since it has been so fashionable, under such high authority, to ask gentlemen if they have not been spoken to outside of the Senate, I would like to ask those honorable gentlemen if they have not been spoken to—talked to—nothing else. Have they not been talked to outside of the Senate and inside of the Senate? Have not those gentlemen violated the very rules of the Senate, which forbid that there should be whispering and talking, and attending to other business when gentlemen are endeavoring to enlighten them? [Laughter.] But, sir, all that has been done. Now, if you are going to have a bill for the better security of life on board of steamboats, why have it; make a clean thing of it, and do not let it be a bill for the better security of life, and for other purposes, by putting into it a patented life-boat, and thereby make the owner of the boat the richest man in the United States of America. I am willing that the bill should assume any shape the Senate may deem best; but if the Senate go to putting into it a patented article, on the ground that it is the best, then I am ready to go into an argument as to which is the best article. I want, however, to strike out this provision, and thereby avoid such a discussion. All that I propose, as the Senate will see, is not to insert a single word. If the Senate will strike this out, then it would be open to amendment by inserting "the best life-boat, combining all the qualities of economy and safety that can be devised," or some such words. What is the objection to it? Why must the number of feet and inches, and the width and the depth, which are here mentioned, be adhered to? If you want to include patents, why put them in at once; but if you want to strike them out, then strike them out so that it shall be clearly seen what is the design of the Senate in this respect. If the committee think we should have metallic boats with air-chambers, let us have them; let them have the best thing that can be had. But if the committee will do a thing which they say they did not mean to do, and thus put in an article which is patented, then I may have an argument as to which is the best. I will not, however, enter into that now. I have as little interest in the matter as anybody.

Mr. DAVIS. I have only one word to say in reply, and that is, if the Senator from New Hampshire believes that we require that the life-boat should, in all cases, be of the exact dimensions described in the bill, he is mistaken. All that we require is, that the life-boat shall not be of a less size than that mentioned. The object was to insure the employment of boats of such a class as would be capable of performing the important duties contemplated. They may be as much larger than the size described as parties may choose; in that respect, it is not my intention to impose any limits, and the bill was never so designed.

Mr. RUSK. The adoption of the amendment of the Senator from New Hampshire would deprive this bill of a large portion of its merits. I venture the assertion that an examination into statistics will show that in all the accidents which have happened to steamers near shore, by far the greater proportion of deaths has been caused by the want of means to reach shore, rather than from any other cause; yet, the Senator from New Hampshire requires us to strike out the absolute requirement which the bill imposes on the owners and navigators of steamers to provide a life-boat for the purpose of carrying off the passengers in case of fire or wreck, and he assumes that these life-boats are patented, and that the bill is intended to cover the patent. The only proof which he has brought in support of this assumption, still put forward by the Senator in spite of the thrice-reiterated declaration of the Senator from Massachusetts that the bill does not touch the patent—is the assertion that the bill describes a boat of the same size as that which Mr. Francis is said to have patented. But that argument now drops from under him, for it is evident that the bill does not require that the life-boat shall be of the exact dimensions therein set forth; as the Senator from Massachusetts has clearly shown the dimensions mentioned constitute merely the minimum size of the boats; and I would rather trust to the sober judgment of the Senator from Massachusetts than to the mere instinct of the Senator from New Hampshire. I hope that this provision of the bill will not be destroyed by the amendment of the honorable Senator.

The Senator from New Hampshire has chosen to make here a confession laudatory of himself, and to that there can be, of course, no objection. But the Senator has also alluded to gentlemen now in the Senate Chamber, whom we have seen here for several days past, and whom I hope we shall see, until this bill is perfected. The Senator has seen fit to cast reflections on those gentlemen; but, sir, I know them, and I tell the honorable Senator from New Hampshire, that neither he nor I need be ashamed of possessing as good a character as any one of these gentlemen. They have no patents. They have been sent here by the respectable people of the Western country, who are interested in steamboat navigation, and whose lives are constantly exposed to danger, in consequence of the want of some degree of caution; selected as intelligent men who have been engaged in steamboat navigation themselves, and thoroughly conversant with the subject, and one of whom for thirty-five years acted as commander of a steamboat, during which time, to his honor be it said, not a single accident occurred to him. His character may be taken as a standard by which to judge of the whole of these gentlemen. Sir, their character would not suffer by a comparison with that of anybody; their object in coming here is highly laudable; they come here full of experience, which they are desirous of communicating to the Legislature for the purpose of conferring a benefit on the whole community; and, allow me to say to the honorable Senator from New Hampshire, that there would have been less talk about this bill if he and I knew as much about steamboating as these gentlemen do, and if we had had as much consultation with them as the Senator from Massachusetts has had.

Mr. BRODHEAD. I made the inquiry which I suggested the other day in regard to this section without consulting any one. It seems to me, however, that the difference between the views of the Senator from New Hampshire and those of the Senator from Massachusetts can be easily adjusted. The Senator from New Hampshire thinks that a certain life-boat called Francis's life-boat would be favored if the section passes as it is now. The Senators from Massachusetts and Maine are of a different opinion. I would propose to amend the bill by adding at the end of this fourth section the following proviso:

Provided further, That this section shall not be so construed as to compel the purchase or use of the boat known as Francis's life boat.

With such a proviso as that I think there can be no objection to the section.

Mr. DAVIS. I have no objection to that amendment at all, provided that if instead of using the name of Mr. Francis you should use the words "any patented life-boat."

Mr. BROADHEAD. I am quite willing to shape the proviso so as to meet the wishes of the Senator from Massachusetts. It will then read:

And provided further, That this section shall not be so construed as to compel the purchase of any patented life-boat.

The PRESIDING OFFICER, [Mr. NORRIS.] The question must first be taken on the amendment proposed by the Senator from New Hampshire, unless it be withdrawn.

The question was taken on the motion to strike out, and it was decided in the negative.

The question then recurred on the adoption of the proviso, and it was agreed to.

Mr. CHASE. I ask leave to introduce an amendment, to come in at the forty-ninth line of the first clause of the ninth section, after the word "accommodations." It is to insert the words "for her crew and." It will then read, "suitable accommodations for her crew and for passengers."

The object of the amendment is simply to require the inspectors—as they are required to ascertain that there are suitable accommodations for deck passengers, to ascertain also that there are suitable accommodations for the crews of boats. I have consulted with the Senator from Massachusetts, who has the charge of the bill, and he has no objection to the amendment. It seems to me to be of considerable importance to provide for this class of men, who are worthy of consideration, and who are not provided for in the bill.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. GEYER. When this bill was before the Senate as in Committee of the Whole, the words "or spirits" were inserted in the tenth line of the sixth section, after the word "oil," so as to make it read "oil or spirits of turpentine." I move to amend by striking out the words "or spirits."

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. SEBASTIAN. I observe that in section eighteen, as the bill is now printed with the amendments, there are two distinct offenses created against the policy of the act; the one is the making of steamboat boilers out of other iron than that required to be stamped and inspected, and the other is for counterfeiting the stamp or marks prescribed by the Secretary of the Treasury. In the first instance the penalty is only one hundred dollars, and in the next it is five hundred dollars, and an imprisonment not exceeding two years. I move to amend the eighteenth section by striking out the word "one," and inserting "five," so as to make the penalty in the first instance equal in this respect to the penalty in the next. My object in offering the amendment is this: By the nineteenth section, the penalty is five hundred dollars, and an imprisonment not exceeding two years, for any person counterfeiting the stamp. It seems to me that the penalty attached to both of these delinquencies ought to be the same. For the making of a boiler with unstamped iron, the penalty is one hundred dollars—a penalty totally inadequate to carry out the regulations made in the bill. Sir, if there be any one provision in the bill—and I think in its details it is as comprehensive as any specimen of human legislation that I have ever heard discussed in this Hall—if there is any one provision which is of paramount importance, it is that which regulates the quality and tenacity of the iron out of which boilers are to be made, and prescribes the pressure to which it is to be subjected. Now, the penalty for the construction of a boiler out of inferior iron is only one hundred dollars, and my objection to it is, that being so low, the owner of a boat may disregard it, and construct his boiler of the cheaper iron, and then make a clear money speculation, even if subjected to the penalty. I am sure that it must be the object of the Senate, in perfecting this bill, to suppress, as much as possible, that kind of barter by which we have heretofore exchanged human life for mere money. It is a grievance of which all engaged in Western commerce have complained, that the manufacturers of boilers and engines, and the owners of steamboats, have too often sacrificed human life from motives of pecuniary advantage.

I have in my hand a statement, which I presume is reliable, which shows how little effect the penalty proposed in this section may have:

"Section sixteen provides that any person making a boiler of uninspected iron, shall forfeit $100! A large cylinder boiler weighs about eight thousand pounds. Cheap and inferior iron costs from one to one and a half cents per pound less than the best iron. A person, therefore, contracting to build a boiler, could, under the penalty of this law, make money by putting in the most inferior iron, and paying the fine, even supposing that he was forced to pay it in every case. In every case where he was not forced to pay it, his profit would be the additional $100. It is manifest, therefore, that this provision as it stands, will virtually defeat the object sought to be attained, so far, at least, as the quality of the iron is concerned. The penalty certainly should be greater than that in section seventeen, for counterfeiting the stamp, and a still heavier punishment should be inflicted on all persons using boilers made of unstamped iron."

I think it is manifest that the object sought to be obtained by this bill will be lost, unless the penalty is not higher in this case. The penalty for counterfeiting a stamp is $500, and I think should be as much. My object in making the amendment is merely to increase the penalty, and I think the Senator from Massachusetts, [Mr. DAVIS,] to whom I feel much obliged for the service he has rendered in perfecting this bill—will agree with me that the penalty is totally inadequate, inasmuch as it appears that the provision may not only be violated, and the fine incurred, and still a speculation be made. The difference in the cost of the inferior iron and that which the bill requires will more than cover the penalty. I hope the Senator from Massachusetts will agree to the amendment, as I think it is entirely reasonable.

Mr. DAVIS. The Senator has not mistaken my view of the matter at all. He has satisfied my mind that he is right, and I hope the amendment may be adopted.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. DE SAUSSURE. I move to amend the fortieth section of the bill, by striking out the concluding words, "according to the aggravation of the offense," in order to insert some definitive penalty. As the section stands, it reads thus:

"That any inspector who shall, upon any pretense, receive any fee or reward for services rendered under this act, except what is herein allowed to him, shall forfeit his office."

This is all right.

"—And if found guilty on indictment, be otherwise punished, according to the aggravation of the offense."

That is too indefinite. It is a wise and humane principle of legislation, that the penalty should never be left indefinite. The Constitution, it is true, prescribes that excessive fines or unusual punishments shall not be inflicted; but that is the only restriction here, upon the discretion of the court; otherwise a man might be fined $10,000 and be imprisoned ten years under the clause. I think it will be better to adopt the course pursued in other parts of the bill; for example, in the nineteenth section it is provided, that if any person shall counterfeit the marks prescribed by the Secretary of the Treasury for inspected boiler iron, he shall be liable to a fine not exceeding $500, and imprisonment not exceeding two years.

And again: in the twenty-ninth section the same provision, as to the punishment, is contained exactly; that is, in cases where there shall be a false certificate. So it is throughout the act.

Mr. DAVIS. The section that the Senator proposes to amend, is the only exception.

Mr. DE SAUSSURE. I think it would be better to amend it, and make the punishment definitive.

Mr. DAVIS. What amendment does the Senator propose?

Mr. DE SAUSSURE. I propose to insert, in the place of that which I move to strike out, the words "by fine or imprisonment: Provided, such fine shall not exceed — dollars, and such imprisonment not exceed — months."

Mr. DAVIS. I would suggest that, instead of striking out the words "according to the aggravation of the offense," to add to them the words "by fine not exceeding — dollars, and imprisonment not exceeding — months."

Mr. DE SAUSSURE. I am very willing to do that. My amendment then will be to add to the section the words "by fine not exceeding $500, or imprisonment not exceeding six months, or both."

The amendment was agreed to.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. If there be no further amendment proposed, the question will be, Shall the bill be engrossed and read a third time?

Mr. MALLORY. It is with a great deal of regret that I find myself constrained to vote against the bill. It appears to be popular in the Senate, and might claim my vote on the consideration that it is an object of national importance, that seems to have been duly considered by the committee to which it was referred. On that account I shall vote against it with a great deal of reluctance and regret. But, sir, it is not the first attempt of the kind which has been made by legislation. It is an attempt to amend the act of 1838, which had for its object the preservation of life on board of vessels propelled by steam. I think that this bill, of course, is much better than that, but still that it is not calculated to attain the great object proposed. If it were a sectional matter, if it referred only to one portion of the country and received the approbation of Senators from that portion, I should feel still greater reluctance to saying one word in opposition to it; but it is national, and applies as well to vessels navigated by steam upon the Atlantic waters and the Atlantic ocean, as upon the Western waters—as well to vessels among which explosions rarely occur, as to that class on the Western waters where they are of frequent and disastrous occurrence.

Independent of some of the minor details, which I will not detain the Senate in objecting to, the main objection I have to the bill is upon the principle of making the safety of the passengers depend immediately upon the will of the inspectors to be appointed. As the matter is adjusted now, the self-interest of steamboat owners and steamboat companies is placed between the traveling community and the disasters. The self-interest of steamboat owners prompts them to have good boats, good boilers, and good machinery, in order to establish a good reputation for their boats. The bill before us contemplates not only that no register, no license, no enrollment, shall be granted to any vessel hereafter built, but that no shipping articles, no manifests, no crew list, for any vessel engaged in the trade, coastwise or in a foreign trade, shall be given to them, or, in short, that no steam vessel shall clear out, coastwise or otherwise, from any custom-house, until the examination attempted to be provided for shall have been made and the certificate given. If it were possible that such an examination could be made by competent persons, it would be a great object to be attained; but it is upon the established fact that such an examination as is contemplated is not really provided for, and cannot be attained, that I shall vote against the bill. Here are examinations to be made by some fifteen or twenty or more inspectors, who are to be political appointees, appointed by collectors of the customs—every collector differing in his particular notions as to the qualifications necessary in an inspector—every collector regarding the machinery and the boat in a different light, and one collector regarding one system of machinery and one kind of boiler as the safest, and another collector preferring a different kind; each making the appointments in accordance with his own notions of the safety of the lives of the passengers. These collectors are not chosen with reference to such appointments. They are chosen with reference to another and different class of qualifications. The result will be that the inspectors will be the friends of the collectors; perhaps their relations; at all events their political associates, and like other appointments made, as the inspectors of the customs, &c., they will all be made no doubt on political considerations.

Then the bill contemplates that the inspectors of boilers and hulls shall go on the boats after the hulls have been laid, and the machinery put into its place, and satisfy themselves that the boilers are of the best form, and the machinery and hull best adapted for the purpose in view. If we could find any man upon earth, or any set of men, sufficiently skilled in this matter to examine the boiler after having been placed in the vessel, and tell, from an external examination, that it was the best, that it contained no flaw, no defect; and if we could attain this object, which every engineer and machinist on the face of the earth will tell you is impossible, we do not even stop there. We require them to go further, and see that the machinery hereafter to be made, boilers hereafter invented, and the various appliances to steam machinery, are to be the very best that could be adopted. They are to be satisfied, and, upon their being satisfied, is every inventor to depend for the application of his machinery. There is no appeal from the inspector's decisions. Here is a man who builds a boat on a new and improved plan, or with a new and improved boiler; here is the competition which it is the policy of the country and of the age to encourage; but he must satisfy the political appointees—the inspectors—that his machinery, which has never before been used but by himself—a pure invention of his own, for which he alone deserves credit, of which no other man knew anything—that it is the best, or he cannot get a certificate, cannot go to sea, and his vessel is useless to him. To carry out the intention of the bill, you have got to suppose that the inspectors are the purest men; and our Government does not proceed on that ground. In the making of appointments, the Government proceeds upon the ground that human nature is corruptible, and the very highest office to the lowest has thrown around it ten thousand shields in the shape of bonds. These men are to be placed in a station holding more power over the great steaming interests of the country than any set of men have ever possessed in this country. I ask you, if it is not a power peculiarly liable to be abused? It is a matter purely discretionary. There is no responsibility for an error. If they say a certain boiler is not applicable to the machinery, a boiler that was never tested, never tried, how is their discretion to be brought to the question? They are clearly not responsible for it. Here is a position of great responsibility; a position that may be abused to a greater extent than that of any other trust I know of in this Government. The salary to be given to these men is $1,500 a year. That will not obtain the most scientific knowledge upon the subject, and, with due deference to what was observed the other day—for there seems to be great reason in it, that this small salary will get men from the workshops, and that they are the men whom we want—I would say we do want such men; but we want men, at the same time, combining with practical knowledge a scientific education; possessed with that knowledge which the officers in the British Navy possess; men who first stood at the desk, and then practiced in the machine shops, to apply themselves to the practical knowledge of machinery.

The objection, then, that I have to the bill is, that it puts a stop at once to all competition. It proceeds upon a wrong principle. And when I make this objection, I do not wish to make a long speech upon the subject. I throw out these suggestions as the reasons which shall govern my vote, and as showing the principle which I would adopt. Senators will recollect that the rigid rules of the common law, before the laws regulating common carriers were relaxed, held the carriers responsible for the goods in their charge to the utmost extent. It was no excuse that they were set upon by robbers. They had to pay for the goods. Sir, the safety of passengers in this country is of as great importance as was the property of men in that age before these rules were relaxed. I would say, then, pursue this principle: At the time a register or enrollment is granted to steamers, demand of the owners a bond to respond in damages, and hold them accountable for all losses that may accrue from the explosion of boilers; and let them select what means they please as to the boats or machinery. Leave competition entirely open. Do not bind them to select a stop-cock, or valve, or a pump of any particular form and construction, and of such a length. Give them the widest field for competition. Let them select any machinery they please, but hold them responsible for all losses that may ensue from explosions. Why is it that explosions occur so rarely on the Atlantic waters? We scarcely ever hear of one of them. What is it, unless it be on account of the greater care exercised in the selection of officers and engineers who navigate the boats? It is well known that on the Western waters the promotion is from the fireman to the engineer, and that the engineers possess merely the practical knowledge gained as firemen. It is not so upon the Northern and upon the Atlantic waters. The engineers there are scientific men, as well as those who have practically acquired an education upon that subject. My objection, then, to the bill is, that it makes the judgment of the inspectors—the political appointees—the test of every other man's merits, and substitutes their judgment and mere discretion for the self-interest which the passengers now have between these and the owners of the boat. The whole philosophy of the bill, in my opinion, is wrong; therefore, I shall vote against it.

Mr. DAVIS. I have but a word to say in reply to the Senator from Florida. He seems not to know that the law of discretion has been the law long enough, and that all these mischiefs have come up under it. He seems to overlook another fact. If a simple liability were sufficient, why, does he not know that that has always existed, as under the common law, for negligence and carelessness, at all times and under all circumstances? And has it proved enough? Is it adequate?

Mr. MALLORY. I will answer the Senator, by saying that he misconceives me entirely. There have been various attempts made in the States to reach this object. In the State of Alabama they have made it murder in the engineer—punishing by death for explosion, where negligence could reach him. But you can never fix negligence upon the engineer. My proposition is to make him responsible, negligence or no negligence. Not only responsible for not having exercised due diligence, but for all explosions of steam.

Mr. BORLAND. I have a few words to say in respect to this bill. I shall not go into an examination of it. I have not examined its details. I have not felt qualified to do so. I do know, however, that very serious evils exist in the steam navigation of the region of country in which I live—the great Mississippi valley. It has long been indispensable to the safety of our lives and property that those evils should be corrected. All legislation heretofore has failed to correct them. We have now before us a bill which proposes to accomplish that object. It has been before us the whole session, and has been examined and elaborated, I apprehend, more patiently, thoroughly, and faithfully than any bill ever was before in the Senate of the United States. I repeat, I have not the practical knowledge of the subject which would qualify me to examine and pass upon the details of the bill. But this I do know, that not only has it passed through careful examination and preparation at the hands of the Senators who have devoted themselves most patiently and assiduously to it, but those Senators have had, during their labors, the assistance, the suggestions, and the advice of the most respectable, intelligent, and experienced steamboat commanders and engineers which this country has produced. Some of those gentlemen are personally known to me, and have been ever since I have resided in the Western country, now sixteen years. Their characters, both as individuals and as professional men, are the very highest; and I am satisfied that no one residing in the Mississippi valley, who has resided there for the last ten or twelve years, would hesitate to take their judgment and opinions as the best authority that could be given. It has been with their advice and assistance—under their patient and careful supervision—that the Committee on Commerce have framed this bill. For myself, I rely upon those who have prepared this bill with entire confidence. If it be not perfect, and shall not answer the purpose for which it is designed, it is my opinion, that in the present state of knowledge on the subject, it is impossible to make one that will answer the purpose. That it has defects we must suppose; for all the works of human hands and human brains have defects; but I believe this—and I believe it on the faith which I have in those who have made it—to be the most perfect that ever has been made, and the most perfect that can be made at the present day.

All the gentlemen to whom I allude I consider eminently qualified to construct a bill to remedy the evils which we have suffered. They know what those evils are, and they know, if any one can know, how to cure them. Without disparagement to any of the others, I take occasion to allude particularly to one, who has been alluded to by the Senator from Texas, and who was among the very first that ever navigated a steamboat upon the Ohio and Mississippi rivers. He began there as far back as 1817—the fourth in the business—and until the last year has constantly been occupied in the business. His career has been most wonderful; it has been one which will hand down his name to the latest posterity with the highest honors; for his has been a most responsible position, involving the care of the life and property of millions; and during that time—thirty-five years—not a single accident ever happened to life or property while under his care. Such a man is Captain Shallcross, of Louisville, Kentucky. Now, when a gentleman of that character and experience—a man respected by all who know him in the community where he lives, and along a line of fifteen hundred miles of river navigation, to which his life has been devoted uninterruptedly for thirty-five years—whose character as a man, as an engineer, and as a steamboat commander, is without spot or blemish, but is indorsed, and established, and commended to us by a career of so protracted, and of such unparalleled success, without a single failure, comes forward and tells me this is right, I should consider myself, or any man no better qualified, presuming a great deal to question his judgment of a practical question in his profession, and scarcely less than criminal to oppose obstacles in the way of what he tells me will protect the lives and property of our citizens—of the millions who travel with their families, and who transport their property by hundreds of millions on our great rivers.

For these reasons I take this bill as it is, believing it to be the best that can be made, and that it is to confer great benefits upon the country in which I reside. I, like many others, have a direct personal interest in all this. I, with my family, have to travel upon our rivers for thousands of miles. The life of myself and of my family is at stake; and I am for availing myself of all the safeguards that can be thrown around me and mine, and not only around me and mine, but around all my constituents and fellow-citizens. I therefore accept this bill not only with satisfaction, but with feelings of the highest admiration and gratitude to those who have prepared it. I did hope that it would have passed the body without a dissenting voice. I think the gratitude of the whole country is due to its authors.

Mr. DAVIS. The Senate will pardon me for saying thus publicly, in behalf of the committee, and more especially of myself, that we feel under the greatest obligation to all the gentlemen, both captains of boats and engineers, who have rendered their services here in obedience to instructions from their fellow-citizens, and who have rendered the greatest possible aid to us in the preparation of the bill.

The question was taken, and the bill was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading.

SALES OF RESERVED LANDS.

On the motion of Mr. FELCH, the Senate proceeded, as in Committee of the Whole, to consider the bill "to authorize the sale of reserved lands, and for other purposes."

It proposes to enact that in all cases where lands have been or may hereafter be reserved for military, naval, or other purposes, and when the Secretary of the proper Department shall certify that such lands are no longer required by the Government for public purposes, the President of the United States may cause the same to be sold under the laws which may be in force at the time for the disposal of public lands, or under such special regulations as he may prescribe: Provided, however, That no preemption right shall attach to any such lands. The second section provides that where improvements have been or may be made on any lands, by societies or individuals, under the authority of the Government, such societies or individuals shall be entitled to a preemption to the tracts of land so improved by them, at the then minimum price, not exceeding in extent the quantity of a quarter section: Provided, however, That when two or more such societies or individuals may have improved the same tract of land, and it cannot be divided so as to secure to them their respective improvements, they shall be permitted to enter the same, each in proportion to the extent and value of his improvement, and the patent shall issue for the whole tract, describing the interest of each therein.

Mr. FELCH. The object of this bill is to cause the sales of reserved lands, when the reservation shall be removed, to be made in the same manner as sales of other public lands of the United States are now made, under the direction of the Secretary of the Interior. At the present time lands which are reserved for military purposes are subject to sale only by the Secretary of War—those reserved for naval purposes only by the Secretary of the Navy. This occasions a very great inconvenience, and both Departments have joined in a letter to the Commissioner of Public Lands, recommending that wherever the reservation is removed the lands shall be administered under such officers as now have charge of the general public domain. That is the general object of the bill. There is a proviso in the first section that no preemption right shall attach to any of the said lands. I move to amend the proviso by adding to it the following:

In virtue of any settlements made prior to the time of the offering at public sale of the same under this act.

The object is to embrace these reservations within the same rules as the present public domain.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. FELCH. The second section of the bill is designed to provide a preemption right to some missionary societies—I think there are now five of them—established under the direction and authority of the United States Government, with their buildings upon the land. This is merely to give them a preemption right to one hundred and sixty acres of land in such cases. But lest the section, as it now stands, should be misconstrued, and be applied to other purposes and other interests, I wish to amend it so as to make it more definite. I therefore move to strike out the words "societies or individuals," where they first occur, and insert the words "religious or missionary societies, or their agents." To correspond with that, I move to insert, instead of the word "individuals," where the phrase "societies or individuals" next occurs, the words, "their agents in their behalf, and for their use;" and where the word "individuals" next occurs in the phrase, to strike it out and insert "their agents."

The amendments were agreed to, the bill was reported to the Senate as amended, the amendments were concurred in, and the bill was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading.

EMILY H. PLUMMER.

Mr. BROADHEAD. I would be pleased if the Senate would take up the bill for the relief of Emily H. Plummer, reported by the Committee on Pensions. I move to postpone the previous orders, and take it up.

The motion was agreed to. The bill was accordingly read a second time, and considered as in Committee of the Whole.

It proposes to require the Secretary of the Interior to place the name of Emily H. Plummer, widow of the late Captain Samuel M. Plummer, of the United States Army, upon the pension roll, and pay her for five years a pension amounting to half the pay per month to which her husband was entitled at the time of his death—the pension to commence from March 9th, 1852.

Mr. BROADHEAD. Since this bill was reported, the lady for whose benefit it is intended died, leaving two children—one four and the other five years old. I therefore propose to amend the bill by striking out "Emily H. Plummer, widow," and inserting "Joseph Morton Plummer and Mary Reynolds Plummer, minor children"—striking out "her" and inserting "them"—striking out "her husband" and inserting "their father."

The amendments were agreed to.

The bill was referred to the Senate as amended, the amendments were concurred in, and the bill was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading. And then, on motion, the Senate adjourned.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

Monday, July 12, 1852.

The House met at eleven o'clock, a. m. Prayer by the Rev. C. M. Butler.

The Journal of Saturday was read and approved.

The SPEAKER stated as the business before the House, the consideration of bill No. 144, to amend an act entitled "An act to reduce and modify the rates of postage in the United States, and for other purposes," and that the pending question was on the motion to recommit the bill.

IMPROVEMENT OF THE MISSISSIPPI RIVER.

Mr. St. MARTIN. I ask the unanimous consent of the House that a bill from the Senate, now upon the Speaker's table, in relation to the deepening of the passage of the Mississippi river, may be taken up.

Mr. OLDS. Will the time consumed on that bill come out of the morning hour?

The SPEAKER. Does the gentleman from Louisiana propose that it shall come out of the morning hour?

Mr. St. MARTIN. No. I ask that the bill may be considered before proceeding to the execution of the order in relation to the morning hour.

Mr. HOUSTON. If the time is to come out of the regular business part of the day, I must object. If it is to come out of the morning hour, I have no objection.

Mr. OLDS. If it is to come out of the morning hour, I must object.

Mr. JOHNSON, of Arkansas. I hope there will be no objection to accommodating a gentleman who has consumed so little of the time of the House in any way.

Mr. JOHNSON, of Georgia. Is the object of the gentleman from Louisiana to have the bill referred or to put it upon its passage?

Mr. St. MARTIN. I wish to have it acted on now.

Mr. JOHNSON. Then I object.

WASHINGTON CITY GUARDS.

Mr. GENTRY. I ask the unanimous consent of the House to present a resolution which will occupy but two minutes, and to which I am sure there can be no objection from any part of the House. I am informed by our pages, that some of them, and other youths of this city, have formed a juvenile military company. They have applied to the Secretary of War for arms, but he informs them that he has no legal authority to give them any. I ask the unanimous consent of the House to offer the following resolution, granting him that authority:

Resolved by the Senate and House of Representatives in Congress assembled, That the Secretary of War be, and he is hereby, authorized to loan to the Washington City Guards such small arms as he may consider suitable for a juvenile company.

Mr. STANLY. If the gentleman will put in their hands a spelling-book and a prayer-book, I have no objection, but I object to the arms.

Mr. GENTRY. I move to suspend the rules.

The SPEAKER. That is not in order during the morning hour.

Mr. HOUSTON. Then I call for the regular order of business.

NEWSPAPER POSTAGE RATES.

The SPEAKER. The pending question is on recommending the bill in regard to the postage on newspapers.

Mr. OLDS. I desire to repeat a notice which I gave to the House a day or two since, that the Post Office Committee is now preparing the post route bill. It is nearly finished, and I propose to report it very soon. I trust that members will visit the committee room and see that their routes are correctly inserted, as there is sometimes a difficulty in understanding names.

I now withdraw the motion to recommit the bill, and I wish to say to the gentleman from Maine, [Mr. WASHBURN,] that if he will change his amendment which he offered on Saturday last, so as to confine it to the circulation of newspapers within the States, I have no objection to it.

Mr. WASHBURN. I indicated on Saturday that I should offer an amendment of that kind, for I understand perfectly well, that if there is not an amendment of that character, it will operate injuriously on the revenues of the Department. I now withdraw the amendment which I proposed on Saturday, and offer the following, to come in the first section of the bill as amended, after the words "with one half of the foregoing rates"—

Provided, That all newspapers and periodicals not weighing over two ounces, when sent to actual subscribers within the States where such newspapers and periodicals are published, shall be entitled to the reduction provided for in this section.

Mr. CARTTER. From very brief reflection upon the subject, I am opposed to the distinction made upon State lines, and also to the distinction made in the weight of newspapers. The distinction made in the weight of the papers appears to me to be a distinction against the good quality of the material upon which the matter is printed, and against the good quality of the matter itself. Again, I do not understand the economy of patronizing the interior, if this relates to city papers, with poverty of literature, or poverty in the art through which it is conveyed. It appears to me, that if a distinction is to be made at all, that distinction ought to be a patronage of the best quality of papers. I understand that the large weeklies of the East cannot reach the constituencies of the West under the provisions of this bill, except by the imposition of a higher tax. I do not know whether I am right or wrong in this, but I suppose it to be the case. Sir, what is the reason assigned for the introduction of this distinction? It is that the patronage of this description of matter, by a uniform postage running from one State into another, is prejudicial to the local circulation of the country press at home. Well, sir, if this argument be true, you have the full force of it in its very worst aspect by providing for an inferior character of paper.

Now, sir, I had the honor of introducing the amendment by which the country sheet is now circulated free of postage, within the county in which it is published. That was thought, at that time, necessary, in order to keep the country press alive. But I am not to be told that you will do that by rejecting the papers of good quality, as it is proposed to reject it here. If you propose to transmit to the country intelligence from abroad, give us intelligence worthy of transmission, and give us those sheets that recommend, by their example, emulation in the country press. There is another thing in reference to this matter, which, it seems to me, is wrong. The great reason lying at the basis of the postal reformation of the last Congress was, the dissemination of cheap intelligence throughout the United States. I resisted that reformation at the time, because I believed it would produce in the Post Office Department, the very difficulties that experience has proved. But you have got that reformation entailed upon you for weal or for woe, and let us not make it worse by an attempt here to discriminate against the good papers.

I am opposed to the amendment of the gentleman from Maine. The great end in view, in this postal reformation, was uniformity and simplicity—uniformity in the charges upon distance—and this amendment proposes to reëact the very distinction that was sought to be removed by the reformation of the last Congress. I have not given a great deal of deliberation to this subject, but from what little examination I have given to it, I am opposed to any distinction that will bear heavily upon the well-recommended papers. If I understand this amendment, it takes a distinction between sheets weighing one ounce and sheets weighing two ounces, outside the borders of a State, without taking a distinction of the same kind within the borders of the State. Now there may be very good reasons for that, but I confess I cannot perceive them.

Mr. COBB. We have been engaged upon this bill for three days and have made no progress in it, and I think the House is ready to take a vote on it.

Mr. CABLE, of Ohio. I hope the gentleman will allow me to offer an amendment to the second section.

Mr. COBB. Very well.

The SPEAKER. Such an amendment would not now be in order.

Mr. CABLE, of Ohio. I ask the unanimous consent of the House to allow me to propose an amendment to be acted upon when we reach the second section of the bill.

There was no objection, and the amendment was presented, as follows:

Add at the end of the second section the words, "without reference to the location of the office of delivery."

Mr. COBB. My object is to call the previous question, if there are no further amendments to be offered.

Mr. BROOKS. If the previous question is to be called, I want to offer two or three amendments before we come to voting upon this subject, in order that they may be voted upon.

Mr. COBB. I withdraw my call, in favor of the gentleman from New York, [Mr. Brooks.]

Mr. BROOKS. I wish to propose amendments in the seventh and eleventh lines—in the seventh line, by striking out the word "newspaper," and in the eleventh line, after the words "two and a half ounces," insert "each newspaper of no greater weight than two and a half ounces." I am obliged to submit the amendments in that form, in order to get them voted upon in order.

The SPEAKER. The proposition to amend is not now in order.

Mr. BROOKS. Then I give notice of intention to offer the amendments, if the previous question is to be pressed.

Mr. DISNEY. Will the gentleman from Alabama [Mr. COBB] allow me a word?

Mr. COBB. I yield for the purpose of admitting all amendments.

Mr. BROOKS. I have the floor, I believe, for the purpose of submitting my amendments. Another amendment I propose to submit to that section is, to strike out the last paragraph, which reads as follows:

"The postage upon all printed mailable matter shall be prepaid, either at the office where it is mailed, or at the office of delivery, otherwise double the foregoing rates shall be charged thereon; all transient printed matter shall be deemed unpaid, unless paid at the office where it is mailed."

If these amendments prevail, or do not prevail, I purpose to submit a substitute for the entire section.

The SPEAKER. Notice only of these amendments can now be in order.

Mr. DISNEY. I desire to notify the House, in the same manner, that I want to offer an amendment to the bill. It is a provision requiring that in all cases of the publication of uncalled-for letters in the German language, it shall be the duty of the Postmaster General to cause such publication to be made in the German newspaper having the largest circulation in that vicinity, and in all respects to be governed by the law in relation to the publication of uncalled-for letters in the English language.

Mr. COBB. I now call for the previous question.

Mr. WASHBURN. Will the gentleman yield a moment to me?

Mr. COBB. To make a speech?

Mr. WASHBURN. No, sir, only a remark, and I will renew the call for the previous question.

Mr. COBB. I yield.

Mr. WASHBURN. I think the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. CARTTER] misapprehends the operation of the amendment which I proposed. The bill, as it originally stood, provides that all papers weighing not over two ounces shall be sent any distance short of three thousand miles at a postage of one cent. Then there was a provision that papers weighing not over an ounce should be sent for one half that sum. The consequence was to bring about the very evils which the gentleman complained of—that it is a discrimination against good papers, and in favor of the poorer papers published in the cities, because the papers weighing not over an ounce, published in New York, could be sent three thousand miles at a postage of half a cent, when a local paper (as most of our local papers weigh an ounce and a quarter) cannot go forty miles without paying the postage of one cent, or twice the amount that is paid upon the paper sent from New York to St. Louis. It was in order to discriminate in favor of good papers, and to afford protection to the country papers, and enable them to support themselves, and stand up against the most indifferent issues of the city press, that I proposed the amendment I have offered.

I renew the call for the previous question.

Mr. HENN. I hope the gentleman will withdraw the call for the previous question, that I may offer an amendment to the second section.

The SPEAKER. I must give notice to gentlemen offering amendments, that if the previous question is seconded and the main question ordered, it will cut off the propositions made by them, there being an amendment now pending.

Mr. OLDS. By unanimous consent of the House, cannot the amendments be admitted, that a vote may be taken upon them?

Mr. JONES, of Tennessee. I object to that.

Mr. BROOKS. I wish to make an inquiry. Did I understand the Chair to say that the previous question cuts off all the amendments submitted?

The SPEAKER. All of which notice only has been given, as a matter of course.

Mr. BROOKS. I hope the previous question will not be seconded.

Mr. JONES. It only cuts off those amendments which gentlemen gave notice they would offer.

The SPEAKER. It does not cut off pending amendments.

Mr. BROOKS. How many amendments are pending?

The SPEAKER. The pending amendment is the one offered by the gentleman from Maine, [Mr. WASHBURN.]

Mr. BROOKS. But does it cut off the other amendments of which notice has been given?

Mr. JONES. Certainly.

The SPEAKER. If the gentleman makes a proposition to amend, by way of a substitute, it is perhaps in order.

Mr. BROOKS. I offer the amendment I have sent to the table as a substitute for the second section, and I understand the Chair to decide that that amendment, by way of a substitute, will be in order to be voted upon.

The SPEAKER. It will be.

The question then being, "Shall the previous question receive a second?"

Mr. COBB demanded tellers; which were ordered; and Messrs. HENN and CHANDLER were appointed.

The House was then divided on the question, and the tellers reported—ayes 80, noes not counted.

So the previous question was seconded; and the main question was then ordered to be put.

The SPEAKER. The first question is upon the amendment proposed by the gentleman from Maine, [Mr. WASHBURN,] to insert after the word "rates," in the first section, what will be again reported by the Clerk.

The amendment was again read, as follows:

Provided, That all newspapers and periodicals, not weighing over two ounces, when sent to actual subscribers within the State where such papers and periodicals are published, shall be entitled to the reduction provided for in this section.

Mr. WASHBURN. I demand tellers upon the question.

Tellers were ordered; and Messrs. STANTON, of Tennessee, and FOWLER appointed.

The question was then taken, and the tellers reported—ayes 90, noes not counted.

So the amendment was agreed to.

The SPEAKER. The question is now upon the amendment offered by the gentleman from New York, [Mr. BROOKS,] by way of substitute for the second section. It will be read.

The proposed amendment was read, as follows:

Strike out the first section of the bill as amended, and insert the following in lieu thereof:

That from and after the 30th day of September, 1852, the postage upon all printed matter passing through the mail of the United States, instead of the rates now charged, shall be as follows, to wit: Each newspaper, pamphlet, periodical, magazine, book, bound or unbound, circular, catalogue, and every other description of printed matter, unconnected with any manuscript or writing, and of no greater weight than two and a half ounces, shall be charged one half cent postage, and one half cent for each additional ounce, or fraction of an ounce, for any distance under one thousand miles, and for any distance over one thousand miles double those rates. All newspapers published regularly, and sent from the office of publication to actual subscribers, not weighing over one ounce, shall be charged one half of the foregoing rates, when sent over one thousand miles.

Mr. WASHBURN. I would move an amendment to that substitute, if it be in order—the same as I offered to the original section.

The SPEAKER. No amendment is in order, as the previous question has been called for, and seconded.

Mr. FOWLER. I am persuaded the amendment is not understood. If it will be in order, I will ask that it be again read.

The amendment was again read, as above inserted.

Mr. BROOKS. It is simply a substitute to the first section, and leaves the others as they were.

The question was then taken on the substitute submitted by Mr. Brooks, and it was not agreed to, the tellers having reported—ayes 38, noes not counted.

Mr. SKELTON. I move a reconsideration of the vote by which the substitute of the gentleman from New York has been rejected, and upon that motion will submit a few remarks.

The SPEAKER. Debate is out of order, the previous question still operating.

Mr. SKELTON. I then withdraw the motion.

Mr. SACKETT. Is a substitute to the first section now in order?

The SPEAKER. No amendment is now in order except those pending, the main question having been ordered to be put.

The second section of the bill was then read, as follows:

"Sec. 2. And be it further enacted, That books, bound or unbound, not weighing over four pounds, shall be deemed mailable matter, and all printed matter chargeable by weight shall be weighed when dry. The publishers of newspapers and periodicals may send to each other from their respective offices of publication, free of postage, one copy of each publication; and may also send to each actual subscriber, inclosed in their publications, bills and receipts for the same, free of postage. The publishers of weekly newspapers may send to each actual subscriber within the county where their papers are printed and published, one copy thereof free of postage."

Mr. HENN moved to amend the above section, by adding the following, viz:

The presidents of universities, colleges, academies, and of all scientific institutions, and also the Smithsonian Institution, may send by mail, free of postage, the printed copies of any regular paper, pamphlet, or book published under the authority of any such institution; and also the proof sheets of such copies while the same are being published: Provided, Such printed copies shall be distributed gratis.

The question was then taken on the amendment, and it was rejected.

The SPEAKER stated the question to be next on the following amendment, by way of addition to the second section:

"Without reference to the location of the post office of delivery."

Mr. OLDS. That amendment is already provided for in the bill.

The question was then taken on the amendment, and it was rejected.

The question was then taken on the amendment of the Committee on the Post Office and Post Roads, to strike out the following section, and it was agreed to:

"Sec. 3. And be it further enacted, That all laws or parts of laws incompatible with the provisions of this act are hereby repealed."

Mr. HENN. Was not the other amendments I sent up to the Chair in order previous to the ordering of the main question to be put?

The SPEAKER. Notice was only given of intention to offer the amendment. Objection was made to have it considered, and such is the fate of several other amendments proposed to be offered by gentlemen this morning.

The SPEAKER stated the question next to be upon the following amendment of the Committee on the Post Office and Post Roads, which was taken and agreed to, viz:

10th amendment: Add the following additional sections:

Sec. 3. And be it further enacted, That no newspaper, periodical, magazine, or other printed paper, or matter, shall be entitled to be sent at the rates of postage in this act specified, unless the following conditions be observed:

First. It shall be sent without any cover or wrapper, or in a cover or wrapper open at the ends or sides, so that the character of the matter contained therein may be determined without removing such wrapper.

Second. There shall be no word or communication printed on the same after its publication, or upon the cover or wrapper thereof, nor any writing or marks upon it, nor upon the cover or wrapper thereof, except the name and address of the person to whom it is to be sent.

Third. There shall be no paper or other thing inclosed in or with such printed matter; and if these conditions are not complied with, such printed matter shall be subject to letter postage; and all matter sent by mail from one part of the United States to another, the postage of which is not fixed by the provisions of this act, shall, unless the same be entitled to be sent free of postage, be charged with letter postage.

Sec. 4. And be it further enacted, That if the publisher of any periodical, after being three months previously notified that his publication is not taken out of the office to which it is sent for delivery, continue to forward such publication in the mail, the postmaster to whose office such publication is sent may dispose of the same for the postage, unless the publishers shall pay it; and whenever any printed matter of any description, received during one quarter of the fiscal year, shall have remained in the office without being called for during the whole of any succeeding quarter, the postmaster at such office shall sell the same and credit the proceeds of such sale in his quarterly accounts, under such regulations and after such notice as the Post Office Department shall prescribe.

Sec. 5. And be it further enacted, That so much of the second section of the act entitled "An act to modify and reduce the rates of postage in the United States, and for other purposes," approved March 3d, 1851, as relates to the postage or free circulation or transmission of newspapers, periodicals, and other printed matter, and all other provisions of law inconsistent with the provisions of this act are hereby repealed.

The question was stated to be next on the following amendment, submitted by Mr. DISNEY, to be added at the end of the bill:

And be it further enacted, in all cases of publication of the uncalled-for German letters, it shall be the duty of the Postmaster General to cause such publication to be made in the German newspaper having the largest circulation in the vicinity, such publication to be governed in every respect by the provisions of the law in relation to the publication of uncalled-for letters in the English language.

Mr. BELL. I wish to make an inquiry of the chairman of the committee which reported this bill.

THE CONGRESSIONAL GLOBE.

PUBLISHED AT WASHINGTON, BY JOHN C. RIVES.—TERMS $3 FOR THIS SESSION.

32d Congress, 1st Session.

WEDNESDAY, JULY 14, 1852.

NEW SERIES.....No. 110.

The SPEAKER. Only by the consent of the House can the inquiry be made.

There was no objection.

Mr. BELL. I wish to inquire whether the construction of that section would not require all German letters to be published in some German newspaper?

Mr. OLDS. This is not an amendment reported by the committee at all, but by my colleague, [Mr. DISNEY.]

Mr. DISNEY. The amendment only affirms what I believe now to be the existing law. It is for the publication of uncalled for German letters in the German paper having the largest circulation near the post office in which the letters are.

Mr. BELL. Suppose there is no German newspaper printed in the county where there are German letters in the post office?

Mr. DISNEY. By existing law, the Postmaster General has the discretion to determine whether the publication of them shall or shall not be. The amendment provides that in the publication of uncalled for German letters, he shall be governed by the provisions of the general law in relation to the publication of uncalled for letters in the English language. I repeat, I have no doubt such a provision is in the existing law as would authorize what I now hope by my amendment to accomplish, but the Postmaster General in his wisdom thinks differently.

Mr. PHELPS. Will it be in order to call for the reading of the existing law upon the subject. [Cries of "Order!" "Order!"]

The question was put on the amendment, and upon a division there were—ayes 40—

Mr. DISNEY demanded the yeas and nays; which were ordered.

Mr. CLINGMAN. Believing this bill will make the existing law worse, I move to lay it upon the table, and I trust my motion may be agreed to.

Mr. OLDS demanded the yeas and nays; which were ordered.

The bill, as amended, reads as follows:

Be it enacted, &c., That from and after the thirtieth day of June, eighteen hundred and fifty-two, the postage upon all printed matter passing through the mail of the United States, instead of the rates now charged, shall be as follows, to wit: Each newspaper, pamphlet, periodical, magazine, book, bound or unbound, circular, catalogue, and every other description of printed matter unconnected with any manuscript or writing, and of no greater weight than two ounces, shall be charged with one cent postage, and one cent for each additional ounce, or fraction of an ounce, for any distance under three thousand miles; and for any distance over three thousand miles, double those rates: Provided, That all newspapers and periodicals not weighing over two ounces when sent to actual subscribers within the State where such papers and periodicals are published, shall be entitled to the reduction provided in this section. All newspapers and periodicals not weighing over one ounce, published regularly as often as once in three months, and sent from the office of publication to actual subscribers, shall be chargeable with only one half the foregoing rates. The postage upon all printed matter shall be prepaid at the office where it is mailed, or paid quarterly in advance at the office of delivery; otherwise double the foregoing rates shall be charged thereon.

Sec. 2. And be it further enacted, That books, bound or unbound, not weighing over four pounds, shall be deemed mailable matter, and all printed matter chargeable by weight shall be weighed when dry. The publishers of newspapers and periodicals may send to each other, from their respective offices of publication, free of postage, one copy of each publication; and may also send to each actual subscriber, inclosed in their publications, bills and receipts for the same, free of postage. The publishers of weekly newspapers may send to each actual subscriber within the county where the papers are printed and published, one copy thereof free of postage.

Sec. 3. And be it further enacted, That no newspaper, periodical, magazine, or other printed paper, or matter, shall be entitled to be sent at the rates of postage in this act specified, unless the following conditions be observed:

First, It shall be sent without any cover or wrapper, or in a cover or wrapper open at the ends or sides, so that the character of the matter contained therein may be determined without removing such wrapper.

Second, There shall be no word or communication printed on the same after its publication, or upon the cover or wrapper thereof, nor any writing or marks upon it, nor upon the cover or wrapper thereof, except the name and address of the person to whom it is to be sent.

Third, There shall be no paper or other thing inclosed in or with such printed paper; and if these conditions are not complied with, such printed matter shall be subject to letter postage; and all matter sent by mail from one part of the United States to another, the postage of which is not fixed by the provisions of this act, shall, unless the same be entitled to be sent free of postage, be charged with letter postage.

Sec. 4. And be it further enacted, That if the publisher of any periodical, after being three months previously notified that his publication is not taken out of the office to which it is sent for delivery, continue to forward such publication in the mail, the postmaster to whose office such publication is sent may dispose of the same for the postage, unless the publisher shall pay it; and whenever any printed matter of any description, received during one quarter of the fiscal year, shall have remained in the office without being called for during the whole of any succeeding quarter, the postmaster at such office shall sell the same and credit the proceeds of such sale in his quarterly accounts, under such regulations and after such notice as the Post Office Department shall prescribe.

Sec. 5. And be it further enacted, That so much of the second section of the act entitled "An act to modify and regulate the rates of postage in the United States and for other purposes," approved March 3d, 1851, as relates to the postage or free circulation, or transmission of newspapers, periodicals, and other printed matter, and all other provisions of law inconsistent with the provisions of this act are hereby repealed.

The question was then taken on the motion to lay upon the table, and it was disagreed to—yeas 23, nays 148; as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Abercrombie, Charles Allen, Ashe, Thomas H. Bayly, Bowne, John H. Boyd, Briggs, Brooks, George H. Brown, Burrows, Chandler, Clingman, Haws, James Johnson, George W. Jones, Henry D. Moore, John Moore, Morehead, Schermerhorn, Alexander R. Stephens, Sutherland, Wallace, and Williams—23.

NAYS—Messrs. Allison, William Appleton, Averett, David J. Bailey, Barrere, Beale, Bell, Bingham, Bissell, Bockock, Brenton, Albert G. Brown, Duell, Burt, Busby, Joseph Cable, Caldwell, Lewis D. Mr. HOUSTON. Has not the morning hour expired?

The SPEAKER. It has.

Mr. HOUSTON. I then move the rules be suspended, and the House resolve itself into the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union.

Mr. GENTRY. I will ask the gentleman from Alabama to withdraw his motion for a moment, that I may introduce the resolution to which I have alluded this morning. Its consideration will not occupy five minutes.

Mr. HOUSTON. I cannot.

Mr. STANTON, of Tennessee. If the gentleman will not withdraw his motion for my colleague's resolution, probably he will for the one I hold in my hand.

Mr. HOUSTON. If I withdraw for one, I shall have to for the introduction of resolutions by gentlemen all around me. Members in all parts of the Hall are pressing me to go on with the public business. [Cries of "Hold on to your motion!" "Hold on to your motion!"] The deficiency bill should be now passed into law, if it is to be at all.

PRINTING.

Mr. GORMAN. I think it is in order for the Committee on Printing to report at any time. I now ask to make a report from that Committee, and to move that it be made the special order for Thursday next, and ordered to be printed.

Mr. HOUSTON. I suppose the motion I have submitted, being also a privileged motion, should be first put.

Mr. GORMAN. Gentlemen can have no objection to my making a report, and moving it be a special order for some future day.

Mr. HOUSTON. I object to any special order being made, unless the appropriation bills can also be made special orders.

Mr. GORMAN. I will make this remark with the leave of the Chair. It seems to me if the rule with regard to reports from the Committee on Printing means anything, it means I can make a report at any time. The privileged motion of the gentleman, it occurs to me, only takes precedence in contradistinction to ordinary motions. His motion will be pending, and come up immediately after my report has been submitted.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Indiana will recollect that the language employed is the same in both cases. It is always in order to go into Committee; and it is always in order for the Committee on Printing to report. The proposition was first made to suspend the rules, which is a privileged motion, and in the opinion of the Chair, must be first put. The question will be first taken on the motion to go into Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union.

Mr. STANLY. Is it in order to move a suspension of the rules for any other purpose than to go into Committee of the Whole?

The SPEAKER. It is not.

Mr. STANLY. I would suggest to the chairman of the Committee on Ways and Means to move to suspend the rule allowing five minutes debate on the balance of the deficiency bill. Unless he does the discussion will continue two weeks longer.

Mr. HOUSTON. It is very evident from the contest on both sides, that it will be useless to make the effort. It is tolerably close between the parties. Several on this side of the House state they will labor to get a vote to-day, which I hope we may.

[Cries of "That's right!" "That's right!"]

The question was then taken on the motion of the gentleman from Alabama, [Mr. HOUSTON.] and it was agreed to.

DEFICIENCY BILL—COLLINS LINE.

The House accordingly resolved itself into the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union, (Mr. STUART in the chair.)

The CHAIRMAN. The question before the committee is the Senate amendment to House bill No. 207. The pending question is on concurring with the first subdivision of the Senate amendment in reference to the appropriation for the Collins line, as follows:

"For additional compensation for increasing the transportation of the United States mail between New York and Liverpool, in the Collins line of steamers, to twenty-six trips per annum, at such times as shall be directed by the Postmaster General, and in conformity to his last annual report to Congress, and his letter of the 15th of November last to the Secretary of the Navy, commencing said increased service on the first of January, 1852, at the rate of $33,000 per trip, in lieu of the present allowance, the sum of $235,500."

Mr. SEYMOUR, of New York. I desire an opportunity may be afforded to the honorable gentleman from Virginia [Mr. MEADE.] to correct a statistical statement he made the other day with reference to this subject.

Mr. HOUSTON. I call the gentleman to order. I intend to aid in enforcing the rules of the House. Mr. MEADE. I ask, before any vote be taken, unanimous consent of the House to make a personal explanation which will take about three minutes.

[Cries of "Go on!" "Go on!"]

Mr. MEADE. I stated in my speech on Saturday, that the receipts of the Collins line for the last two years were about $2,900,000, and I quoted the report of the committee of the Senate, made by Mr. Rusk, which had been laid upon our tables by the friends of that line, and of course I thought it was correct, or they would not have submitted it to us. It is true I had in my possession means by which the error I fell into might have been detected, but not suspecting, I did not advert to the documents which I had. Since my remarks on Saturday were made, Mr. Rusk, the chairman of that committee, has had his attention called to the fact, and has addressed me a letter, in which he refers me to the error which the report contains. The error is this, that he has included in the receipts of that company, in the last two years, mail pay, $770,000 twice, making it thus upwards of $1,500,000 paid to that company instead of the $770,000. I based my remarks upon the amount of receipts as stated by the report of the Senate committee. Hence I am not responsible for the error into which I fell, and the deduction which I drew from the report, admitting that it was true, was perfectly legitimate. I ask that the letter addressed to me by Mr. Rusk may be read by the Clerk.

Mr. STEPHENS, of Georgia. I object to the reading of the letter.

Mr. MEADE. I will read the letter myself then:

WASHINGTON, July 11, 1852.

DEAR SIR: I have understood that in a speech made by you yesterday, in the House of Representatives, to prove that the Collins line were making, instead of losing money, you quoted the following passage from a report recently made by me to the Senate:

"These ships cost, when ready for sea, in cash, $2,944,142 76, or an average of $736,035 67 each.

"They have made forty-one voyages between New York and Liverpool, at an average expense of $65,212 64 per voyage, making, in all, the sum of $2,673,841 24, which, when added to the cost of the ships, say $2,944,142 76, makes the entire amount of money expended, $5,617,984.

"On the other hand, the average receipts of the company, per voyage, have been, as stated, $48,286 85, or, in all, $1,979,760 85; amount advanced, $308,000, and amount paid for two years mail service, $770,000, making the total receipts from all sources, $2,957,760 85."

On looking over this, I see that a mistake has been made by inserting the amount paid by the Government twice. The amount received by them from the Government was included in the $48,286 85 average receipts per voyage, and should not have been again added; so that the receipts from all sources were $1,979,760 85, as first stated, in place of $2,957,760 85, as arrived at by the error of adding the amount paid by the Government to the line a second time, as you will perceive more clearly by reference to the statement of Mr. Youle, which is as follows:

NEW YORK AND LIVERPOOL U. S. M. S. S. Co.,
No. 55 WALL STREET, NEW YORK, December 15, 1851.

Mr. William L. Youle, Secretary of the New York and Liverpool United States Mail Steamship Company, swears that he is not interested in said company, and that the foregoing statement is true.

You will do me a favor, which will be but an act of justice to the parties, if you will present this explanation to the House. Very truly yours, THO. J. RUSK.
Hon R. K. MEADE.

[Here the hammer fell.]

Mr. HOUSTON. I wish to ask the gentleman a question while he is making a personal explanation.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman's five minutes have expired, and he has no right to make further explanation.

Mr. HOUSTON. The gentleman in the same speech, has set down—

[Cries of "Order!" "Order!"]

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman's time have expired, and the gentleman from Alabama is out of order.

Mr. OLDS. I propose to strike out the Senate amendment in regard to the Collins line, and insert what I send to the Chair.

The amendment was then read by the Clerk, as follows:

"That the Postmaster General be authorized and required, with the assent of E. K. Collins & Co., to advertise for proposals to transport the United States mail between the city of New York, North America, and Liverpool, England, for the period of four years, from and after the 1st of January next, in semi-monthly trips, in American first class ocean steamers, the schedule time to be equal to that now made by the Collins line of steamers, and at all times to be equal to the time made by the British Cunard line; and that the contract be awarded to the lowest responsible bidder; said bidder to be an American citizen."

It has been urged here, that Mr. Collins has a bad contract for the transportation of the mail.

Mr. EVANS. I rise to a point of order. That is the same amendment which was offered on yesterday.

Mr. OLDS. That is not the same amendment. It has been urged that Mr. Collins has a bad contract for carrying the mail. This may or may not be so. I am friendly to E. K. Collins, and am disposed to do him justice. It is true, that if one of my constituents, or yours, Mr. Chairman, had made a bad contract for the transportation of the mail, the Government would hold him to the bond. One of my constituents contracted to carry the mail from Zanesville, Ohio, to Maysville, Kentucky, and, like Mr. Collins, he made a bad bargain, and failed. What was the consequence? The Post Office Department commenced a suit against his sureties. I have been negotiating for a compromise, and have just completed an arrangement, by which the sureties of my constituent pay $2,500 to be released from the bond. Now, sir, I am willing to release Mr. Collins from his bond, without damages or prejudice. I do not wish to hold him to a bad bargain, and I am willing that he should have the opportunity, not only of relinquishing and giving up this bargain, but also of being a bidder again. Surely, this is giving over all competition. My amendment requires first class steamers for the transportation of this mail. Collins has such steamers already for the service. This gives him a most decided preference over any other person. If he has a bad bargain, I do for him what the Government would not do for my constituent. I am willing to relieve him from a bad contract, and then suffer him to come in and compete for the contract again, the same as any other American citizen.

I meet the objections of those who say that we are upon the British side, because I exclude British competition. I require the steamers to be American citizens. What can they ask more than this? Is it not doing full justice to Collins & Co.? I warn E. K. Collins & Co. not to relinquish this contract without a second thought. One of the largest steamboat owners and builders in the United States—a gentleman of great experience, and who has a memorial before the Post Office Committee for the transportation of the mail upon ocean steamers between New York and San Francisco, said to me that he would give Collins & Co. $200,000 for their contract to transport this mail for the balance of their time, if he could get their contract without taking their steamers. The contract, then, is a good one, and my friend from Kentucky [Mr. Mason] was right in supposing that this enormous appropriation was for rosewood and mirrors, and not for the mail service of the country.

The whole truth is, these steamers are extravagantly and gorgeously furnished; they are, in fact, floating palaces, too extravagant to be profitable to the owners, unless, by this appropriation, the people can be compelled to foot the bill.

Mr. HART. I would like to inquire if the gentleman has made a calculation how much the Cunard steamers cost?

Mr. OLDS. I have nothing to do with the Cunarders. I am as much of an American citizen as the gentleman from New York, [Mr. Hart], and I have gone as far as he dare go, for I have excluded British competition, and required the bidder to be an American citizen. What ought Collins to ask more than this? Have I not done him full justice? If he has a hard contract and a hard bargain, let him throw it up. The Government would not let my constituent do it, but compelled his sureties to pay the penalty of the bond. Notwithstanding this, I would let Mr. Collins throw up his contract, and bid again. All he has to do is to enter into competition with other American citizens, and not British. I warn him, however, that there are American citizens enough ready to take this contract. He need not fear British competition. But let him beware of the enterprising Yankees, who will beat the British in this, as they have done in everything else. I repeat, sir, give the Yankees half a chance, and they will beat the British, and give them four in the game.

Mr. EVANS addressed the committee during five minutes, in opposition to the amendment.

The question being on the amendment of Mr. OLDS—

Mr. NABERS called for tellers; which were ordered, and Messrs. FULLER, of Maine, and STANTON, of Tennessee, were appointed.

The question being taken, the tellers reported—ayes 66, noes 75.

So the amendment to the amendment was rejected.

The question recurred upon agreeing to the first branch of the clause appropriating to the Collins line.

Mr. HOUSTON demanded tellers; which were ordered, and Messrs. STANTON, of Tennessee, and FULLER were appointed.

The question was then put, and it was decided in the affirmative—ayes 84, noes 73.

So the amendment was agreed to.

The second clause of the twenty-fourth amendment of the Senate was then adopted, as follows:

"Provided, That it shall be in the power of Congress, at any time after the 31st day of December, 1854, to terminate the arrangement for the additional allowance herein provided for, upon giving six months' notice."

The second clause of the twenty-fifth amendment of the Senate was read, as follows:

"For defraying the expenses of the supreme, circuit, and district courts of the United States, including the District of Columbia; also for jurors and witnesses, in aid of the funds arising from fines, penalties, and forfeitures incurred in the fiscal year ending June 30, 1852, and previous years, and likewise for defraying the expenses of suits in which the United States are concerned, and of prosecutions for offenses committed against the United States, and for the apprehension and safe keeping of prisoners, in addition to former appropriations, $90,000: Provided, That no officer of the United States, who is in attendance upon any court of the United States, in the discharge of the duties of said office, shall receive any pay or compensation for his attendance as a witness on behalf of the Government, at the same time he receives compensation as such officer."

Mr. GIDDINGS. I move to strike out that clause. I do so for no other purpose than to call upon the chairman of the Committee on Ways and Means for information as to what amount of the sum therein contemplated to be granted, was made for the prosecution of those persons in Philadelphia, and in Boston, who were accused of violating the fugitive slave law. I wish him also to state, if he is possessed of the information, the amount of this appropriation paid for capturing fugitive slaves. I make the inquiry, in order to place this matter before the country, and to give this information to the people. I wish it to be distinctly understood, that my object is to call upon the committee for this definite information; and I will say that it is because we have not been permitted to offer resolutions here, calling for the information that I am now constrained to ask of the chairman of the Committee on Ways and Means. During the entire session, by the evasion of the old and formal rules of the House, we have had no opportunity to bring resolutions before the House to call for this information. We have been, unable to do it, and we have no other means of bringing it before the country, but by calling upon the chairman of this committee to give us all the information which he may possess.

Mr. HOUSTON. The gentleman's question is specific, and I have no information upon that precise question. I can say this, however, that in the prosecutions for violation of the neutrality laws in Louisiana and other points, and also for the expenses of recapturing fugitive slaves, there are some $30,000 estimated as having been absorbed of the appropriations that were made under this head of expenditure.

Mr. GIDDINGS. Will the gentleman state the amount paid for the recapture of fugitive slaves, aside from the other?

Mr. HOUSTON. I cannot do it, because I have not the information with me. It was not furnished to the committee.

Mr. GIDDINGS. Will the gentleman explain to us and the country, why this information was suppressed?

Mr. HOUSTON. I do not know whether the information has been intentionally suppressed or not. If I had it I would disclose it at once. I regard it as wholly unimportant. If it amounted to $100,000 I would not hesitate to say so. I will, however, read what was furnished to the Committee on Ways and Means, by Mr. Whittlesey, the Comptroller of the Treasury, through the Secretary of the Treasury, upon the subject, and then the gentleman will possess all the information I do:

SIR: In pursuance of your reference to me of House bill No. 146, reported by Mr. McLANAHAN from the Committee on the Judiciary, January 29, 1852, to regulate the fees and costs to be allowed officers of the Federal courts, with a note indorsed thereon by Mr. HOUSTON, chairman of the Committee on Ways and Means, requesting you to examine the bill, and make estimates based upon it, stating as nearly as may be how much should be appropriated, in case that bill should become a law, I have to report, that I have examined the subject, and submit the result of my examination and opinion, as follows:

The amount drawn for expenses of courts, during the year ending June 30, 1851, over and above repayments, was over.....$616,000
 Drawn from July 1st, 1851, to this date, over.....543,000
 Balance now to the credit of that fund, about.....6,000
 And to the credit of fines, forfeitures, and penalties, about.....13,000

During the present fiscal year the expenses have been very much increased, probably $30,000 or $40,000, by prosecutions growing out of the fugitive slave law in Massachusetts, New York, and Pennsylvania, and prosecutions in New York and Louisiana, for violations of neutrality laws; many of the bills for these extraordinary expenses have not yet come in. There will probably be needed from this time until the 30th June, including those extraordinary expenses, about.....110,000

And if so, there will be a deficit of about.....90,000
 This large deficit will occur notwithstanding the amounts have been closely examined in this office, and my action as an accounting officer has been complained of by some of the marshals, clerks, and district attorneys, as extremely rigid.

Mr. GIDDINGS. I withdraw the motion, Mr. Chairman.

The question recurred upon agreeing to the Senate amendment, and being put it was agreed to.

The third clause of the 25th amendment coming up next in order, was read by the Clerk as follows:

"To enable the Secretary of the Interior to pay to the clerks employed in the census office on extra duty, at the rate of $100 for full service, according to the office roll, the sum of $10,500."

Mr. HOUSTON. I feel it due that I should state, in connection with that amendment, the principle that is involved, so that the committee will understand what it determines if they should agree to the amendment. The Committee on Ways and Means rejected it.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman can proceed with the consent of the committee.

Mr. HOUSTON. I do not want to speak out of order. I move a non-concurrence in that amendment as recommended by the Committee on Ways and Means.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman may move to strike out the clause.

Mr. HOUSTON. Then: I move to strike it out. The item just read by the Clerk is intended to compensate a number of census clerks, as they are called, who, as it is alleged, have worked beyond the office hours, as they seem to understand them. I understand that a practice prevails in the Department, that the clerks enter upon their duties at a given hour in the morning, and that they cease from their labors at a certain hour in the evening. The claim here set up is, that these clerks have worked for some length of time after the evening hour arrived, when they should have ordinarily ceased from their labors. If we agree to this amendment we shall, I think, establish the precedent of paying all the clerks who labor after office hours.

Mr. STEVENS, of Pennsylvania. I am opposed to this amendment. I understand, sir, upon inquiry, that at the commencement, or just before the commencement of Congress, it became necessary either to appoint new clerks or to impose additional duties upon the old clerks, in order that the Department might be prepared for the session of Congress; and I am informed by the Superintendent of the Census Board that he preferred to impose additional duties upon the old clerks under a promise of compensation, and that they worked, in addition to the usual time for which they were employed, from six o'clock until ten in the evening, and often until eleven o'clock. They did the work which they were employed to do as clerks, and have enabled the Board to discharge last week some twenty clerks permanently. Now, this matter was examined by the Committee on Claims, and if I am rightly informed, that committee have agreed to report the full amount. They have not, however, had an opportunity of reporting, but had ordered a bill to be prepared for the full amount claimed. I hope, under these circumstances, that the justice of paying men for performing work which they have not been paid for before will be seen by the House. They have saved a great deal to the Government by it, and have done work which, according to the terms of their engagement, they were not bound to do. There was not only an implied but an express engagement to pay them extra compensation, and I hope that economy as well as justice will dictate to this House the propriety of doing it, and that this amendment will not prevail.

Mr. EDGERTON moved to amend the Senate amendment by increasing the appropriation one dollar.

Mr. E. said: My object in offering that amendment is to make a brief statement in relation to this claim. These temporary clerks employed in the Census Office—and mind, sir, they were temporary clerks, not permanent clerks of the Department—made an application to the Committee on Claims for extra compensation for services rendered after office hours. There is no question as regards the fact that the service has been performed between the hours of six in the evening, after office hours, until ten or twelve o'clock at night. A regular table was kept of the time. The Committee on Claims, on the application of these clerks, with the certificate of Mr. Kennedy, the Superintendent of the Census, that the labor had been performed by them, that they were temporary clerks, and that it was extra service, instructed me, as a member of that committee, to report a bill for the relief of these Census clerks. Pending this action of the Committee on Claims, the Senate incorporated into this deficiency bill this appropriation for their payment. If the Senate amendment be agreed to, there consequently will be no necessity for a report from the Committee on Claims. The easiest way to accomplish the purpose is for this House to agree to the amendment of the Senate, because otherwise the Committee on Claims will feel it to be an act of justice and duty to these men, who were temporary clerks only—not permanent salaried officers of the Government—employed for this special service, to report a bill for their relief. I hope, under the circumstances, that the House will agree to the Senate amendment.

Mr. HOUSTON. I wish to state a fact, in addition to the statement made by the gentleman from Ohio. These clerks are temporary, just so far as the Census Bureau is temporary. It applies to every clerk in the Census Office who has labored. It does not specify who labored. I understand the law to be, that the clerks in the various Departments are required to work eight hours a day. The practice, however, is, that they go to their office at nine and come out at three o'clock, falling at least two hours short of the time that the law requires them to work. Then, again, I know the fact, and so does every member of this House who has had much connection with the various offices in the Departments of the Government, that all the officers, at times, when there is a press of business upon them, work after the usual hours of closing the office in the evening. Now, sir, during all the time that is occupied in opening the mail contracts, the clerks in the Post Office Department work not only after three o'clock, but many of them work until bed-time.

Mr. STEVENS, of Pennsylvania. Will the gentleman allow me to ask him one question?

Mr. HOUSTON. I will.

Mr. STEVENS. Do you not know, that the clerks in the Census Office get considerably less pay than others, being confined to $1,000 per annum, while the clerks in the other Departments get from $1,100, $1,200, and $1,400?

Mr. HOUSTON. No, sir. So far from that being correct, I understand it to be incorrect. A large number of the clerks in the Third Auditor's Office and in the Pension Office get less than $1,000. Many get as low as $600 or $700. There are several $800 clerks there, and the heads of the bureaus and departments will tell you, the Postmaster General will tell you, that his clerks come to their offices very frequently and work after office hours.

Mr. CULLOM. I wish to ask the gentleman a question in relation to this matter. I desire to know whether the Secretary of the Interior did not stipulate with the clerks that they were to receive additional compensation, and whether he has not recommended it?

Mr. HOUSTON. There is no such stipulation shown in the papers. I take it for granted, the Secretary of the Interior being a sensible man, that no such contract was made, because, as a matter of course, he could make no such contract.

Mr. CULLOM. I desire to inquire whether he did not recommend that this increased compensation should be given by Congress?

Mr. HOUSTON. Here is all the evidence. I will read it to the gentleman. Here is a letter from Mr. Kennedy, the Superintendent of the Census Bureau:

CENSUS OFFICE, 5th July, 1852.

SIR: It appears that there is a disposition manifested by members of Congress to make some provision for each of the clerks in the Census Office as have performed extra duty.

To enable them, however, to carry into effect their good intentions, it is said that it is necessary for you to make an estimate for the amount to enable the matter to take such a direction as will give any reasonable hope of its passage through the present Congress.

If it be your pleasure to do this, I would suggest that the sum of $10,500 would be sufficient to pay for all the extra duty performed at the rate of $100 to all who rendered full service according to the office roll, and proportionately to those whose services were more limited.

I have the honor to be, sir, very respectfully, your obedient servant,

J. G. KENNEDY.

Hon. A. H. H. STUART, Secretary of the Interior.

And here is a letter from Mr. STUART:

DEPARTMENT OF THE INTERIOR,
 WASHINGTON, May 5, 1852.

SIR: I have the honor to enclose herewith a copy of a letter from the Superintendent of the Census, on the subject of the payment to the clerks of his office, of the amount which he thinks justly due to them, for service rendered out of office hours, and beg leave to commend his suggestions to your favorable consideration.

I am, sir, very respectfully, your obedient servant,
 ALEX. H. H. STUART, Secretary.

Hon. R. M. T. HUNTER,
 Chairman Committee on Finance, Senate, U. S.

Mr. RICHARDSON. I wish to ask a single question. If I remember this matter correctly, this extra work was not done under order. The clerks were not compelled to do it, but it was done under a contract or an agreement between the head of the Census Bureau and his clerks. Some of them worked twelve, some eighteen, some twenty-four, and some thirty days. Now, why was it that some worked thirty days, and some eight or ten, if it were not done by contract?

Mr. HOUSTON. I have no idea that a contract was made.

The question was then taken upon Mr. EDGERTON's motion, and it was not agreed to.

The question recurred upon Mr. HOUSTON's motion to strike out the clause, and, being put, it was not agreed to.

The question was then taken upon agreeing to the amendment of the Senate, and it was decided in the affirmative.

So the amendment was agreed to.

The fourth clause of the twenty-fifth amendment was read and agreed to as follows:

"For determining, running and marking the northern boundary of the State of Iowa, on the parallel of forty-three degrees thirty minutes north latitude, in addition to the appropriation heretofore made for the same object, $15,000."

The fifth clause of the twenty-fifth amendment of the Senate was read as follows:

"For the reconstruction or repairs of the steamer Bibb, used in the survey of the Nantucket Shoals, $15,000."

Mr. STANTON, of Ohio. I move to strike out that clause. It will be seen by reading the clause now under consideration, and the three succeeding clauses, that they provide for an appropriation for improvements upon the Atlantic coast. There is no pretense of their being deficiencies. They are appropriations, to be expended in the present fiscal year. The proposition now is, that you shall here put in for the benefit of these localities these appropriations which will be needed in the coming fiscal year; and by this hocus pocus it is attempted to push these things through, and when we come to the improvements for the benefit of internal commerce we shall not be able to get them through. I move, therefore, to strike out the clause and let these propositions take their place in the general appropriation bill for the coming fiscal year.

Mr. DUNCAN. I wish to say one word upon that amendment. I understand, sir, it is very desirable, for the purpose of the coast survey, that this appropriation should be made for the reconstruction or repair of that steamer. At present it is unfit for use, and it is therefore necessary that they should have a suitable vessel in order to prosecute that survey. I will only state these facts in the hope that the committee will not concur in the amendment.

The question was then taken upon Mr. STANTON's amendment to the amendment, and it was not agreed to.

The question recurred on concurring in the amendment of the Senate, and being put, it was decided in the affirmative.

So the amendment of the Senate was concurred in.

The sixth clause of the twenty-fifth amendment, coming up next in order, was read by the Clerk, as follows:

"For establishing a depôt of coal, for naval purposes, at Key West, in the State of Florida, $20,000."

Mr. GORMAN. I move to strike out that clause; and I do so not because I am opposed to an appropriation for this purpose, but because I am opposed to its being put in at this place. It is well known that we have a river and harbor bill pending, and this item is one that would be legitimate in a bill of that kind, and it will be more or less included in a bill of that character. What is the next item in these amendments? It is "for the purchase of a site on which to erect a custom-house at Bangor, Maine, $15,000." What is the next after that? "For the purchase of a site on which to erect a custom-house at Bath, Maine, $11,000." If Maine, or any other portion of the country, is to have appropriations of this sort stuck into the bill, when the time comes to make an appropriation to the rivers of the West, the gentlemen from that portion of the Union will be found, as they always have been found, voting against it, or, at least, demanding something additional as compensation for voting for us. This appropriation, and the ones that follow it, are evidently stuck in here for the purpose of being passed under the power and influence of this bill. If there are to be appropriations made for harbors and light-houses and custom-houses, I want them to stand their chance in a bill that is legitimate. I am opposed to all the river and harbor bills that are generally got up here. I have always voted against them, and I shall continue to vote against them.

Mr. HOUSTON. I ask the Chair to enforce the rule. The gentleman is discussing the river and harbor bill. We shall never get through with this bill unless gentlemen are confined to the discussion of the pending amendments.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair does not think the gentleman from Indiana is out of order. The clause he proposes to strike out is of that character, and it is certainly in order for him to say what are his opinions on the subject.

Mr. GORMAN. I am illustrating my remarks by a reference to subsequent clauses, which I have a right to do.

Sir, I shall continue to move to strike out every one of these appropriations until they are introduced in the proper place and at the proper time; and I will venture the assertion, that if these appropriations come in here, it will operate against an appropriation to the Ohio and Mississippi rivers. I shall continue to oppose them upon that ground. This is not the proper place for them. I object to this kind of legislation—slipping in appropriations in this way, without notice, and without giving us fair play. Sir, at the proper time, I shall move to amend this clause by appropriating $500,000 for the improvement of the Ohio and Mississippi rivers.

Mr. WASHBURN. I wish to say, in reply to the gentleman from Indiana, that he is altogether mistaken in the illustration which he draws from the item in reference to the custom-house at Bangor, in Maine. That is really and truly a deficiency.

Mr. MARSHALL, of Kentucky. I call the gentleman to order. That clause is not now under consideration.

Mr. WASHBURN. I merely wish to correct the statement of the gentleman from Indiana, in order that the committee may not be misled.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman is not in order in discussing that clause of the amendment now.

Mr. GORMAN called for tellers on the motion to strike out.

Tellers were ordered; and Messrs. GORMAN and WASHBURN were appointed.

Mr. HOUSTON. Would it be in order for me to have read the recommendation of this item from the Secretary of the Navy?

The CHAIRMAN. It can only be read by unanimous consent.

Mr. HENDRICKS. I object.

The question was then put, and the tellers reported—ayes 34.

A further count not being insisted on, the motion was disagreed to.

Mr. STANTON, of Ohio. I move to amend the clause by adding thereto the following:

And the sum of $500,000 for the construction of a steamboat canal around the Falls of the Ohio river, at Louisville, on the Indiana side of that river.

Mr. HAMILTON. I raise a point of order on that amendment, that it is not germane to the proposition before the House.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair thinks the amendment is not in order.

Mr. STANTON. I should like to know upon what ground the Chair so decides.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair thinks it does not relate to the same subject as the amendment of the Senate.

The question was then taken on concurring in the clause of the amendment of the Senate, and it was decided in the affirmative.

So the amendment was concurred in.

The seventh clause of the twenty-fifth amendment coming up next in order, was read by the Clerk, as follows:

For the purchase of a site on which to erect a custom-house at Bangor, Maine, $15,000.

Mr. GORMAN. I move to strike out that clause. I understand the principle of a deficiency bill to be, to make appropriations to supply deficiencies that are authorized by law. Now, if it is in order for the Senate to put in a clause here for new matters—to build new custom-houses or to purchase sites for custom-houses when there is no authority of law for it, it is in order for this House to make an appropriation for the Ohio river. It is true the Committee on Ways and Means have reported in favor of this clause. That committee can recommend anything they think proper. But I insist that if the rule applies to one thing, it shall apply to all. There is no law authorizing this appropriation, nor is it to supply any deficiency.

Sir, I do not expect that this clause will be stricken out. I calculate that the bill is to go through. It is like a horse or a strong man plunging in a morass, and the harder we strive to check it, the deeper it fixes itself upon this House. I do not expect that my motion will prevail. I calculate that it will not get more than thirty votes. But I shall continue to move to strike out these appropriations which are not authorized by law, and which have been improperly inserted here.

Mr. APPLETON, of Massachusetts. When the amendment now under discussion was before the Committee on Ways and Means, they did not concur in it, not having all the information which they thought was necessary. Since that time I have investigated the subject, and I am entirely satisfied that this amendment ought to pass. Fifty thousand dollars have already been granted for the purpose of building a custom-house at Bangor, Maine. It was supposed at the time that that sum would be sufficient to buy a site and build a custom-house. On making examinations, however, and procuring plans and estimates, it has been found that the $50,000 was required for the building of the custom-house, independent of the site, and the present application is for $15,000 to pay for a site which has been contracted for. The plan has been laid before the Secretary of the Treasury and the Commissioner of Customs, both of whom assure me it is right and proper that this amendment should pass. Bangor, in the State of Maine, is a place of very large business, and where a building of this kind is absolutely required for the storage and examination of goods, and the security of property. I hope, therefore, that the amendment of the Senate will be concurred in.

Mr. WASHBURN. For the sake of adding a few remarks to what the gentleman from Massachusetts has said, I will offer an amendment.

Mr. HOUSTON. I suggest to the gentleman from Maine that it would probably be better—

Mr. DEAN. I rise to a question of order. I ask if this matter is further debatable?

Mr. HOUSTON. I do not want to debate it. I was only going to say to the gentleman from Maine that I have here a letter from the Secretary of the Treasury in relation to these custom-houses in Maine, which probably presents the facts as well as he can present them in any other way.

Mr. WASHBURN. It shows, I presume, that this is a deficiency. The original grant was $50,000.

Mr. DEAN. I ask if this debate is in order?

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman from Maine submit an amendment?

Mr. WASHBURN. I move to amend the clause proposed to be stricken out, by striking out "fifteen," and inserting "sixteen" in lieu thereof. I will state that at the last Congress an appropriation was made—

Mr. HOUSTON. The letter from the Secretary of the Treasury explains the matter exactly.

Mr. WASHBURN. Well, let it be read.

The Clerk read the letter as follows:

TREASURY DEPARTMENT, May 3, 1852.

SIR: In reply to your request, I have the honor to give you the following extract from a communication from this Department, under date of 30th of January last, to the chairman of the Committee on Ways and Means of the House of Representatives of the United States, on the subject of new custom-houses, building or authorized to be built, so far as the same relates to those at Bangor and Bath, in the State of Maine, viz:

"Bangor. The appropriation by Congress for this building is limited to $50,000, besides which the site has cost $15,000. Arrangements are about being made to commence the work, but a special appropriation of $15,000 is respectfully recommended to pay for the site, as the $50,000 was allotted by law for the building."

"Bath. The act of Congress limits the cost of the building and site to $25,000. The site has cost $11,000, leaving only $14,000 for the building, which is insufficient for a suitable structure. No progress has been made towards erecting this structure, and it is respectfully recommended that an appropriation should be made for the cost of the site, leaving the original sum of $25,000 as exclusively applicable to the building."

Very respectfully, your obedient servant,

THOS. CORWIN,

Secretary of the Treasury.

Hon. H. HAMLIN, Chairman Committee on Commerce, Senate of the United States.

Mr. WASHBURN. It will be seen that that letter confirms entirely the statement which has been made by the gentleman from Massachusetts, [Mr. APPLETON.] Last year an appropriation of $50,000 was made for the purchase of a site and the erection of the building, and then there was a further provision that the building itself might cost $50,000, leaving a site to be purchased out of money to be afterwards appropriated. There is, therefore, a deficiency to the amount of what the site on which the building is to be erected will cost. A plan for the building has been made, and adopted by the Treasury Department, which will cost the sum of $50,000, which the act authorized them to expend for that purpose. The act also authorized the purchase of a site. The amount was not fixed, however, inasmuch as it could not be told how much the site would cost. That has now been ascertained. A site has been purchased, the title has been made good, and $15,000 has been paid for it. This amount is therefore a deficiency necessary to make up the sum which was authorized to be paid for the building.

Mr. DUNHAM. The question involved in this particular debate, is one that is applicable to several other cases. Now, there were appropriations made, as gentlemen who were here during the last Congress will recollect, for several custom-houses, among which are the two under consideration, one at Cincinnati, one at Louisville, and several others which I do not now recollect. The language of the law was after this manner: So much for the erection of a custom-house at such a place, provided it shall not cost more than so much. I have no doubt that the intention, at the time, was that the whole establishment should cost the amount appropriated.

Mr. WASHBURN. Will the gentleman allow me to say, that such was not the case in relation to the Bangor custom-house, as I am informed by the gentleman who drew the bill, and it was not so understood at the time.

Mr. DUNHAM. The difference in that case, probably arose from the clause, saying that it should cost no more, being left out. But the intention in regard to the whole of them, I have no doubt, was, that the whole establishment should not cost any more than the amounts then granted. I believe the course has been pursued in all, to make estimates for buildings which would cover the whole appropriations heretofore granted, and then come forward, as is now done, in almost every case, and ask for additional appropriations to purchase the sites, so that the whole appropriation of the last Congress may be applied to erecting the buildings, and it is for the committee to say whether they will sanction that practice or not.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is upon the adoption of the amendment offered by the gentleman from Maine, [Mr. WASHBURN.]

Mr. WASHBURN. I withdraw my amendment, if there is no objection.

No objection was made, and the amendment was withdrawn.

The question was then taken on the amendment offered by Mr. GORMAN, to strike out the clause, and it was not agreed to.

The question was next taken on agreeing to the clause as reported from the Senate, and it was agreed to.

The eighth clause of the twenty-fifth amendment was then read, as follows:

"For the purchase of a site on which to erect a custom-house, at Bath, Maine, $11,000."

Mr. HUNTER. I move to strike out that clause. In doing that, I wish to say that I agree heartily with what has been said by the gentleman from Indiana, [Mr. DUNHAM.] I agree with him in saying that it was understood by the members of the last Congress, that every one of the appropriations made for the erection of custom-houses, was intended to have precisely the same restrictions in them. The appropriations then made were for the entire expense of purchasing sites and building those custom-houses; and if the words of the law, in the clause or clauses, expressing that intention are different from that, the law is different from what we all understood, and different from the argument made by some gentlemen upon this floor in favor of them. If the law is different from what I and others understood it to be, I hold that we should let them expend the appropriation already made, before we give them any more. I am opposed to giving them a cent more, until we know whether the West is to have anything in the appropriation bills or not. I give gentlemen timely notice now, that, so far as my vote is concerned, every single appropriation of this kind shall be opposed as heartily as I can oppose it.

Mr. FULLER, of Maine, (interrupting.) What do you want?

Mr. HUNTER. I want improvements for our Western rivers and harbors; and I say, too, if my recollection serves me right—and I appeal in that respect to the members of the Thirty-first Congress—that that gentleman [Mr. FULLER] made the remark upon this floor, that those appropriations were sufficient to buy the sites and build these custom-houses. Such were the arguments made last year.

Mr. MARSHALL, of Kentucky. I trust there is no occasion for this suspicion the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. HUNTER] exhibits, and I have an amendment which I want to offer to the next clause that will test it. I merely rise to make that remark, and I hope there will be no distinction between the custom-houses at Bath and Bangor, and others. I have an amendment, which will test the sincerity of gentlemen upon this subject.

The question was then taken on the amendment offered by Mr. HUNTER, to strike out the clause, and it was not agreed to.

The question then recurred upon agreeing to the clause as reported from the Senate, and it was adopted.

The ninth clause of the twenty-fifth amendment was then read, as follows:

"For the completion of the custom-house at Mobile, $100,000."

Mr. MARSHALL, of Kentucky. I move to amend that clause by adding thereto "and for the completion of the custom-house at Louisville, Kentucky, the additional sum of $43,700."

Mr. DUNHAM. I rise to a question of order. It strikes me that the amendment is not germane to the one to which it is offered as an amendment.

Mr. MARSHALL. It is about custom-houses.

Mr. DUNHAM. But it is a separate and distinct question.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair thinks the amendment is in order.

Mr. MARSHALL. I desire to explain to the committee, in a very few words, exactly the condition of that work. In the Thirty-first Congress an appropriation was made of $75,000 for the purpose of purchasing a site, building a custom-house, post office, &c., at the city of Louisville. Sixteen thousand dollars of that money was expended in purchasing a site. The title was obtained, and plans of the house submitted to the Treasury Department. The Treasury Department has approved of the plan, which I have seen, and that plan can be executed for the remaining amount of the appropriation, but it can only be executed by building a house of brick and wood, that would not be fire proof. The estimates of an architect have been submitted to the Treasury Department for making the work fire-proof. By these estimates it appears that such a building will cost that much more, ($43,700,) and that is all that it will cost; and I shall not be coming back here for any more.

A VOICE. Be certain about that.

Mr. MARSHALL. There will be no necessity to do so. The architect has gone into the details of the work. I have requested the Secretary not to let out the work at all, until the sense of Congress could be taken upon the proposition, and I trust the amendment will pass. I will state, in addition, that the Secretary of the Treasury, after the estimates of the architect were submitted to him, addressed a letter to me, which I supposed I had with me, in which he recommended an appropriation of $43,700 for that purpose, and for the reasons I have stated.

Mr. DUNHAM. I am not at all surprised at this proposition for this additional appropriation, coming in at this session of Congress. I was well satisfied, and so stated in the running debate which occurred upon this amendment, as offered in the last Congress, that this would be the course which these things would all take. I was as well satisfied of it then as I am now. I believe the gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. MARSHALL] made as strong a pledge to the House, as he makes now, that $75,000 was all he wanted, all that would be necessary, and all that he would ask.

All that was necessary was to get an entering wedge. The prediction I then made has proved true, and I undertake to say, that there is not a single instance, where an appropriation was made during the last Congress for custom-houses, in which they are not now coming forward at this session and asking for additional appropriations. Here is my friend from Ohio, [Mr. DISNEY,] who at the last session got an appropriation upon the same terms, and upon an express pledge, I believe, that that was all that was necessary, and who stands ready now to offer an amendment of the same character.

Mr. DISNEY. I wish simply to deny in form and set terms the statement the gentleman has been pleased to make in regard to any avowments I made upon that occasion.

Mr. DUNHAM. I did not mean that the gentleman made such statements at the time, but I think that he will find that a clause to that effect was attached to the appropriation for the erection of his custom-house at Cincinnati. As I stated before, in almost all of those appropriations for the erection of custom-houses, the same language was used. They construe those appropriations as made to erect the building only, and then come here and ask additional appropriations to buy the lot with.

Mr. DISNEY. I desire to offer an amendment to the pending amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. Such an amendment is not in order.

Mr. DISNEY. As the Chair decides that an amendment to the amendment is not in order, with his permission I will call his attention to the law. The matter now pending before the committee is original matter, originated in the Senate, and presented to this House as original matter, and comes before this committee not as an amendment.

Turn to the Manual, and you will find it distinctly laid down, that matter originating in either House, and transmitted to the other House, there to be acted upon, is original matter before that House. So the law states.

Mr. DUNHAM. I will suggest a simple reason why this proposed amendment, and the one already offered, are out of order. They are not deficiencies, and cannot be, from the fact that the law making these appropriations, stipulated that it was to build them, and therefore they cannot be deficiencies.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair will state to the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. DUNHAM] that the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. DISNEY] has not indicated what his amendment is. The Chair has decided that any amendment at this time is out of order, and that an amendment to an amendment is not in order.

Mr. DISNEY. In what part of the Manual does the Chair find that amendment?

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair has examined that question. It is found at page 189 of the Manual. As the Chair understands the law, it is expressly stated, that with the House the original bill is our text. That the Senate have amended, and we can propose but one amendment to their amendment at a time, and therefore that the proposed amendment of the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. DISNEY] is not in order.

Mr. DUNHAM. I will suggest to the Chair, that the reasons I stated as applicable to the amendment offered by the gentleman from Kentucky, [Mr. MARSHALL,] render it out of order. I raise the point. The law making the appropriation for the custom-house at Louisville, stipulated that the amount granted thereby should build the work. It is not a deficiency, and therefore not applicable to this bill.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair listened to the remarks of the gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. MARSHALL] for the purpose of ascertaining whether it was clear that this was a deficiency or not. The Chair thinks there may be some doubt about it, and unless the question were perfectly clear, he would not undertake to decide it, and not regarding it so, the Chair entertains the amendment.

Mr. HOUSTON. Will it be in order for me to attempt to amend the gentleman's amendment before it is voted upon?

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair thinks not.

Mr. HOUSTON. Cannot I move to amend matter proposed to be inserted before it is inserted?

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair thinks not; because that would be an amendment in the third degree.

Mr. HOUSTON. Will it be in order for me, then, to have a letter from the Secretary of the Treasury on the subject of these custom-houses read?

The CHAIRMAN. Only by unanimous consent.

Objection was made.

Mr. MARSHALL, of Kentucky, demanded tellers upon his amendment; which were ordered; and Messrs. STEVENS, of Pennsylvania, and FULLER, of Maine, were appointed.

The question was then put on the amendment, and the tellers reported—ayes 71, noes 35—no quorum.

[Cries of "Let us have a recount!" "Let us have a recount!"]

The question was again put, and the amendment was agreed to—the tellers having reported—ayes 80—noes not counted.

Mr. DISNEY. I desire to offer the following amendment:

For the completion of the custom-house at Cincinnati, $50,000.

Mr. HOUSTON. If the gentleman will allow me, I will make a suggestion which will save a little time, if nothing else. Here are the custom-houses of Bangor, Bath, Norfolk, Mobile, Cincinnati, St. Louis, Pittsburgh, and Louisville, all on precisely the same footing; and I would suggest that one amendment embrace the whole of them. If one is to be incorporated in the bill, the whole should.

Mr. DISNEY. As an individual, I should have no objection to the suggestion of the chairman of the Committee on Ways and Means. But I desire to correct one statement he has made, which is, that each of these acts stand upon the same ground. They do not. There is this difference between the case of the Cincinnati custom-house and that of the St. Louis custom-house—

Mr. DUNHAM. I rise to a question of order. I have the law applicable to the case of Cincinnati. The first appropriation was made at the first session of the last Congress—1849-'50—of $50,000, on condition that that sum should complete the work. The last appropriation was made at the last session of Congress. I will read it:

"For the construction of the building for a custom-house, independent treasury, and other offices of the United States, at Cincinnati, Ohio, in addition to the appropriation of September 30, 1850, $25,000. But no part of this shall be expended, unless the same shall complete the work."

There can be no deficiency in that bill.

Mr. DISNEY. If the gentleman had waited a moment before raising his question of order, he would have found my amendment is to supply a deficiency.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Indiana will see, I apprehend, that the Chair, in deciding a question of order, cannot determine the law or fact, but I suppose the gentleman would not contend it is not in the power of Congress, after that law, to pass another, and to go on and appropriate more money?

Mr. DUNHAM. That is true; but there cannot be a deficiency here.

The CHAIRMAN. That is a question of fact the Chair does not feel himself called upon to decide.

Mr. DISNEY. If the gentleman had listened to me, he would not have raised the point of order.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair will state, further, so that hereafter there may be no misapprehension, that the Chair has held heretofore, when this bill was under consideration in the committee, that a proposition to add a provision for an entirely new work was not in order, and that being so clear, it could not be called a deficiency; but where the proposition is to add an appropriation to those which have already been made, the Chair thinks it must be regarded as a question in order.

Mr. DISNEY. That is a deficiency we are assured by the Secretary of the Treasury. This case, as I was remarking when interrupted by the point of order, stands upon different and much stronger grounds than any of the other cases, that of St. Louis alone excepted. The case of St. Louis rests upon the same grounds.

Why, in the case of the custom-house at Cincinnati, and also in relation to the one at St. Louis, the existing laws warrant and authorize the construction of the building involving an expenditure to the amount now asked for. The Secretary of the Treasury states expressly, that the Department is already authorized. He has taken a part of the funds Congress authorized him to employ in the construction of the work, and applied it to the purchase of a site, thereby creating a deficiency in the existing appropriation. He now asks Congress to remedy that deficiency by granting the additional appropriation of $50,000 provided for under the amendment now pending before the committee. The Department under the present law feels itself authorized to enter into contract for the completing of these custom-houses, to wit: that of Cincinnati and that of St. Louis, at a cost not exceeding $75,000 each; and the Secretary is making arrangements accordingly. They are going on with the structure under the existing law. We are not asking by this amendment for authority to construct the building, or an increase of appropriation; we are only asking you to appropriate money for that which you have authorized to be undertaken.

Mr. DUNHAM. I wish to inquire of the gentleman, if this money has been taken out of the fund appropriated by law to erect the building, by what authority has it been done?

Mr. DISNEY. The present appropriation for the erection of the Cincinnati and St. Louis custom-houses is $75,000 each, with the proviso that "the cost of the buildings, respectively, shall not exceed $75,000." The sites have been purchased. The site at Cincinnati has cost $50,000, and that at St. Louis $37,000. The Department, under the present law, feels itself authorized to progress with the building. That is what the Secretary says. The appropriation, then, was not for the purchase of the site, but the construction of the building. The Department feels itself authorized to erect upon these sites buildings not to exceed in cost $75,000 each. He has bought the site, and is now going on to erect the edifices. He asks for enough to pay the debt you have authorized him to contract. That is the whole case.

Mr. CLINGMAN. I should like to inquire whether the $50,000 is to complete the building?

Mr. DISNEY. The $50,000 is to be appropriated towards the construction of the building. The law authorizes the Secretary of the Treasury to construct edifices not to exceed in cost $75,000 each, and he has adopted plans the execution of which will cost that amount. In the case of the Cincinnati custom-house there is a deficiency of $50,000, which we ask to be appropriated. These facts are true of both Cincinnati and St. Louis. It occurs to me now that the city of St. Louis has no Representative upon this floor.

Mr. PHELPS. I intend to offer an amendment, covering the custom-house of that city. I would inquire of the Chair whether such an amendment would be in order now?

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair thinks not.

Mr. BROOKS. I rise to ask if this thing is to go on, where we are to stop? I wish gentlemen would ask for anything else than custom-houses. There may be occasion for custom-houses at Cincinnati, Louisville, and other places on the western waters; but there is, in my estimation, a much better occasion for appropriations for the western rivers and harbors. I much prefer appropriations should be made for them. I am loth to rise in opposition to these amendments.

Mr. GENTRY. The gentleman surprises me. That is an extraordinary objection coming from that quarter. I have been here twelve years. For nine out of that twelve I voted every year additional sums to complete the custom-house in the city of New York, which is a splendid marble palace.

Mr. BROOKS. Does the gentleman want an appropriation for Knoxville? I will vote for an arsenal, but I do not want to vote for a custom-house at Knoxville. It is the principle of the thing to which I ask to call attention. If there be anything in the West for which I am willing to make liberal appropriations, it is the improvement of its rivers and harbors. But, under the pretense of getting custom-houses, and other things of that kind, it is only taking so much from the Treasury, which, in my opinion, ought to be devoted to other purposes. We will soon be asked to appropriate for a custom-house on the Kanawha river, at a point in the district of the gentleman who sits before me. We will be asked for custom-houses in all the western rivers, and for their construction large appropriations.

But while I am willing to complete the work so far as they have gone, I am not willing to extend the system further. Custom-houses, for which appropriations have been made, I am willing to vote appropriations for their completion. We now see the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. PHELPS] rising and asking an appropriation for a custom-house at St. Louis. It is strange some gentleman from Illinois does not rise and ask for an appropriation for a custom-house at Galena. And the gentleman from Minnesota will be called upon to ask for the construction of a custom-house at Red river. Where are we to stop, if we are to go on with this system?

Mr. GENTRY. Is it the policy of a Representative from the city of New York to simplify all these things by voting one large custom-house to the city of New York, and lines of steamers supported by the Government, so that all the imports shall be there?

Mr. BROOKS. I will answer that question. Take away the custom-house to-morrow, and we will give the country $10,000,000 a year. We do not want any custom-house there. Remove it, and you will make it a mighty city. London and Rome will be nothing in comparison with it then. Spies are put over our merchants; we do not want them. We would like to raze the custom-house to-morrow.

Mr. PHELPS. I would like to inquire of the gentleman whether he is in favor of free trade?

Mr. BROOKS. I would like to have free trade for the city of New York alone. I am in favor of free trade, if you will let us import all the goods there, and then add a duty upon all outside of the city to support our city. That is what I am in favor of—free trade for the city of New York alone. [Laughter.] I rise in good faith, however, to say, that I am willing to go for these appropriations to a moderate extent; but I am not willing to go to an unlimited extent. I am not willing to take in a Government deficiency bill any amount of custom-houses that gentlemen may seem willing to offer here, and I dare rise and make opposition, though I am taunted with the charge that I support appropriations only for the city of New York.

The question was then taken on Mr. DISNEY's amendment, and it was agreed to.

Mr. THOMAS M. HOWE. I move the following amendment:

For the completion of the custom-house and other public offices connected therewith, at Pittsburg, $35,000.

During the Thirty-first Congress there were appropriations made for four custom-houses, at four different points in the West—at St. Louis, Cincinnati, Louisville, and Pittsburg. At the two former there were appropriations of $75,000 for the purpose of constructing and building these custom-houses. At the two latter points the language of the law is, that the entire cost of building and the purchase of the sites should be $75,000.

There seems to me a discrepancy in the appropriation between the several points. At the city of Pittsburg a lot has been purchased at an expense of $35,000, leaving $40,000 for building. This sum is entirely inadequate to construct such a building as the public wants require. It is a historical fact, that in the city of Pittsburg the public records have been exposed to fire within the last five years. The books and papers of the custom-house have been placed in buildings which have been twice destroyed by fire within the last five years. It is considered economy, therefore, upon the part of the Government to make such appropriations—at least my constituents think so—as will construct a building which will be fire-proof; and I have no doubt that gentlemen will concur with me and my constituents in that view of the subject. Forty thousand dollars is inadequate to accomplish that result, and I propose, therefore, to increase the amount to $75,000 for the building, adding $35,000 to the $40,000 which now remain. This is the sum which has been recommended by the Secretary of the Treasury, as an amount which will construct a fire-proof building. It is a less sum than has been asked for and obtained from this committee by the gentleman from Kentucky, [Mr. MARSHALL,] and I propose to make $35,000 additional, so as to make the whole sum $75,000, placing us upon a par with St. Louis and Cincinnati. I hope the committee will award this sum for this purpose.

The question was then taken upon Mr. Howe's amendment, and it was agreed to.

Mr. PHELPS. I propose the following amendment:

For the completion of the fire-proof building in the city of St. Louis, Missouri, for a custom-house, independent treasury building, and other offices of the United States, $37,000.

Mr. PHELPS. I have but one word of explanation which I think necessary to make, as the Representative from the St. Louis district is confined by sickness at home, and is unable to be here to speak for the interests of the city which he represents. The duty therefore devolves upon me, as one of his colleagues, to offer the amendment which has been read, and which he himself would have offered. I believe it to be right. Appropriations have been made for the erection of a fire-proof building at St. Louis, not merely for a custom-house, but for an independent treasury and for the other public offices which are kept permanently in that city. When we refer to that city and its commerce, and when we look to the receipts of the last fiscal year, we find that the duties collected in that city to be more than $280,000, as I have been informed by a gentleman who has just arrived from that city, and who is well informed upon that subject. Again, by law a branch of the Treasury Department is kept in the city of St. Louis, and the Assistant Treasurer's office is located there. The Government of the United States has been at great expense in paying for fitting up an office, so as to cause it to be fire-proof; and when the Assistant Treasurer has been removed, and another one has been appointed, who selected some other office, a still further expense has been incurred by the Government in fitting up this office also. In addition to that, this building is designed for another purpose, not merely for a custom-house and independent treasury, but also for a surveyor general's office, the records of which are kept there in buildings rented by the Government. All the records appertaining to surveys in the States of Illinois and Missouri are kept there, for the surveyor general located at St. Louis is surveyor general for Missouri and Illinois. In addition to that, there are officers in the Quartermaster's Department or Commissary's Department, constantly stationed at St. Louis, and it is necessary that they should have offices in which to transact their business. The supplies necessary for the troops upon the Mississippi and Missouri rivers, and upon the Plains, are purchased in that city. It was designed at the time the appropriation was made for the erection of a custom-house and independent treasury building, that these offices should be kept in that building. The Secretary of the Treasury, in a report in relation to custom-houses, and to which reference has been made by other gentlemen, has mentioned that $37,000 were now necessary for the completion of the building. At the first session of the last Congress the sum of $75,000 was appropriated for the purchase of a site and the erection of a building. There was the same provision in that law, that the cost of the construction should not be more than $75,000. But the Secretary of the Treasury found that the site cost more money than was expected. Thirty-seven thousand dollars have been expended in the purchase of a site, and that amount of money is wanted for the purpose of completing the edifice.

The question was then taken upon Mr. PHELPS's amendment, and it was agreed to.

Mr. FREEMAN. I offer the following amendment:

For the completion of a marine hospital at Vicksburg, on a site purchased for that purpose by the Secretary of the Treasury, $30,000.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair thinks that the amendment is not in order.

Mr. FREEMAN. Five thousand dollars have been appropriated for the purchase of a site.

The CHAIRMAN. It has no connection with custom-houses, and therefore it is not in order.

Mr. INGERSOLL submitted an amendment appropriating $50,000 to rebuild the custom-house at New Haven, Connecticut.

Mr. HOUSTON. I ask the Chair if that amendment is in order? There is no pretext, I suppose, for saying that it is to supply a deficiency. It is a proposition to commence a new work. There is no authority for it at all, no estimate—nothing of the sort.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair thinks that the amendment is not in order.

Mr. HOUSTON. These other appropriations are for works which have been already commenced, and are all estimated for.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair thinks that a proposition to rebuild a house is like a proposition to build a house in the first instance.

Mr. INGERSOLL. I will state that this matter has been referred to the Committee on Commerce, who, I understand, are in favor of the appropriation.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair thinks that does not alter the case.

Mr. MILLSON. I offer the following amendment:

For completing the custom house at Norfolk, Virginia, $50,000.

Mr. Chairman, at the last Congress an act was passed appropriating $50,000 for the erection of a custom-house, and the purchase of a site, at Norfolk, Virginia. My constituents being exceedingly modest as well as economical, supposed that $50,000 would be sufficient to erect the building. The Treasury Department, however, entertains a different opinion, and I beg the House to understand that I am submitting this amendment not at the instance of my constituents at all, but because the Secretary of the Treasury has stated to the House, that the amount appropriated is insufficient to complete the building. I will state that this communication was made to the House, not only without any prompting from me, or my constituents, but even without my knowledge. I had intended to wait until the civil and diplomatic appropriation bill came up, before bringing this matter to the attention of the committee, but as it seems to be settled that the proper mode of proceeding is to introduce these applications for deficiencies at the present time, I will content myself by submitting the amendment which I have offered.

I will read to the committee what the Secretary of the Treasury says upon the subject:

"The act of Congress limits the cost of the building at Norfolk, at $50,000, besides the proceeds arising from the sale of the old custom-house. No site has yet been selected; but the amount appropriated is not deemed sufficient for a suitable building at that port, and it is respectfully recommended that the appropriation should be increased $50,000."

I believe that the Committee on Ways and Means would have passed favorably upon this appropriation. I have no doubt they would have done so when the civil and diplomatic appropriation bill came up. I will state, however, that since that report was made to the House by the Secretary of the Treasury, a site has been purchased for an amount which leaves the residue of the appropriation utterly insufficient, as I think, to complete the building.

The question was then taken on Mr. MILLSON's amendment, and it was agreed to.

The Senate amendment, as amended, was then agreed to.

The following clauses of the twenty-fifth amendment of the Senate were then severally read, considered, and agreed to, viz:

"10th. For arrears of contingent expenses in the Post Office Department, $7,500.

"11th. For compensation to temporary clerks employed conditionally to bring up arrears of business in the Dead Letter Office, $1,002 67.

"12th. For fuel for the General Post Office building, from the 20th of February, 1852, to the end of the season, $750."

The thirteenth clause of the twenty-fifth amendment coming up next in order, was read by the Clerk, as follows:

"For the payment of the salaries of the special agents of the Post Office Department, at the end of the fiscal year ending the 30th of June, 1852, $11,500."

Mr. HENN. I move to strike out that appropriation; and I do it for the purpose of asking the chairman of the Committee on Ways and Means whether it is to pay an additional number of special agents, or whether it is to pay the regular salaries of the usual number of agents.

Mr. HOUSTON. At the second session of the Thirty-first Congress, a law was passed to increase the salaries of the special agents from $1,000 to $1,600. To that law a proviso was attached, that no greater amount should be applied than was appropriated in that bill. The object of the proviso was to confine the number of special agents to those who were then in the employment of the Post Office Department. The Postmaster General found, however, that he could not get along with that number of special agents. He has, therefore, considering that he had the discretion, instead of giving them $1,600, increased the number of special agents, and the whole amount appropriated by the last Congress for this purpose has been paid over to the special agents at the rate of $1,000 apiece, except probably one agent. The object of this appropriation is to increase the salaries of all of the special agents in the employment of the Department—I think some sixteen or eighteen.

Mr. HENN. I ask the chairman of the Committee on Ways and Means, if he does not consider that the Department employs more of these special agents than is necessary?

Mr. HOUSTON. It is difficult for me to answer that question, and do justice to myself and the Department.

Mr. HENN. I am satisfied that there have been more Post Office agents in the part of the country which I represent than were at all necessary. They have been employed for political purposes, and I do not wish to vote for an appropriation for the payment of men whose whole business has been political.

Mr. HOUSTON. I am opposed to this appropriation myself. I opposed it in the committee. A majority of the committee, however, thought it was necessary to make it, and they therefore overruled me; and I take it for granted that resistance to an appropriation in this committee will amount to but little. I therefore submit the facts as I have stated them to this House.

Mr. BAYLY, of Virginia, moved to decrease the amount of the appropriation to one dollar, and said: Mr. Chairman, I recollect very well the history of that provision of the law. An application was made to the Committee of Ways and Means at the last Congress in respect to this subject. The ground upon which the Department placed it was, that they wanted to give an increase of salary in order that they might get a superior order of men. It was represented to us that if we would increase the salaries of these officers, they would be satisfied with a fewer number, and we took them at their word.

Mr. AVERETT. I ask my colleague if this appropriation does not go directly in the teeth of an express provision of the bill of the last Congress?

Mr. BAYLY. Certainly, it does.

Mr. HOUSTON. I will read the provision of the law passed at the last session of Congress; it is as follows:

"And be it further enacted, That the Postmaster General is hereby authorized to allow hereafter to the special agents of the Post Office Department annual salaries of $1,600: Provided, That no more shall be expended for this purpose during the present year than is already appropriated in this act."

Well, the amount appropriated in this act was $35,000; so that, as I stated before, the object and intention of Congress, as clearly expressed in the law, was that no more than $35,000 should be expended, but that in expending that amount the salaries of the special agents then in the employment of the Department might be increased. But the Postmaster General thought fit to increase the number of special agents, and has absorbed the money in that way without increasing the salaries of those then in the employ of the Department.

Mr. EVANS. I understand the chairman of the Committee of Ways and Means to say that the Postmaster General found it necessary for the public service not to increase the salaries, but to employ an additional number of special agents. The gentleman upon my left [Mr. HENN] says that these agents have been employed for political purposes. I do not know how it may be in his country, but I will do justice to the last Administration—that of Mr. Polk—and to the present Administration, and say, that nowhere in our part of the country were they employed for any such purpose under Mr. Polk's administration, nor are they now. They have been employed in making valuable detections in many cases. I do not know what motive the Postmaster General could have in increasing the number of special agents unless he found it absolutely necessary. The operations of these special agents are always secret, and have to be so in order to be effective; and I have no doubt the Postmaster General found it necessary to increase the number in order to make detections. Are we now to take away the salaries after the service has been performed? The gentleman from Alabama admits that these salaries were increased to $1,600, and therefore this is not a violation of law.

Mr. HOUSTON. The gentleman misunderstands me. This appropriation is intended to increase the salaries, not only of those who were in the employ of the Government at the time the law was passed, but of all who have been appointed since that time, from $1,000 to $1,600.

Mr. EVANS. Well, their salaries were fixed at $1,600.

Mr. HOUSTON. At the time the law passed there were, say ten of these special agents employed. I do not know the precise number. The law said you might increase the salaries of these officers to $1,600, provided that no more than was appropriated should be expended, which was $35,000. The Postmaster General found it necessary to employ a larger number, and he could not give them $1,600, but was compelled to keep the salaries down to $1,000, and now these special agents, not only those who were already employed, but those appointed since, apply to have their salaries increased up to $1,600.

Mr. EVANS. It is as I understood it precisely. The compensation ought to be $1,600. There is no propriety in striking it out.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is upon the amendment offered by the gentleman from Virginia, [Mr. BAYLY.]

Mr. BAYLY. I withdraw my amendment, if there is no objection, as I prefer the one offered by the gentleman from Iowa, [Mr. HENN.]

The CHAIRMAN. The question recurs on the motion of the gentleman from Iowa, [Mr. HENN.] to strike out the clause.

Mr. PHELPS. I propose to reduce the appropriation $1,000.

I desire to submit a short explanation in relation to this appropriation. By the legislation of Congress, the salaries of these special agents of the Post Office Department were increased to the sum of $1,600 per annum. Prior to that time, they had received but $1,000. But in appropriating money for the purpose of paying the salaries of these special agents, you also allow an item for defraying the expenses of those who are arrested for committing depredations upon the mails. I do not recollect the exact language, but the clause appropriating this money is so much for special agents, and so much for defraying the expenses of depredators. That is, agents are employed for the purpose of traversing the country, and ascertaining who have been engaged in the perpetration of any robberies upon the mails; and they are also directed to inquire into the regularity of the mail service, and to make suggestions in relation to any change they may deem proper in the operation of the mail service in the sections of country through which they may travel. The duty which devolves upon them is an arduous one. They are, to a certain extent, police officers, for whenever a depredation has been committed upon the mail, the Postmaster General is informed of it, or the special agent is informed of it, by the local postmaster, and they are compelled to resort to the vicinage of the place where these depredations are committed, and by their ingenuity endeavor to detect the persons who have been guilty of these violations of law. I say it is an arduous and responsible duty, and I have entertained the opinion that the sum appropriated, and the amount of salary fixed by this law, was none too great.

I will further state to this committee that, in addition to the sum of $1,600, they are also paid their traveling expenses while they are engaged in traveling over the country. Is that sum more than sufficient to induce any man, of sufficient responsibility for that office, to leave his family and engage in traveling the country? In consequence of there being such an amount of money expended in defraying the expenses of the prosecution—I mean the proceedings before a magistrate when a person has been arrested, charged with the commission of any offense against the laws of the Post Office Department, which expenses are defrayed out of this appropriation—the Postmaster General could not pay these special agents the $1,600 per annum, and has paid them only $1,000.

Mr. JONES, of Tennessee. I am opposed to this amendment. This question, like a great many others, has for its naked object, the increase of salaries. The Postmaster General has authority to appoint mail agents to travel upon the mail routes, and detect persons who commit depredations upon the mails—as well postmasters, and mail-carriers, as other persons. Their salary, at present, is fixed at $1,000. In addition to that, they receive two dollars per day for traveling expenses, and, sir, they are charged nothing for traveling upon a mail route where passengers can be conveyed. Upon steamboats, stages, and railroads, upon which they travel, in order to look after the mails, and detect these depredators, they are never charged one cent for their passage. Then, sir, I think that with $1,000 salary and their expenses paid, there can be, perhaps, as good men obtained to engage in this service as you can get for $5,000. You can get businessmen at $1,000, who will enter upon the duties of that service as a livelihood, and discharge the duties in order to retain the position. But, sir, when you give these large salaries, as has been the case in some instances, these appointments are given to political partisan favorites, who are, perhaps, waiting sometimes for a seat in this or the other end of the Capitol. Now, you give a fair salary—$1,000—and in most of the States of this Union, if not in all of them, you will get the very best men of the country for this particular branch of the service. I think the committee and the House should non-concur with the amendment, and reject it.

The question was then taken on the amendment offered by Mr. PHELPS, and it was not agreed to.

Mr. AVERETT. Mr. Chairman, I move to reduce the appropriation to $1,000. I offer this amendment to enable me to make a few remarks upon the clause of the bill now before us. My colleague, [Mr. BAYLY,] who was chairman of the Committee of Ways and Means in the last Congress, and the present chairman of that committee, [Mr. HOUSTON,] both assure me and the House that this appropriation, demanded by the Executive, is designed to cover a deficiency created by overleaping the limitations imposed by law. I understand that the last Congress expressly stipulated what the salaries of these officers should be, and made an appropriation accordingly, and said to the Executive, "thus far shalt thou go, and no further." In disregard of the express limitations imposed by law, more agents have been employed than were authorized, and we are asked to ratify and pay for this usurpation.

Now, sir, I do not begrudge to these agents, or to clerks, fair, yea, liberal salaries. They are the working men of the Government, and ought to be punctually and liberally paid. I would be willing to pass a law increasing the compensation of some of them. It is not on account of what they are to receive under the provisions of this bill that I oppose this clause of it. My opposition is founded upon other and higher considerations. It is our duty, as the representatives of the people, to hold control over the treasure which comes from the pockets of our constituents. But, if we allow the President or his subordinates to contract debts without authority of law, or to transcend limitations which Congress have expressly imposed, and then not only tamely submit to such usurpation, but expressly indorse and ratify it, we divest ourselves of our rightful authority, violate our representative obligations, encourage a foul system of unauthorized expenditure, and add to the power, while we diminish the responsibility, of the Executive. This is but a part of a system that has become fashionable. It is time—it is our duty to put a stop to it. Let us no longer listen to the appeals in behalf of men who have been employed not only without authority, but directly in the teeth of the prohibitions of law. The "laborer is worthy of his hire," but we must teach him to see first whether there is any lawful authority for employing him; and when our high functionaries make contracts not only unauthorized by law, but in violation of law, they ought to be compelled to "foot the bill," and be held responsible for their transgressions.

Mr. TAYLOR. I want to say a word in opposition to the amendment proposed by the gentleman from Virginia, [Mr. AVERETT.] So far from wishing to diminish this appropriation, it is, in my opinion, the duty of Congress, if necessary, to increase it. I look upon this service as one of the most important duties of the Post Office Department. It is impossible to estimate the importance of the service. What is the service? If I understand it, certain special agents are appointed to detect robberies of the mail. You may appropriate ten, or fifteen, or twenty thousand dollars, and the service may require $30,000, or more. If the Postmaster General be restricted to the amount of $5,000 to ferret out the numerous mail robberies that are committed, and which have become very frequent since you have extended your post office establishment all over the country, he will be unable to have that duty performed as it should be. These robberies have become very frequent on the line from the East to the West. Very many have been perpetrated within the last year or two between that part of the country where I reside and the great Eastern cities. Innocent men, men engaged in important business, bankers, merchants, and others have had their checks, and drafts, and money stolen in their transmission from the Western States to your Eastern cities, and some of those robberies have been detected by the vigilance of the Postmaster General, through these agents. They might not have been detected if you had limited the Postmaster General to four or five thousand dollars. I do not understand this $11,500 asked for to be an extravagant appropriation at all. It appears to me to be a very proper one. It appears to me to be an economical one, and I trust this committee will not delay action upon important bills, by quibbling about whether we will give $1,000, or $5,000, or $11,500, to prevent robberies of the mails of the United States, that now extend over this vast country, and to bring, with certainty and dispatch, these criminals to justice, even if it should require a few thousand dollars more than we appropriated. The amount asked for is a very trifling one, and I hope the committee will not adopt the amendment offered by the gentleman from Virginia, [Mr. AVERETT.]

The question was then taken on the amendment offered by Mr. AVERETT, and it was not agreed to.

The CHAIRMAN. The question recurs on the amendment of the gentleman from Iowa, [Mr. HENN,] to strike out the clause.

Mr. HENN. Upon that I ask for tellers.

Mr. STANTON, of Kentucky. Is it in order to move to amend, by increasing the amount of the appropriation?

The CHAIRMAN. It is.

Mr. STANTON. I move to increase it $1,000. I make the motion, simply for the purpose of making a remark or two, and I shall not detain the House five minutes with what I have to say.

I have had some little experience in this matter, having, upon two different occasions in my life, had the honor of receiving from the Postmaster General commissions as a special agent. Now, sir, I know exactly what is required, and I know precisely the amount of expense to be incurred in undertaking this duty.

Mr. HENN. I ask the gentleman to give way a moment, while I ask the chairman of the Committee on Ways and Means, whether or not the Postmaster General has increased the number of these special agents? I wish it distinctly understood, that I am not opposed to the amount of salary, but to the number of agents employed. The Department has increased the number of agents, and thereby prevented them from getting the whole amount of salary that it was intended by the law they should receive.

Mr. HOUSTON. That is one cause, and the main cause, of the absorption of the appropriation of the last Congress for this service.

Mr. STANTON. The extent of our country has increased. Two empires almost have arisen upon our continent that are attached to this Union, and the necessity for an increase of this description of officers is obvious to everybody. As I said before, I have had some experience in the matter. In the year 1845, Cave Johnson, an economist after the order of my friend from Tennessee, [Mr. JONES,] a strict constructionist, and a man who scrupled about the one tenth part of a dollar, was at the head of the Post Office Department, and he chose to abolish the whole system of special agents and to devolve that duty upon the distributing postmasters of the country. I happened to be one at the time, and was honored with a commission and instructed to go into the mountains of old Kentucky to investigate mail depredations there. The duties of my office required my presence there, but in obedience to the mandate of the Postmaster General, whom I considered had a right to command me, I went into the mountains. There were no railroads or stage-coaches there upon which I could get a free passage, but I had to hire a horse at a dollar a day. I had to pay my own expenses, and two dollars per day was just about half as much as I expended in the service of the Government.

Mr. HOUSTON. I suppose the gentleman wants the facts before the committee. Does the gentleman mean to say, for hiring a horse, where there was no public conveyance, he had to pay out of his own private funds?

Mr. STANTON. They allowed me two dollars a day.

Mr. HOUSTON. No, sir. The principle is universal, if you go to where the public conveyance does not take you, the Government pays you extra. You may hire conveyances to transport you from point to point at the expense of the Government. It is universal. There is no exception to that rule.

Mr. STANTON. I do not care what the arrangement is now, the arrangement then was, that out of the two dollars allowed me by the Postmaster General, I was compelled to pay all the expenses I incurred, in consequence of which I wrote to the Postmaster General I could not attend to the duties, and threw up the commission. The Postmaster General a short time afterwards changed the arrangement, and appointed special agents. Under that system in 1837, when Amos Kendall was Postmaster General, I had a commission. I was allowed five dollars a day for my services, and two dollars a day for my traveling expenses; but two dollars did not pay my traveling expenses, although I went over the regular roads, upon which persons had contracts to carry the mail, free. Sir, $1,000 is not enough to pay the man who undertakes that duty. He must be a man of character. He must be a man of sagacity. He must be a man capable of detecting rogues that are scattered all over this broad Union. A large majority of the depredations committed upon the Post Office Department are committed at small offices off from the regular line where the mail is transported on horseback. Why, sir, a man cannot hire a horse and undertake this duty and accomplish it as he ought to do, with the allowance of only two dollars a day. I think the salary is not enough.

The question was then taken on the amendment to the amendment, and it was disagreed to.

Mr. FLORENCE. I move, Mr. Chairman, to add $500 to the appropriation. I desire to express my entire concurrence with the views, and to indorse the conclusions arrived at by the experience of my friend from Kentucky, [Mr. STANTON.] I have had an opportunity of observing the absolute necessity there is that gentlemen of character and intelligence should be selected to perform the duties of special agents of the General Post Office Department. I will recite an incident to the committee to show how necessary it is to have the services of intelligent and sagacious gentlemen in that position; and every member, it occurs to my mind, is aware that a proper, indeed a liberal, compensation should be paid, so as to obtain and secure that class of men to which I have referred. It seems to me there cannot be a reasonable difference of opinion upon that point. A gentleman who now occupies the position of special agent for the General Post Office was informed a depredation had been committed on the United States mail at the Philadelphia post office—that a letter deposited there containing a draft for $1,000 had been abstracted. There is at the post office door, after the closing of the mail, but before the bags are taken from the office, a small pouch in which letters are deposited previously to the mail matter being dispatched to its destination. This pouch is taken charge of by the route agent—distributed and made up by him in the cars. The person who deposited the letter averred he had deposited the letter containing the $1,000 draft to which I have alluded in the pouch inside of the door of the post office. It was taken from there to the cars en route to New York. Suspicion immediately attached itself to the route agent. And here I may remark that, in my humble judgment, this class of Government officers do not receive compensation enough. They are now paid but $800 a year; and I may remark further, by way of parenthesis, that I do not think there ought to be such a difference between the compensations of the route agents and special agents of the Post Office Department. The duties of either class are exceedingly responsible and arduous, and they should be paid a salary commensurate with the important service they render. Suspicion, as I have already said, attached itself to the route agent. The person who deposited the letter declared, in the most solemn manner, that he pushed it into the pouch, and that it fell to the bottom—thereby rendering it impossible for any one to abstract it therefrom. The special agent, a man of judgment, of nice discrimination, and fully competent and equal to his position, upon questioning the route agent, was well assured, from his cool manner, his general appearance, and having confidence in his integrity—his previous good character justifying the conclusion—that he had not committed the depredation; and doubted very much whether the letter had been safely and securely placed in the pouch. The agent was right in this surmise. Before eleven o'clock the next day the draft had been drawn at the Bank of North America, with a forged indorsement upon it. I am fearful I shall not be able to complete my story before the expiration of my five minutes. Immediately afterwards, by the scrutiny and investigation entered into by the special agent, it was discovered a boy had visited the Philadelphia post office upon business for his employers, and in the act of depositing letters for them had taken the letter from the pouch—had forged the name of the person in whose favor it was drawn, and had drawn the $1,000 from the Bank of North America. The letter had not been securely placed in the pouch, but was left so that it was easily taken therefrom by the boy. The special agent, by severe scrutiny, good judgment, and having capacity for the place he fills, ascertained, by the investigation he immediately instituted, that the depredator had gone to Cincinnati. He went immediately to that city, arrested the perpetrator, recovered a large portion of the money, and brought the boy back to Philadelphia. I was a member, if I recollect correctly, of the grand jury which returned a true bill for the offense; and I believe the boy is now under bonds to be tried for that depredation.

Now, sir, this proves, in the first place, that it requires intelligent gentlemen to perform this duty, not only to protect the public against wrong being done to them, but equally to defend those in the employ of Government, to whom suspicion frequently is unjustly attached. In the next place, we can perceive they have arduous duties to perform, traveling, as they do, from one end of the country to the other at a moment's notice, and at all seasons of the year. Without men of ability and sagacity, it will be impossible to prevent or discover depredations on the Post Office Department. They are committed, as we know, almost daily. It is known there have been more depredations committed on the Post Office Department within the last few years than at any previous time in the history of the country.

A Voice. It is because this is a Whig Administration.

Mr. FLORENCE. The gentleman says this is because we have a Whig Administration. I do not desire, nor was it my purpose to make attacks upon any one when I rose. I merely wished to urge the propriety of paying what I consider to be a fair compensation for arduous duties performed in the service of the Government.

Mr. HOUSTON. I am in the hope we will press action upon this bill and report it to the House to-night. I am opposed to the amendment and ask for a vote upon it.

The question was then taken on the amendment to the amendment, and it was rejected.

Tellers were demanded on the motion of Mr. HENN to strike out the clause, and they were refused.

The question was then taken, and decided in the negative.

The question was then taken on agreeing to the Senate amendment, and it was agreed to.

The fourteenth and fifteenth clauses of the twenty-fifth amendment of the Senate were adopted, as follow:

"For payment to the following named tribes of Indians of the undermentioned sums due them, retained by the late sub-Indian agent, William H. Bruce, the same to be reimbursed to the United States when recovered from said sub agent or his sureties, viz:

"To Menomonees, $9,466 27.
"To Chippewas, Menomonees, Winnebagoes, and New York Indians, $531 50.
"To Six Nations of New York, (Stockbridge,) $22 50.
"To Stockbridge, $1,806.

"For expenses of treaty with the Mississippi and St. Peter's Sioux for the extinguishment of their title to lands in Minnesota Territory, being in addition to the appropriation for the same object, made 30th September, 1850, $4,372 38.

"For expenses of treating with the Indians and half-breeds, for the extinguishment of the title to their lands on the Red river of the north, in the Territory of Minnesota, being in addition to the appropriation for the same object, made 30th September, 1850, $901 05."

The Clerk then read the sixteenth clause of the twenty-fifth amendment of the Senate, as follows:

"For this sum as an advance to the Chippewa Indians of the Mississippi, under the third article of the treaty of 2d August, 1847, to be expended in opening farms for their benefit, and extending their farming facilities, $5,000."

Mr. HOUSTON. This item was in the committee ordered to be stricken out, for the purpose of putting it in regularly in the Indian bill. It is an item which belongs to, and we have a part of it now in the Indian bill. The committee have instructed me to move to strike it out of this bill and to put it in the Indian appropriation bill. If it be retained here, confusion will be created in the appropriation. There is no necessity for it in this bill.

Mr. SIBLEY. I trust the chairman of the Committee on Ways and Means will allow me to make a statement. This sum is required to be appropriated at the earliest possible moment. These Indians, or a portion of them, under a former appropriation, have been removed. It is the intention of the Department to apply this money, in anticipation of the ordinary appropriation, to farming purposes. The money is absolutely necessary now. It is merely in anticipation of the regular Indian appropriation bill.

Mr. HOUSTON. The gentleman is mistaken. The Government agreed to pay this tribe of Indians $1,000 a year for forty-six years, to be applied to farming purposes, as it is alleged. The treaty is not, however, very clear upon that subject. In the regular Indian bill we have one of the forty-six payments appropriated. This proposition is to anticipate five of the payments—instead of paying $1,000 to pay $5,000—five forty-sixths of the original amount to be given by the treaty. They said they wanted it early last winter for the purpose of using it for farming purposes, so as to bring the land into cultivation this spring. They have not got the money. If they get it now they cannot use it before next year. They do not want it now, before the regular bill passes. In the Committee on Ways and Means this item was decided to be irregularly here, and that the phraseology is such as not to be an offset against the treaty.

Mr. SIBLEY. I wish to state to the committee, that I probably understand more about this proposition and the questions connected with it, than the gentleman can possibly do. Under the treaty made in 1847, these Indians were to receive $1,000 annuity for forty-six years. The Department now requires this sum to be expended in anticipation for five years, in order that the Indians who have been removed west of the Mississippi from the east, shall have the means of subsistence when they get there. The Indian agent has just left here for his post, after having waited for some time to get through this appropriation. He states that it is absolutely necessary that this appropriation should be made, and that a treaty provision being anticipated for five years, would be all that was required to put their farming operations in such shape, that the Indians hereafter can be supported from the proceeds of their farms.

The question was then taken upon striking out the clause, and it was agreed to.

The eighteenth, nineteenth, twentieth, twenty-first, twenty-second, twenty-third, twenty-fourth, and twenty-fifth clauses of the twenty-fifth amendment of the Senate were then considered and agreed to, as follow:

"For fulfilling treaties with the Winnebagoes, viz: purchase of tobacco, per second article of treaty of 1st August, 1839, and fifth article of treaty of 15th September, 1832, $375.

"For fulfilling treaties with Ottowas and Chippewas, viz: purchase of tobacco, per fourth article of treaty of 28th March, 1836, $300.

"For fulfilling treaties with the Sacs and Foxes of the Mississippi, viz: purchase of tobacco, per fourth article of treaty of the 21st September, 1832, $200.

"For fulfilling treaties with the Menomonees, viz: purchase of tobacco, per second article of treaty of 3d September, 1836, $100.

"For the payment of annuities, and the transportation of the same, to certain tribes of Indians, in accordance with the seventh article of the treaty made at Fort Laramie, on the 17th day of September, Anno Domini 1851, $60,000. And the Secretary of the Interior is hereby authorized to purchase the provisions, merchandise, domestic animals, and agricultural implements, to be delivered in payment of the annuity first payable under the seventh article of said treaty, without previous advertisement, if such purchases can be so made on reasonable terms."

The twenty-sixth clause was then read, as follows:

Section three, page fifteen, line nine, strike out the word "hereafter," so as to prevent the Executive branch of the Government hereafter recognizing any contract between any tribe or part of a tribe and any attorney or agent for the prosecution of any claim against the Government under this act.

Mr. HOUSTON. There are two amendments here (the twenty-sixth and twenty-seventh) which necessarily go together. I should like the attention of the gentlemen from Arkansas [Mr. Johnson] and Indiana [Mr. Fitch] to the words here, just transposing the word "hereafter" from one place to another. The committee will remember, that when this deficiency bill was before the House a short time ago, upon the motion of the gentleman from South Carolina, [Mr. Woodward,] a provision was inserted, declaring that the President of the United States should not recognize any contract with agents for the Indians. That was intended to apply to all contracts from the time the law might pass. The Senate have transposed the word, so as to make the word "hereafter" apply to the time of making the contract, and not to the action of the President of the United States. They have changed the phraseology of the provision which we made, which was, that no contract shall hereafter be recognized and made the law, so that it shall not be lawful to recognize contracts hereafter made—so as to let in all contracts, whether fraudulent or otherwise, which may exist at the time the law takes effect. The Committee of Ways and Means non-concurred in the amendment of the Senate.

Mr. CHANDLER. Does the gentleman mean to say that where debts have been recognized by the Indians they are not to be paid?

Mr. HOUSTON. This provision was offered by the gentleman from South Carolina, and it was intended to put down the fraudulent and corrupt practice which has prevailed in this city and everywhere else where Indians are managed at all on the part of white men, of making contracts with Indians and defrauding them out of their dues. Let me illustrate the case. An Indian is entitled to an annuity and a compensation from the Government under some treaty, and some white man, an Indian agent, goes to him and tells him that he cannot get his pay without the instrumentality of some white man, that Congress will not pay any attention to him; and he thus induces him to give him a large amount, sometimes a quarter, sometimes a half, and in some cases more than half. The gentleman from Florida [Mr. CABELL] is better acquainted with these things than I am, and he knows that often, for really no service at all, the Indian is deprived of more than half his money by these kind of agents or attorneys.

Mr. CHANDLER. I am concerned to know if an Indian trader purchases goods in the East, and sells them to the Indians upon credit, is to lose his debts?

Mr. HOUSTON. That has nothing to do with it.

Mr. JOHNSON, of Arkansas. I will make a brief explanation in regard to this matter, if the gentleman will allow me. An amendment was drawn up by the gentleman from South Carolina, [Mr. WOODWARD.] I was consulted with and satisfied, at the time, that it was correct, and would hereafter relieve a class of cases where the Indians themselves were the sufferers from an imputation which existed most unfairly against them in the minds of gentlemen, and that it would place them upon their own merits before the House, and that it would enable them to be properly cared for and sustained here. I am entirely satisfied, that the amendment proposed by the Senate will materially change the section which was originally adopted by the House. I believe that the best thing which can be done for the benefit of these Indians, is to place them in this position, where they can employ their own agents if they choose, and pay them themselves, and where the Government will have nothing to do with these agents. Or, in other words, will not recognize any contract between them and the Indians, but leave them to be governed by Indian law; and in their transactions with the Indians to receive what they may choose to give them. We will have nothing to do with their business at all. This will enable them to get justice, whereas they cannot get it unless a course of this kind is taken. I am opposed to the amendment, and I agree with the chairman, of the Committee on Ways and Means not to concur in the amendment of the Senate.

Mr. SEYMOUR, of New York. Mr. Chairman, I wish to say a few words—

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will report the next amendment, and then the gentleman will be heard.

The amendment was then read, as follows:

"Section 3, page 21, line 12, after the word 'contract,' insert the words 'hereafter made.'"

Mr. SEYMOUR. I wish to inquire of the Committee of Ways and Means, whether it is the intention to have the expression which was inserted in the House bill apply to contracts which had previously been made between these Indians and other persons, in good faith, and whether the action of the Senate has not been merely to restrict it to subsequent contracts? It seems to me, if this is so, that then the action of the Senate is right, and we should agree in their amendment, and the word "hereafter" should stand where they put it, and not where the committee of the House put it. I do not think we are prepared to say that contracts which have been made in good faith between these Indians and agents, for the purpose of getting their money or any other thing, shall be abrogated. I will not prejudice them. They have been made in good faith; they ought to stand to them. All that should be done by any law in this matter, should apply to future contracts, that all persons in future may have notice of it. No such law has existed heretofore, and if contracts have been made in good faith between these Indians and their agents, they should not be embarrassed by any provision like this.

Mr. WOODWARD. Mr. Chairman, if the principle of the amendment proposed by me when the bill was first before the House, and which has been stricken out or modified, by the Senate, be correct, there is no good reason why it should not apply to existing contracts, as well as those hereafter to be made. The Senate must have misconceived the nature of the provision. It will not operate to make void existing contracts between Indians and white men, or to prohibit such contracts in future. Nor does it propose to take from the white man acting as the agent of an Indian or tribe of Indians, any remedy he may be entitled to by law, for breach of contract by the Indians. It simply proposes to prohibit executive officers from assuming to exercise judicial functions in such cases, between the agent and the Indian. Your executive officers cannot lawfully practice such jurisdiction, and what the Constitution and the laws have denied them, a white man and an Indian cannot by contract confer upon them.

Besides the usurpation, there is the grossest injustice and inequality in this executive judiciary. It is exerted for the exclusive benefit of the white man, and always to the disadvantage of the Indian. It is not an equity jurisdiction to enjoin what is fair, and just, and reasonable between the parties. Its object is to hold the Indian to his bargain no matter how grossly he may have been imposed upon; and this, too, without any consideration of the real value of the services of the agent, or whether he was either faithful or skillful in performing them.

Your Departments assume to pronounce judgment against the Indian, and then to execute their own judgment. Why should they desire to be permitted to do this? And what should it matter whether the contract be already made, or be hereafter to be made?

The Senate appear to have supposed that the provision as applied to existing contracts, would be in the nature of an ex post facto law. This is a great mistake. The agent is left to his remedy in the courts of the country, or the courts of the Indian tribes. And he who trusts an Indian, especially he who cheats an Indian, has no right to complain that the laws have not provided a peculiar and extraordinary jurisdiction for his special benefit.

It is a suspicious circumstance, that influences have been exerted to exempt existing contracts from the operation of the provision. I fear there is something wrong.

Mr. WALSH. Is it in order to discuss this matter?

The CHAIRMAN. Further discussion is not in order.

Mr. WALSH. When this original proposition was submitted to the House, I objected to it as violating vested rights. With the indulgence of the committee, I will repeat the reasons which I suggested then.

[Cries of "Order!" "Order!" "Order!"]

Mr. WALSH. All I have to say is, that is a most extraordinary state of facts that three or four gentlemen have been discussing this matter upon one side—

[Loud cries of "Order!"]

The question was then taken upon disagreeing to the Senate amendment, and it was decided in the affirmative.

So the amendment was disagreed to.

Mr. PHELPS. I wish to inquire if the amendment was adopted or rejected?

The CHAIRMAN. The question was put upon disagreeing to the Senate amendment, and it was decided in the affirmative.

Mr. EVANS moved that the committee rise.

Mr. HOUSTON. Oh, no; let us get through with the bill.

The question was then taken upon Mr. EVANS's motion, and it was decided in the negative.

So the committee refused to rise.

The twenty-sixth amendment of the Senate was read, as follows:

"Sec. 4. And be it further enacted, That no estimate or appropriation of money, in any bill making appropriations, shall authorize the payment of any increased pay, allowance, or compensation in any form whatever beyond the amount prescribed by law, in any case, unless there shall first be a specific direction for such extra payment, designating the officers to whom such extra payment shall be made."

Mr. JOHNSON, of Georgia. I move to strike out that clause on the ground that that is already the law. None of these officers have the power to appropriate any money, or apply it in any way, unless authorized by law.

The question was then taken upon Mr. JOHNSON's motion, and it was not agreed to.

The question recurred upon concurring in the Senate amendment, and being put, it was decided in the affirmative.

So the amendment was concurred in.

Section five, being the twenty-sixth amendment of the Senate, coming up next in order, was read, considered, and agreed to, as follows:

"Sec. 5. And be it further enacted, That the Commissioner of Public Buildings be, and he is hereby, authorized to apply any unexpended portion of the money appropriated by the act of Congress entitled 'An act making appropriation to meet the expenses incurred in consequence of the late fire at the Capitol,' approved January 13th, 1852, to the payment of expenses necessarily incurred in repairing the damage lately done by fire in the office of the clerk of the Supreme Court, and in making other repairs about the Capitol."

The Clerk then read the sixth section, being the last of the Senate amendments, as follows:

"Sec. 6. And be it further enacted, That the Secretary of the Treasury be, and he is hereby authorized to purchase for the United States a suitable piece of ground at a central point in the city of San Francisco, California, as a site for the erection of the custom-house heretofore authorized to be built: Provided, That said site or ground may be obtained with good and sufficient title to the United States in exchange for such reasonable portion of the Government reserve in that city as the said Secretary shall deem just and equitable, or for a sum in lieu thereof not exceeding $40,000; and to enable the Secretary of the Treasury to carry into effect this provision, the sum of $40,000 is hereby appropriated: Provided, That if the said Secretary shall fail to obtain such ground on satisfactory terms, then the said sum, or such portion thereof as may be necessary, may be expended in providing the proper foundations for said custom-house on the site heretofore selected for the purpose."

Mr. MARSHALL, of Kentucky. I move to strike out the last proviso. I do not understand it, and I should like to have some explanation of it. I do not understand why $40,000 are to be appropriated to laying the foundation of the custom-house at the site already selected, in case they cannot get another site. I understand that the contract is made for building that custom-house. We have here $40,000 to be appropriated and spent in laying new foundations for a house that is already contracted for in case they cannot find a new site.

Mr. McCORKLE. There is but one explanation to give of it, which is this: The lands owned in San Francisco by the United States are what are called water-lands. The point selected upon which to erect this custom-house had, about a year ago, eight feet of water upon it, and about thirty feet of mud under that water. It is estimated that it would cost at least $40,000 to put a proper foundation there for the custom-house, which would have to be done by piling and filling in. If, however, it becomes necessary to purchase another piece of ground, this money in that instance, instead of being applied for piling and filling a foundation, will be appropriated for the purchase of another site. That is the object of this proviso. In case a more eligible position cannot be purchased, then it is made the duty of the Department to make a foundation upon this property, which the United States already own.

Mr. MARSHALL, of Kentucky. Is not that provided for in the $400,000 contract?

Mr. McCORKLE. No, sir; $400,000, as in the case you brought up from Kentucky, is appropriated to building a custom-house, and not laying the foundation.

Mr. MARSHALL. I ask the gentleman if the contract has been made for putting up the house without putting under it the foundation?

Mr. McCORKLE. The contract is for putting up the house, and not putting in the foundations.

Mr. GOODENOW demanded tellers upon the amendment, but they were not ordered.

The question was then taken upon Mr. MARSHALL's amendment, and it was disagreed to.

The question recurred upon agreeing to the amendment of the Senate, and being put, it was decided in the affirmative.

Mr. HOUSTON moved that the committee rise and report the bill and amendments to the House; which motion was agreed to.

The committee accordingly rose, and the Speaker having resumed the chair, the Chairman [Mr. STUART] reported that the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union had, according to order, had the state of the Union generally under consideration, and particularly the amendments of the Senate to House bill No. 207, and had instructed him to report back that they had agreed to some of those amendments, some with amendments and others without, and had instructed him to report to the House and ask its concurrence.

[A message was here received from the Senate, by the hands of ASBURY DICKINS, Esq., its Secretary, informing the House that that body had passed sundry bills.]

Mr. GENTRY. I desire to offer a resolution.

Mr. JONES, of Tennessee. I ask what will become of the deficiency bill, if my colleague goes to something else?

The SPEAKER. The question immediately before the House is upon agreeing to the report of the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union.

Mr. JONES. Exactly; but if the House passes from this bill it will go upon the Speaker's table.

Mr. GENTRY. I do not wish to interpose any obstruction to the passage of the bill. I was going to move a suspension of the rules for the purpose of introducing a resolution, which, I am sure, will not occupy more than five minutes.

Mr. JONES. I suppose my colleague will give way until a motion is made to recommit the deficiency bill, and call the previous question upon it.

Several Voices. Let us have the previous question.

Mr. GENTRY. I will waive my right to the floor, and trust to the courtesy of the House to allow me to offer a resolution afterwards.

Mr. HOUSTON. I move to recommit the bill to the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union, and I ask the previous question. My object is to keep the bill up so that we can dispose of it.

Mr. GENTRY. I move to suspend the rules for the purpose of introducing the resolution which I have sent to the Chair. I beg leave to remark, that there is nothing in it—

The SPEAKER. The motion of the gentleman from Alabama [Mr. HOUSTON] takes precedence over the motion of the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. GENTRY] to suspend the rules.

Mr. HOUSTON. I suppose the House wanted to go to this subject, or to adjourn. My object is to put the bill where it can be reached in the morning as unfinished business. I move a recommitment, and the previous question.

Mr. GENTRY. Cannot the question go over until to-morrow morning, by common consent?

The SPEAKER. It can only be done by unanimous consent.

Mr. GENTRY. I ask the unanimous consent of the House to allow me to introduce my resolution.

Mr. JONES, of Tennessee. We cannot leave the bill without the unanimous consent of the House.

The SPEAKER. That is what the Chair decides.

Mr. JONES. I move that the House adjourn.

Mr. GENTRY. I am upon the floor, I believe, and therefore the gentleman cannot submit that motion. A very few moments will straighten out this little difficulty.

The SPEAKER. The Chair has stated to the body that the first question in order is upon the demand for the previous question made by the gentleman from Alabama, [Mr. HOUSTON]; but the gentleman from Tennessee asks the unanimous consent of the House—

Mr. GENTRY. No, sir. Let me correct you, if you please. I understand the House, by common acquiescence, to permit the motion of the gentleman from Alabama to go over until to-morrow morning in order to give me an opportunity to make the motion which I desired to make. It is competent for the House, by common consent, to allow the motion of the gentleman from Alabama to be entered, and go over until to-morrow morning. I understand that to be universally agreed on. I now move to suspend the rules, to enable me to introduce the resolution I propose to introduce. I suppose the gentleman from North Carolina [Mr. STANLY] will not object to it. It amounts to nothing more than this: That some of our little pages, and other boys of the city have formed a military company. The Secretary of War is anxious to equip and arm them with weapons which are not very valuable to the country. He has no legal authority to do this, however, and it is necessary to introduce a resolution to give him that authority.

Mr. EDGERTON. I object to the resolution. The previous question was then seconded.

Mr. JONES, of Tennessee. I move, before the question is taken upon ordering the main question, that there be a call of the House.

Mr. CAMPBELL, of Illinois. I move that the House do now adjourn.

Mr. JONES. Well, I have no objection to an adjournment.

The question was then taken, and agreed to; and

The House adjourned until to-morrow at eleven o'clock.

IN SENATE.

TUESDAY, July 13, 1852.

Prayer by the Chaplain, Rev. C. M. BUTLER.

Mr. WADE presented a petition of citizens of Cardington, Ohio, praying that the bill now pending before Congress, commonly known as the "homestead bill," may become a law; which was referred to the Committee on Public Lands.

Mr. GWIN presented the petition of Charles B. Polhemus and Charles Griswold, composing the firm of Alsop & Company, of San Francisco, and owners of the steamer Quickstep, praying to be reimbursed the amount of a judgment recovered against the steamer for a collision while employed in the service of the Coast Survey and under the command of an officer of the Navy; which was referred to the Committee on Finance.

Also, the petition of Francisco Lope Urriza, a citizen of California, praying remuneration for losses sustained during the late war with Mexico; which was referred to the Committee on Foreign Relations.

Mr. CHASE presented a petition of citizens of Cincinnati, Ohio, praying that the bill now pending before Congress, commonly known as the "homestead bill," may become a law; which was referred to the Committee on Public Lands.

Mr. SOULE presented a memorial of James H. Rhinehart and others, praying confirmation of their titles to lands within the Maison Rouge grant; which was referred to the Committee on Private Land Claims.

REPORTS FROM STANDING COMMITTEES.

Mr. GWIN, from the Committee on Naval Affairs, to which was referred the memorial of James Montgomery, praying Congress to aid him in the construction of a steamer which will be competent to carry the mails between New York and Liverpool in six days, and between Newfoundland and Liverpool in four days, and which shall be also suitable for war purposes, asked to be discharged from the further consideration thereof, and that it be referred to the Committee on the Post Office and Post Roads; which was agreed to.

He also, from the same committee, to which was referred the memorial of Robert F. Pinkney, a lieutenant in the Navy, praying Congress to prevent the further dissemination of misrepresentations injurious to his professional reputation made by Commander Wilkes in the history of the Exploring Expedition, published by the authority of Congress, asked to be discharged from the further consideration thereof, and that it be referred to the Joint Committee on the Library; which was agreed to.

He also, from the same committee, to which was referred the memorial of Philip F. Voorhees, praying the reimbursement of certain expenses incurred while in command of the United States ship Savannah, submitted an adverse report thereon; which was ordered to be printed.

Mr. BRODHEAD, from the Committee on Claims, to which was referred the petition of John West and others, engaged in the merchant service and on board of privateers during the last war with Great Britain, who were taken prisoners, praying compensation for the time lost and sufferings endured during their imprisonment, asked to be discharged from the further consideration thereof, and that it be referred to the Committee on Naval Affairs; which was agreed to.

Mr. ADAMS, from the Committee on Claims, to which was referred the petition of Lieutenant Colonel Ebenezer Dumont, praying compensation for a horse killed in Mexico, submitted a report, accompanied by a bill for his relief; which was read and passed to the second reading. The report was ordered to be printed.

Mr. SEBASTIAN, from the Committee on Manufactures, to which was referred the memorial of George K. Shoenberger and others, praying to be allowed a patent for the manufacture of Russia sheet iron, reported a bill for their relief; which was read; and passed to the second reading.

PAPERS WITHDRAWN AND REFERRED.

On motion by Mr. RUSK, it was Ordered, That the report of the Secretary of War in relation to the claims of certain friendly Creek Indians, and their legal representatives, for arrears of pay due them for military services in the Florida war, communicated to the Senate, June 15, 1848, be taken from the files and referred to the Committee on Indian Affairs.

JOINT RESOLUTION AND BILLS PASSED.

The following engrossed joint resolution and bills were severally read a third time and passed: Joint resolution authorizing the examination of the claims of the Biloxi Bay Indians;

An act to authorize the sale of reserved lands, and for other purposes;

An act to authorize the Mayor and Common Council of Chicago, Illinois, to excavate a portion of the public reservation at that place, with a view to the improvement of the navigation of the Chicago river;

An act for the relief of Colonel James R. Creecy; and

An act for the relief of Joseph Morton Plummer and Mary Reynolds Plummer.

SAFETY OF PASSENGERS ON STEAMBOATS.

The bill entitled "An act to provide for the better security of the lives of passengers on board vessels propelled in whole or in part by steam," was read the third time.

Mr. DAVIS. There is a slight omission on the seventh page of the bill, at the ninth line, which I desire to have supplied. We provide in the bill for the pay of two inspectors in the State of Texas, in the district of Galveston. On looking at the bill as engrossed, I find that at the portion of the bill which I have named, where the districts are enumerated, the district of Galveston is omitted. I ask the unanimous consent of the Senate to insert at the point which I have indicated the words "Galveston in Texas."

The PRESIDENT. Unanimous consent must be given in order to amend the bill at this stage.

No objection being made, the amendment was made, and the bill passed.

WASHINGTON CITY GUARDS.

Mr. CLEMENS. I ask the unanimous consent of the Senate to introduce a joint resolution, no notice having been given. It is a joint resolution, for supplying the Washington City Guards with arms.

Leave was given, and the resolution was read the first time, as follows:

Be it resolved by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled, That the Secretary of War be and he is hereby authorized to loan to the Washington City Guards such small arms as may be suitable for a juvenile company.

Mr. CLEMENS. I ask that it may have a second reading now.

The PRESIDENT. With a view to reference?

Mr. CLEMENS. No, sir, I think it could be passed now.

The resolution was accordingly read a second time, was considered as in Committee of the Whole; was reported to the Senate without amendment, was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading.

Mr. BORLAND subsequently rose, and said: Mr. President, a joint resolution, relative to furnishing arms to the Washington City Guards, was this morning ordered to be engrossed. It has been engrossed, and I ask that it may now be read a third time and passed. It was ordered to be engrossed this morning without any opposition or dissent, and I hope there will not now be any objection to it.

Mr. HALE. This resolution is to furnish this juvenile company with such arms as the Secretary of War may think suitable to them. I think it would be better to furnish them with Webster's spelling-book. I must, therefore, object to the third reading of the bill.

The PRESIDING OFFICER, (Mr. BRIGHT in the chair.) Objection being made, the resolution cannot now have its third reading, as it has already had one reading to-day.

SURVEY OF PUBLIC LANDS IN CALIFORNIA.

Mr. GWIN. I give notice to the Senate to-morrow I shall call up bill No. 7, for the purpose of offering a substitute, in which the right of preemption only is granted. It is a bill to provide for the survey of the public lands in California, the granting of donation privileges therein, and for other purposes. I have given notice to the chairman of the Committee on Public Lands, and have submitted the bill to him. I hope it may be taken up to-morrow and disposed of.

SUSPENDED LAND ENTRIES.

Mr. FELCH. There was a bill before the Senate yesterday which was about to be ordered to be engrossed for a third reading when its further consideration was postponed on motion of the Senator from Iowa, [Mr. DODGE,] for reasons which he then assigned. I have since consulted with him and he withdraws all objection: I therefore move that the consideration of the prior orders be postponed, and that the Senate take up the bill. It is a bill to revive and continue in force for a limited time, the provisions of an act relative to suspended entries of the public lands.

The prior orders were postponed, and the bill was taken up, and ordered to be engrossed for a third reading.

LOSSES OF SPANISH SUBJECTS.

Mr. MASON. I wish, Mr. President, to take up a joint resolution, which was reported some time since by the Committee on Foreign Relations. It provides for the payment of the claims of private individuals, but as it was recommended to the consideration of the Senate by the President of the United States, I suppose it may be considered, in reality, as a public measure in its character.

Mr. CHASE. May I ask the Senator from Virginia [Mr. MASON] for information as to the nature of the joint resolution?

Mr. MASON. It is a resolution to indemnify certain persons at New Orleans and Key West, from losses suffered through the violence of a mob.

Mr. CHASE. I have no objection to it.

The joint resolution was then read a second time, and considered as in Committee of the Whole.

It provides that the President of the United States be requested to cause an investigation to be made of any losses that may have been sustained by the consul of Spain and other persons residing at New Orleans or at Key West, in the year 1851, and who, at that time were subjects of the Queen of Spain, by the violence of lawless individuals arising out of intelligence then recently received at those places, of the execution of certain persons at Havana by the Spanish authorities of that Island, who, embarking from the United States, had invaded the same with hostile intent; and that such losses so ascertained to persons at that time, subjects as aforesaid, on the certificate of the Secretary of State, that the same are proven to the satisfaction of the President, together with the reasonable costs of the investigation, shall be paid to those entitled.

Mr. SOULE. I hope that the further consideration of the resolution will be postponed, unless the chairman of the Committee on Foreign Relations [Mr. MASON] will consent to strike out certain words. I move to strike out the word "lawless" in the ninth line.

Mr. MASON. The amendment suggested by the Senator from Louisiana will not affect the object of the resolution at all. It is intended to provide indemnity for the persons referred to; and the amendment merely affects the tone of expression contained in it. I shall, therefore, yield to it.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. SOULE. I hope, further, that at line twelve, the following words be stricken out:

"Who, embarking from the United States, had invaded the same with hostile intent."

It will then read:

"By the violence of individuals, arising out of intelligence then recently received at those places of the execution of certain persons at Havana by the Spanish authorities of that Island."

My object is, not to interpose any difficulty to the passage of the resolution, but merely so to amend it that it may not contain anything which would wound the feelings of any person in the State which I have the honor in part to represent.

Mr. MASON. I have no objection to the amendment. It is to strike from the resolution words which might wound the feelings, as it is said, of some of the citizens of New Orleans. It is not necessary to retain the words in order to carry out the object of the resolution, and if stricken out, the resolution will be congruous in its parts, and I cheerfully acquiesce in the proposed amendment.

The amendment was agreed to, the resolution was reported to the Senate, the amendments were concurred in, and the resolution was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time.

WITHDRAWAL OF PAPERS.

Mr. SOULE. I move that Mrs. Margaret Carmick be permitted to withdraw from the files of the Senate certain papers which she filed on the occasion of presenting a memorial to Congress in order to obtain a pension. She wishes to remove these papers for the purpose of presenting them to the Commissioner of Pensions.

The PRESIDENT. Has the memorial been reported upon?

Mr. SOULE. I do not know; but at all events, the object is to present the papers, with additional papers, to the Commissioner of Pensions.

The PRESIDENT. If it has been reported upon adversely, the papers cannot be withdrawn under the rules of the Senate, because they may be presented again to-morrow. When was the memorial presented?

Mr. SOULE. Two years ago.

Mr. BORLAND. I would suggest that it would not make any material difference in this case whether it has been reported upon adversely or not. The object of withdrawing the papers is not with a view to renew the application here; but on the allegation that new matter has been obtained which will enable the petitioner to secure a pension on application at the Department under the existing law, the ground would be a good one for allowing the papers to be withdrawn.

The PRESIDENT. We cannot tell what the object of withdrawing the papers is.

Mr. BORLAND. It is declared in the application.

The PRESIDENT. But it does not go upon the record.

The question was taken, and leave to withdraw the papers was granted.

JOINT RESOLUTIONS INTRODUCED.

Mr. DODGE, of Iowa, by unanimous consent, asked and obtained leave to introduce a joint resolution for the relief of George R. C. Floyd, late Secretary of the Territory of Wisconsin; which was read a first and second time by its title, and referred to the Committee on Finance.

Mr. CLARKE, agreeably to previous notice, asked and obtained leave to introduce a joint resolution directing the Secretary of War to cause the harbor and river of Providence, in the State of Rhode Island, to be surveyed, and an estimate made of the cost of clearing out said harbor; which was read a first and second time by its title, and referred to the Committee on Commerce.

Mr. SEBASTIAN, by unanimous consent, asked and obtained leave to introduce a joint resolution to provide additional security for the lives and property of persons navigating the western waters; which was read a first and second time by its title, and referred to the Committee on Commerce.

APPROPRIATION BILLS.

Mr. NORRIS gave notice of his intention to ask leave to introduce a joint resolution amending the joint rules of the two Houses so as to require all the annual appropriation bills to be sent to the Senate by the House at least ten days before the day agreed upon for the adjournment of Congress.

PRIVATE LAND CLAIMANTS.

On motion by Mr. FELCH, the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the bill authorizing a certain class of private land claimants to file their claims with the register and receiver at Detroit, Michigan, for investigation; and

On motion, by Mr. FELCH, it was Ordered, That it be recommitted to the Committee on Private Land Claims.

EMIGRANTS TO CALIFORNIA AND OREGON.

On motion by Mr. DOUGLAS the Senate resumed, as in Committee of the Whole, the consideration of the bill for the protection of an emigrant route and a telegraph line, and for an overland mail between the Missouri river and the settlements in California and Oregon.

Mr. DOUGLAS. I will offer an amendment to the sixth section, to meet the objection which was made the other day, that it might be considered a monopoly so far as permitting a telegraphic line to be established along the route was concerned. I move to strike out of the sixth section the words, "such persons as he shall associate with him," and insert, "any other person or persons who shall desire to do so." The section will then read:

"That Henry O'Reilly or any other person or persons who shall desire to do so, are hereby authorized, at their own expense, to establish and operate lines of telegraph communication over the public domain along said routes, and under the protection of said military posts and stations, subject to such regulations and conditions as shall be prescribed by the President; and during the period of three years, shall be permitted to use the military posts and stations as telegraphic stations free of charge."

Mr. CHASE. I will suggest to the Senator from Illinois, that it will be expedient to give to the President of the United States a discretion, that he may grant the right to establish a telegraph line to such persons as he may deem expedient. It may not be known to the Senator, that the right of telegraphing is involved in a very serious controversy. There are three modes of telegraphing in common use—the House printing telegraph, the Bain chemical telegraph, and the Morse electromagnetic telegraph. Mr. O'Reilly, I am aware, has had the control of one of these modes, namely, that patented by Bain, the chemical telegraph. Mr. Morse and his associates, control the magnetic telegraph; and I believe, though I am not certain on that point, that Mr. House and his associates, have the control of the printing telegraph. I am not prepared to say which of the modes of telegraphing is best adapted to the purposes contemplated by the bill, but it is very certain that all the modes are involved in controversy, and that none of them at the present moment, has the sanction of all the courts, to which questions affecting the validity of the patents have been submitted. It seems to me very clear that we should not be in a hurry to grant any exclusive right to any one individual. I will therefore propose, and I hope it will meet the concurrence of my friend, that the sixth section be amended by striking out the words "that Henry O'Reilly and such persons as he shall associate with him, are hereby authorized," and insert the words "that the President of the United States be hereby authorized to grant to such person or persons, and upon such terms as he shall deem expedient and right." So amended the section will authorize the President to grant to such person or persons, and upon such terms as he shall deem expedient, the right to establish and operate the lines of telegraphic communication over the route proposed. That will obviate all difficulty.

Mr. DOUGLAS. I presume that the Senator from Ohio and myself will not differ at all as to the object we have in view. I inserted the name of Mr. O'Reilly in the bill, because he had petitioned Congress for permission to establish a telegraphic line from the Mississippi river to the Pacific ocean. He only asked permission to put up his poles over the public domain. I presume that that permission would not be denied to any citizen of the United States who desired to establish such a line. But, at the suggestion of the Senator from Texas, I chose to alter it, to make it read that Mr. O'Reilly or any other person or persons who may choose to do so, may have that permission. As I have modified it, then, it gives the privilege to Mr. O'Reilly, Mr. Morse, Mr. Bain, Mr. House, or any other gentleman who has a patent, or who may procure the privileges of a patent, to establish a line of telegraph. I presume there can be no objection to giving permission to everybody. I would not be willing to give to the President of the United States the privilege of designating the man who might establish a telegraph, and then confine it to him; because it would be authorizing the President by law to establish a monopoly. But if we give the right to anybody to establish a line across the public domain, there is no monopoly; and, if we choose to establish more than one, the competition will be beneficial to the public, instead of injurious.

As to what patent shall be used, if any, I am not certain but that it is already, by the bill, vested in the President of the United States to determine; because it says, the telegraph is to be established, subject to such regulations and conditions as shall be prescribed by the President of the United States. My object in inserting that clause was, that the President should require telegraph stations to be established at such points as the public service might require. For instance, it may be important in our military operations, on many accounts, that there should be a station of a telegraph from Fort Laramie, or Fort Kearny, or any other point; and that the President should require the company that established the telegraph to keep stations at such points as the public interest would require, in order to facilitate the transmission of intelligence, either to our army, or to any other point. I think, with the amendment which I have made, the bill is entirely free from objection, and accomplishes all the object that the Senator from Ohio suggests in his amendment, without subjecting it to the charge of authorizing the President to establish a monopoly, by giving the privilege to one man, and withholding it from others.

Mr. CHASE. The bill, as it now stands, is subject to the very objection which the Senator from Illinois urges against the amendment which I have submitted. No one, I apprehend, who knows anything of the character of the telegraph enterprise in this country, imagines that, over so great an extent of territory, more than a single line can be established. Of course then, if you give the authority to anybody, you give an exclusive authority. That is clear. The question then recurs, what is the best mode of conferring that authority? And if you confer it upon a single individual, and those whom he may choose to associate with him, or who may choose to associate themselves with him, you necessarily limit it to one of these modes of telegraphing.

Mr. DOUGLAS. Will the Senator allow me to make a suggestion? Suppose I strike out the name of Mr. O'Reilly entirely, and let the bill read—"that any person or persons who may choose to do so, are hereby authorized to establish a telegraph line," &c. Perhaps that will obviate the objection, and I will consent so to modify it. Mr. O'Reilly's name was only inserted, because he petitioned for the privilege.

Mr. CHASE. I will accede cheerfully to that suggestion. I wish to have it understood, however, that whilst I am desirous that this thing should be left open, and while I would prefer that it should be left to the discretion of the President of the United States to make the contract on such terms as he may think proper, I mean to say nothing which would detract in the slightest degree from Mr. O'Reilly. I know that gentleman, and I know him to be a very intelligent and energetic man, who, having the means, would be eminently qualified to carry through an enterprise of this sort.

The question was taken on the amendment to strike out the name of Mr. O'Reilly, so as to let the bill read, "that any person or persons who shall desire to do so, are hereby authorized to establish and operate a telegraph line," &c.; and it was agreed to.

Mr. DOUGLAS. It will be necessary to fill a blank in the last section, which provides for carrying the provisions of the bill into effect. I am not aware of what would be the precise amount of appropriation necessary; but I propose to insert, for the time being, $100,000.

Mr. HALE. I was about to ask the Senator from Illinois, who reported this bill, if he had made a calculation of how many men it would take to occupy the stations and guard-houses, provided for in this bill, along the route. But I understand from him that the purpose of the bill is, that the three regiments which are to be raised shall perform that duty. Three regiments of ten companies each, and a hundred men to a company, if I calculate aright, amount to three thousand men. And I think, if any gentleman will look at the amount of our military expenses, not in time of war but in time of peace, when our troops were stationed along the coast and in forts years back, and then look at the number of men, they will find that it takes about $1,000 a man to support the Army in time of peace at home. It will not, probably, be less expensive to support them on this route than it will be to support them at home on the coast. If that be so, this appropriation, instead of being $100,000, ought to be at least $3,000,000 to begin with, for these three additional regiments, exclusive of all the other expenditures which will have to be incurred for supplies, live stock, agricultural implements, the extinguishment of Indian titles, &c. I would suggest, whether it would not be better to make the sum so large as to meet the actual increase of expenditures which will be incurred.

Mr. DOUGLAS. Mr. President, I meet here the very difficulty which I had anticipated; and that is this: I am afraid the Senator from New Hampshire, and some others, have not read the bill.

Mr. HALE. I have read it.

Mr. DOUGLAS. If the Senator examined the matter, he would find that the large items of expenditure for the regular army consist in the transportation, in the supplies for the animals, and in the purchase of horses. Probably nine tenths of all the army expenses on the Western frontier are to be found under those items. The Senator will find that under this bill all of this expense is to be borne by the men themselves. They are to furnish their own horses; they are to raise their own supplies and forage along the line. Hence we do not make any appropriation for these purposes. The Committee on the Territories were unable to make a specific estimate of what would be the necessary expenditures under this bill, and therefore we propose to put in $100,000 as a sum that will probably answer the purposes, and then the Administration, from year to year, can estimate, hereafter, how much money will be required. I presume that, for the present, $100,000 will be enough.

Mr. HALE. I do not intend to say anything to embarrass the bill, but I will state one fact. I had occasion some ten years ago—before Texas was annexed, before the Mexican war, before any of those extraordinary expenses growing out of our increased territories, and those expenses to which the Senator from Illinois has referred, occurred—to look into the statistics; and I think any gentleman who will examine them will find that from 1840 to 1844, the military expenses of the United States—not counting the naval establishment—were not less than $1,000 to each man in the Army. That was before we had these extra expenses to which we have been subjected by enlarging the "area of freedom" so much as we have done. I think that now, notwithstanding what the Senator has said, the expense on this line will not be less. Notwithstanding the prudent foresight with which these things have been anticipated, and the provisions which this bill makes for pea-patches and potato-fields on the route, I apprehend that it will be found in the end not to be much cheaper to support the Army there than to support it at home on the coast. I think it will be better to put into the bill what we think—what we have reason to think—it will cost. My own opinion is, that $3,000,000 will not cover the expenses. My own opinion is, that $3,000,000 would not more than do it if these men were to be kept at home on the coast; and that $6,000,000 would be as small a sum as you can possibly compromise for, if the bill shall be passed.

Now, I ask, would it not be better to put into the bill something like the sum which experience has demonstrated to be necessary to support the men, instead of inserting so small a sum as has been proposed? I think $3,000,000 is the very lowest sum which will be necessary.

Mr. MASON. Mr. President, this bill, it seems to me, involves matter that should pass under the revision of the Committee on Military Affairs. It proposes to add three regiments to the present military force of the United States; to employ them on special duty, to be sure, and a very peculiar and remarkable duty, as it strikes me. But it proposes to add three regiments, numbering three thousand men, to the present military force of the United States. I had understood the general sense of the Legislature of the United States to be that there was a strong indisposition to increase, for any purpose, the military force of the United States. If I recollect correctly, the chairman of the Committee on Military Affairs, within a few days past, reported a bill making a small increase of the present military force for a purpose, which I am free to admit, as at present advised, I consider a very imminent necessity—the purpose of protecting the citizens who reside on the Mexican border from the incursions and depredations which are daily committed there. But how that bill may fare when it comes under consideration, I am at present unprepared to say.

It is now proposed, from a totally different quarter, by the Committee on the Territories, as I understand, to increase the military force of the United States, and to increase it by the large proportionate number of three thousand men. And for what purposes? For the purpose—first, of protecting a line of telegraphic communication between the Atlantic States and the State of California and the Territory of Oregon. A line of telegraphic communication that does not exist, and probably will not exist for the next quarter of a century, is to be protected by a military force, to be raised immediately.

Then, for what further purpose? For the purpose of protecting the mails that are to be transported from the Atlantic States to the State of California and our possessions on the Pacific. I am not aware that the mails are now carried from the Atlantic States across the country to our possessions on the Pacific. If a proposition were to come from the Committee on the Post Office and Post Roads to institute a mail route now to carry the mails across the country to the Pacific, I, for one, should be decidedly opposed to any such policy, because it must involve an inordinate and disproportionate expense, compared with the present mode of transporting them across the Isthmus. At any rate, the mails are not now transported overland; and yet, in anticipation of such a policy, it is proposed to make this large increase to our military force.

Again, the third purpose for which this military force is to be raised, is to protect the immigrants who take this inland route across the country. Now, so far as I am advised, there has been a stream of emigration, at the proper season of the year, constantly tending from the present borders of our settlements across the continent, to the Pacific coast; but I am not aware that any very serious Indian depredation has been committed there. Now and then, from the accounts we get, we know they meet with predatory bands of Indians, but as far as I recollect, there have been no actual hostilities.

But you are to raise 3,000 men for the purpose of protecting telegraphic communications that do not yet exist—for the purpose of protecting a mail route that has not been established—and for the purpose of protecting emigrants who take this inland mode of getting to the Pacific possessions, when, as far as I am advised, there is no present occasion for it. What is all this to cost? Why the bill provides for a conjectural appropriation of $100,000, not for the purpose of paying these troops, not for the purpose of subsisting them—for they are to be paid and subsisted under existing laws—but for the purpose of enabling the President to carry into effect some incidental provisions that are contemplated by this bill. The honorable Senator says the soldiers are to sustain themselves. I entertain a very great respect for the judgment of the honorable Senator from Illinois upon any question, but I submit to him that if we send these troops there to protect a country of some 2,000 or 3,000 miles in extent, they would have very little time to raise supplies by agricultural labor, or in any other way, and that that advantage would be found to be purely conjectural. But what is it to cost the country, what is it to cost the Treasury, to raise these 3,000 men for these purposes, which at present, as far as I understand the subject, are barely speculative? The Senator from New Hampshire says that it will cost $1,000 for each soldier. That would involve an expenditure of $3,000,000. Are we to expend this large amount for such speculative purposes?

I do not mean to debate the subject to any very great extent at present, but it seems to me that in order to preserve harmony in the legislation of the country, this bill, which is almost purely of a military character, should pass under the revision of the Committee on Military Affairs. I move therefore that it be referred to that committee.

Mr. DOUGLAS: I think the Senator from Virginia misapprehends the character of the bill to which he objects. The object of the bill, as has been previously stated, is to protect the regularly-traveled emigrant route across the continent, and the objects to be accomplished are not merely in anticipation or imaginary, but they are real. I suppose there are now upon the plains, crossing on this route, at least 20,000 men, women, and children, unprotected from Indian hostilities, and every day more or less of them are scalped by the savages. As long ago as 1846 a regiment of 1,000 men was attached to the regular Army for the express purpose of protecting this line. The necessities of the country—we being engaged in a foreign war—induced the President of the United States to divert them from the objects for which they were created, and sent them to Mexico. Since that time it has been found necessary, or at any rate it has been determined, to employ them in other service than that of the protection of this line.

I apprehend that no man will pretend that it was consistent with the obligations of Congress and of the Government to leave this emigrant line unprotected. We are bound to protect our own citizens, and there are high considerations which require that this line especially shall be rendered safe and secure. The question is, how is it to be accomplished? Will you send your regular Army there, or will you protect it by a line of military colonization? If you send the regular Army there, you must also send supplies, both for the animals and for the men. We know that it is the cost of transportation which constitutes a very large proportion of the expenditure of the Army. I think that military colonization will be found the most effectual, and the cheapest mode of protecting that line.

This bill provides for the raising of three regiments of volunteers for three years, but they are to be paid in land along the line. At the end of three years we hope to be able to withdraw the military machinery, and have a continuous line of settlements from the States on this side of the mountains, to the settlement in California and Oregon. Your military force can then be withdrawn. If, on the contrary, you do not encourage military colonization, you must keep up your regular Army on the line forever. These three regiments are to be raised as farmers principally, and are required to raise their own provisions and supplies for themselves and their animals, to the fullest extent that that country will produce them. I think that these three regiments can be sustained on that line cheaper than one regiment of the regular Army can be sustained anywhere. If you will make it a matter of comparison of dollars and cents between the cost of the force provided under this bill, and a regiment of regular troops, you will find that the three regiments provided for by this bill, will cost the Government less money—perhaps not more than half as much money—as one regiment of regular troops. It is true, the expenditure for the first year will be much larger than the expenditure for the two years following. But I believe that, as a matter of economy, as well as of duty to our own citizens, this is the best mode of accomplishing the object.

In regard to the suggestion of the Senator from Virginia, that I was anticipating a mail route, and providing a military force for the protection of it before it was established, he happens to be entirely mistaken. There has been for several years a mail route established by law on this line, and a mail carried regularly, whenever it can be carried and protected against the Indians. It arises from the necessity of the case. We have military posts along the line. We have a territory half way upon this line. Our mails go there, not with very great regularity, not very often, but yet there are contracts in existence for the regular transportation of the mail. The provision as to a telegraphic line, constitutes a mere incident of the bill.

Mr. MASON. I should like to learn from the Senator if he is informed whether there is an existing contract for carrying the mail between any of the States on the Mississippi, as Missouri, or any other State, and the Territory of Oregon or the State of California inland across the country, and if it is, how often it is carried, and by whom?

Mr. DOUGLAS. Not expecting to be catechised upon this subject, I am not able to answer in detail. I happen to know, however, that several years ago—as early, I think, as 1846—a mail route was established across the country by law. I happen to know that during Mr. Polk's administration, when Mr. Cave Johnson was at the head of the Post Office Department, he made a contract for the transportation of the mail from the Missouri river to Utah.

Mr. ATCHISON. There is a mail route and a mail carried from the frontiers of Missouri and Iowa to the Salt Lake.

Mr. MASON. Is the mail actually carried?

Mr. ATCHISON. It is carried to Utah.

Mr. DOUGLAS. A mail has been carried by this route to Utah for some years. I know the Department advertised for service on the residue of the route, both to California and Oregon. I do not know whether any contracts were made. But this is entirely immaterial; the public interests require a mail upon the line. And yet the mail is the least important of all the objects of the bill. The great object is to form a line of settlements, so that traders, travelers, emigrants, and settlers may be protected from the tomahawk and scalping-knife of the Indians. I have no faith that we can hold our settlements on the Pacific in connection with those on this side of the mountains, unless we have a line of settlements across the country. I would like to know how, in the event of a foreign war, you are to have any connection between the Atlantic and the Pacific States. I believe that the safety of the Union, the integrity of the Republic, requires that a communication across these mountains should be kept up and rendered secure. I believe that the only mode of accomplishing that object is by a continuous line of settlements, and that line of settlements can only be formed by military protection for a short time until they are large enough and strong enough to protect themselves. I think that three years, under the operation of this bill, would firmly establish such a line of settlements as would enable the people to protect themselves, at least on much the greater portion of the route. I believe that the expenditure which will be required under this bill, although it may be large, will yet be small compared with any other mode of protection that can be adopted. I believe that this expenditure will be a matter of economy, and will save this Government millions in the end, if we now reduce the system to practice.

It may be that the bill is not drawn with as much precision and as much skill as it ought to have been. It may be that the members of the Committee on Military Affairs could have done it better. The reason it came from the Committee on the Territories is, that the whole route is through the Territories especially committed to our charge. If it had not been referred to that committee, one part would have gone to the Military Committee, another portion to the Post Office Committee, and that portion in relation to the telegraphic lines would have gone I know not where. Some portion of the bill would have had to go to the Committee on Roads and Canals. In order to avoid this confusion territorial bills embracing various subjects are usually sent to the Committee on the Territories, and we take charge of all the various subjects, whether they refer to roads, to military or Indian affairs—whatever they may be, we take charge of all. It seems to be appropriate in the nature of the case, that the Committee on the Territories should combine and blend all the objects in the same bill. I do not wish to discuss this bill. I only wish to make explanations, so far as objections are made to any items of it.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. (Mr. BRIGHT in the chair.) The question is on the amendment of the Senator from Illinois, to fill the blank in the last section of the bill with $100,000.

Mr. HALE. Does not the motion to commit, made by the Senator from Virginia, take precedence of that motion?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. No, sir; the Senate is now considering the bill as in Committee of the Whole, and the question must first be taken on the amendment.

The amendment was agreed to.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question now is on the motion of the Senator from Virginia, to refer the bill to the Committee on Military Affairs.

Mr. BORLAND. I have no particular objection to the reference of this bill to the Committee on Military Affairs. I am a member of that committee, and although I have not consulted the other members of it, I would indulge the hope that if referred to them it would be favorably considered by them—at any rate, that they would throw no obstacles in the way of its passage. But I do not see the necessity of giving it that reference. I do not see any interest it affects which brings it within the particular jurisdiction of, or the range of duties assigned to the Committee on Military Affairs. I think it is a misapprehension of its character and object—the main object, which lies at the bottom of it—to regard this bill as a military measure. True, it has a military feature; but it is by no means its most important, as certainly it is not to be a permanent feature. Its true character and objects are eminently civil, and relate directly, chiefly, and for ultimate permanency, to the disposition and settlement of the public lands. Connected with this general object, it is true it has, as I admit, a present important military feature. But even in that, during its temporary existence, so far from requiring, as the Senator from Virginia [Mr. Mason] seems to suppose, an extravagant or even an increased expenditure of money, it is calculated, even as a military measure, in my opinion, to reduce the enormous cost of our present military establishment.

We know that a very large portion of our money expenditures for the military service has resulted from the transportation of troops, munitions of war, and provisions along a portion of this very route, and a maintenance of a military force in our new possessions West. I apprehend that this very kind of service has cost us more than all the rest of our military establishments together, as it has been administered. At any rate, it has cost much more in proportion to the number of troops employed in that service and elsewhere. Such, at least, if I understand it, is the excuse or explanation given by the present Administration for the amazing amount they have expended for the military service during the last three years. It is true, I believe, as has been suggested here, that the expenditure for our whole military establishment has been, during that period, something like a thousand dollars ($1,000) per annum, for every man employed. Probably it is more than that, for while our whole military force does not, I think, exceed ten thousand men, we have had to pay something more than twelve millions of dollars ($12,200,500) a year for its maintenance during the past three years of profound peace. This pays twelve hundred dollars ($1,200) a year for each man.

Gentlemen must be mistaken in supposing that it will cost anything like $1,000 per man; or an aggregate of $3,000,000, to maintain the three regiments proposed to be raised by this bill. How can it cost so much? Their ordinary pay and emoluments, as provided in the bill, are to be paid in the ordinary way, and at the well-known scale of prices, as we pay the other portions of the army, even in this region of country—not what it costs now, in the distant land where we propose to employ this force. It is the object, as this bill expressly provides, to avoid and obviate the heavy outlay which has been and is now paid for transportation, &c., at the same time that the service will be adapted to the end in view, and be far more efficiently and usefully performed.

These troops are to be paid no more than the rifle regiment of our regular army, originally raised for this very service, but since diverted from it; and besides that, they are "to raise, gather, and preserve all the provisions, breadstuffs, forage and supplies, of whatever kind, which shall be necessary to sustain themselves and their animals, without cost to the Government, to the fullest extent, that the country can be made to yield and produce the same." And still further—they "shall furnish their own clothes, and horses and horse equipments." They are to be allowed the same pay, only, as the mounted troops of the regular Army, no matter where employed, and, like those troops, to "be armed at the expense of the United States." Here we see that, while it is in the matters of pay and arms, only, they cost the Government anything—and, in those items, no more than the same number would cost in any portion of the country, no matter how cheap, the whole cost of mounting, clothing, equipping, and subsisting, which can scarcely be estimated at less than three hundred dollars per annum, for each man, is saved to the Government; for it is just so much more, which we now pay for every mounted soldier in our service for the items I have enumerated, than this bill proposes for these regiments. And in this saving, I have not estimated the transportation of provisions and forage, or its purchase at a high price—all of which is avoided, and therefore saved to the Government. Some compensation, it is true, is to be allowed each man, for these expenses, in the way of a grant of land—a section or six hundred and forty acres—at the end of his term of service. But this can be hardly estimated in the expense to the Government; for we have, long since, granted to settlers in Oregon, the same quantity of land, for the mere act of settlement, without requiring any service at all.

On the score of expense, then, I think no objections to this bill can be allowed any weight.

Mr. BRADBURY. I would inquire of the honorable Senator whether the regiments to be raised under this bill are not to be mounted, and whether that will not be a very great additional expense?

Mr. BORLAND. The men are to be mounted; but, as I have shown, the bill expressly provides, at their own expense.

But suppose, for the argument, everything the Senator from Virginia [Mr. MASON] says, on the score of expense, be true; suppose it would cost three millions a year for this purpose, I for one, sir, do not hesitate to say, that in view of all the advantages to the country at large,—the saving of expense in other departments, the increased value it would give to the public lands, the extension of the settlement in our country, the establishment of a proper communication between the Mississippi valley and the Pacific coast,—I should regard such an expenditure, even double as much, as more than compensated—as “dust in the balance,” against the good it would purchase for us.

Sir, we have been talking for years about establishing a railroad across the continent, from the Mississippi valley to the Pacific ocean. Has any one who ever considered that project—and we know how it has been favored—been startled when you spoke of the expense? I have known it discussed in reports and in speeches; but a few millions of dollars never entered in the argument against it. Suppose any one were to come before the Congress of the United States, and suggest that a good communication from the Mississippi valley to the Pacific ocean—even as a practical basis for a railroad—could be established, and a line of roads and settlements made, for $9,000,000, and propose to do it for that sum. If we did not suppose he was a visionary, or an insane man, and that it would not be safe and proper to have transactions with him, we would hardly permit his proposition to escape his lips, before we would close a bargain with him. I apprehend there is no man in either House of Congress, or anywhere in the country, who would not be willing to pay $9,000,000 for such a communication as I have suggested. And, yet, here is almost its equivalent—a proposition from one of the ablest of our committees, to take the indispensable step, and make not a mere road, but a continuous line of American civilized settlements clear across the continent, and connecting, by a living chain, the two great, and now widely-separated divisions of our possessions; and gentlemen imagine an expense of $9,000,000, and start back in horror from it! Its real cost would not, in my opinion, be one third part of that sum.

I may be wrong in the view I have taken of this measure. I may be wrong in the estimates I have made of the advantages which are to result from it. But I am more mistaken than I have ever been in my life, if, for the expenditure necessary to establish this line of communication between the Pacific and Mississippi valley, upon the plan proposed, at which gentlemen seem to be so much alarmed, we would not have a line of communication and a line of settlements at the end of three years, and accomplish as much as we could hope to accomplish in twenty years, by undertaking, as an independent thing, as heretofore proposed, at this day to make a railroad direct from the Mississippi valley to the Pacific ocean. Why, sir, Mr. Whitney, whose proposition has been received in both Houses of Congress, and all over the country with so much favor, and on a direct vote, taken as a test question here, lacked but eight votes of being adopted by the Senate—proposed that you should give him to make a railroad—how much?

A strip of country sixty miles wide, running from Lake Michigan to the Pacific ocean! Even that was not considered extravagant in its amount, in view of the great advantages which would result to the country from the establishment of a proper line of communication. And remember too, sir, that was upon a line of which not one tenth part of the population of the States of this Union could have availed themselves with any great advantage—perhaps not one twentieth part, in comparison with a communication across the country in the region where this is proposed to be made. I have always believed that, if the practical intelligence and good faith of Mr. Whitney had been confided in, his proposition would have been acceded to by Congress. There are those who have not despaired of his scheme yet. I am not of them.

It seems to me that some of our friends, who reside in the older States, manifest far too much concern whenever a proposition is made to extend our settlements westward, and open up new fields for the enterprise of our people, lest we should inflict some injury upon them, by draining off their population to more attractive regions than they now inhabit and cultivate. I apprehend that just the same fears were entertained years ago, Mr. President, when you (Mr. BRIGHT in the chair) and I were little boys, that, as the country was opened west of the Alleghany mountains, and the Mississippi valley began to be settled, the old States would be drained of their population, and a great rival would be built up there, which would inflict serious injury upon them as communities. But what has the result been? Has any injury been inflicted upon the older States? Has a rival been built up in the great valley of the Mississippi, which has robbed them of prosperity?—which has detracted anything from the value of their lands, or the profits of their industry, or their improvement in any way as communities? So far from it, it may be asserted with entire confidence, that not a man has settled in the Mississippi valley, not a house has been built there, not a dollar has been expended there, which has not contributed tenfold to the prosperity of every State east of the Alleghany mountains. If we could suppose such a thing as that our settlements had not extended west of those mountains, and that the Mississippi valley—I speak of it in its whole extent—was now unsettled, as it was forty or fifty years ago, I apprehend that neither the land nor the business pursuits of any kind in the older States would compare in value with what they now are. The truth is—and no man can be blind to it, or disregard it—every settlement made in the West, requiring the immigration of people, or the use of money, has been, and continues to be, an investment of capital which has paid, and will continue to pay, the largest interest to the people of the original States which capital invested by any people has ever paid, since business pursuits ever engaged the attention of mankind.

Sir, though I am a resident of the western country, and very far West—beyond the Mississippi river—I am a native of this region of country. And however strongly duty binds me to the land of country in which I live, and however strong I feel it to be my duty to watch over the interests of that land, and make it the object of my special care, every feeling of my heart binds me to the region east of the mountains, particularly to the region round about here, within no great distance from which I was born. I was born and raised within the smell, almost in sight of salt water—the Atlantic ocean—and although my more active duties bind me to the West, I can never forget the land of my birth; and would be as far from advocating any measure which could inflict injury upon her, as any man who now resides within the Old Dominion. She has not now, and never had, and never will have a son, even if he never goes beyond her borders, who loves her, or can love her, more than I do. I would as soon do aught to dishonor the memory of my mother, as advocate any measure which could detract from the honor or the welfare of that good old State in which I first drew my breath. It is characteristic of her sons—I trust it ever will be the pride of Virginians to cherish her name and fame as idols of the heart. For myself, dear land of my birth—

“Where’er I go, whatever radius to see,
My heart untraveled, fondly turns to thee!”

But I do believe, and, as far as observation and experience can be relied upon as the basis of belief, there can be no doubt that every step we take, every lick we strike for the extension of the settlements and the increase of the prosperity of the Western country, reflects upon the interests, the honor, the strength, and the permanent welfare of this region of country—of Virginia, and all her old sisters, with honors and advantages augmented tenfold.

I suggested here the other day a consideration for the more Western States—particularly the one which I have the honor in part to represent here—that not only the advantages, but the necessity of extending settlements still further west of us. I was once told, and I confess, when the suggestion was first made to me, only a few years ago, on the first setting out of the immense emigration to California, I was dubious of its influence upon the State in which I live, and other Western States, on account of the immense and sudden draft upon our population. I know there was a temporary disadvantage to us resulting from that emigration; I know it drained off a number of the most active and enterprising of our people; I know it carried off a large amount of the money of the country; I know that, under the excitement for the gathering of gold, the business of the whole country was unsettled for a time—a sort of gambling spirit pervaded the community. In view of all that, I hesitated—nay, I had painful apprehensions as to the ultimate consequences of such a state of things. I did not encourage it. Indeed, for a little while I actually opposed it. But no great observation and experience—no long looking forward—no elaborate estimates of causes and effects—were necessary to relieve my mind of all fears, and satisfy me that, so far from a lasting or even serious injury, it was but a temporary inconvenience, to be compensated tenfold—ay, an hundredfold, by the advantage we would gain by the extension of settlements west of us, which would place us between two settled, civilized countries, give us an outlet for trade and commerce on both sides of us, and make us a thoroughfare, as Ohio has been, by which we could settle all the land within our borders, and make every acre valuable.

I did not expect that this bill would give rise to much discussion, certainly not that anything could make me deem it my duty to say a word in its defense. I was not prepared, and did not feel disposed to go into a discussion of it. The views which I have suggested are general in their character, and are suggested by the very face of the bill. They are the results, or general conclusions to which my mind has come, from a somewhat careful consideration of the general subject. I have not deemed it at all necessary to go into details; nor, indeed have I deemed it either proper or necessary to do so on this occasion, as that has been done by the distinguished Senator from Illinois, [Mr. DOUGLAS,] who is the author of the bill, and who is so much better qualified to do so, to bring forward upon its true grounds, and establish its merits upon sure grounds.

I hope the bill will not be referred to any committee, and while I will not oppose its postponement, in order that Senators may have more time to examine its provisions, I would be glad to vote upon it now.

Mr. BUTLER. I find that I do not fully understand this bill, and I will say that I think its objects have not been fully explained by its author, [Mr. DOUGLAS.] I do not undertake to say that the Senator from Illinois may not explain this bill. I suppose he will do so with his usual clearness and intelligence; but at present it seems to me to be aimed first at one object, and then at another. It seems to combine many objects, and I cannot get from the authors of it any distinct reason for the passage of the bill, or distinct avowal of its objects. The only thing that I discover distinctly is, that it involves an appropriation of about four millions of dollars annually. I am inclined to think that, if I were disposed to retort upon the Senator from Arkansas, [Mr. BORLAND,] I should be justified in saying that it is an appropriation of $4,000,000 to create a Collins line across the prairies, and if I should borrow his arguments which he urged as objections to a Collins line over the water, I think I could answer some of the reasons which he has so strongly given for this line across the wilderness to the Pacific ocean. Four millions of dollars for what? Sir, has the gentleman answered that question? It is for a bounty upon emigration, to encourage new swarms to leave the old hive. Yes, sir, it is to give the public lands away in a new manner; to encourage your young men to go and take possession of the lands, under the security given by armed guards placed upon the route. Is it a military guard? Gentlemen say not. How are they to subsist themselves as volunteers? I suppose they must depend upon themselves as other emigrants have been compelled to do. Or are they to take upon themselves the business of agriculture? Then you not only give them the public lands, but you give them the means of subsisting in the mean time, and you absolutely pay them to go and take possession of the lands. I have heard before, sir, of propositions to give away the public lands, but this is the first time that a proposition has come before us, to pay persons to go and take the public lands. You cannot disguise it; this is the form that it will assume at last.

The Senator from Arkansas [Mr. BORLAND] says that the old States feel some trepidation and alarm when propositions of this kind are made. Let him understand that those who go forth as emigrants are the friends and brothers of those they leave behind, and they share our common sympathies. But this is the first time we have undertaken to colonize the new States at the expense of the old States exclusively. Were Tennessee, Missouri, Kentucky, or was Arkansas itself settled by the bounty of the Government? Why, sir, voluntary emigration alone will exhaust the old States, or at least it will have no limit. Those who choose may now go for the purpose of improving their fortunes, but this whole system, under the guise of strengthening the Army, is nothing but a proposition to give $4,000,000 a year to certain young men to go and make their fortunes with the aid of the Government to accomplish it. If they choose to go to California or Oregon, by the way of the Isthmus, or around the Cape, the sea is open to them, but you should not stimulate this emigration. I do not say that I would not encourage it fairly; but I would do it by allowing those who choose to go and pay for the lands, to go; and a population which goes and pays for the land, will be worth something. But the foreign population, encouraged to go from the large cities like New York and Philadelphia, and take your land, is not to be compared with those who go and pay for the land with that which they had earned before they went.

But, I did not intend to go into this subject. All I ask is, that it may be considered. If the Senators from Illinois will give reasons, or suggest reasons, such as gentlemen of their responsibility can give, I may withdraw my objections; but I cannot allow an appropriation of $4,000,000 to be passed here without having the objects explained in such a way that the country can understand them. Whenever gentlemen satisfy me, I shall indulge no feeling of jealousy, particularly between the old and new States, because my friends are there, my relations are there, and will continue to go; but I hold that this exhausting of the old hive to make new swarms, under the stimulating influence of the bounty of the Government, is full of instruction.

I heard my friend from Texas [Mr. Rusk] remark that there were fifty-four millions of money to be appropriated, and that the Collins line was about as good an object to make an appropriation for as any other. Now, my friend from Arkansas says that the protection of this emigration is about as good an object as any other. I think he ought to join the Collins line party, and one take land and the other money. There is no resisting the combination for the giving away of the public property.

Mr. DOUGLAS. I will endeavor to comply with the wish of the gentleman from South Carolina, [Mr. BUTLER,] and explain the objects of the bill; I thought I had done so before.

We have large possessions on the Pacific ocean, which are rapidly increasing in population. We have wealthy and populous States on this side of the Rocky Mountains, but, between them we have an intervening unsettled country—a vast wilderness, filled with hostile savages—through which there is no road that is safe for the emigrant or the business man; the object of the bill is to bind closely together these two great divisions of this Republic; to afford protection upon the route to the Pacific, to the emigrant, protection to the settler, protection to the business man, protection to the agents of Government, protection to every man who, by the authority, or the permission of this Government, shall find it necessary to cross that route. This is the object of the bill.

Now, the first question I wish to settle with gentlemen who oppose the bill is this: is it their purpose to leave that route unprotected? or do they hold that it is the duty of the Government to give protection to it? Gentlemen argue as if they never intended to provide protection for the multitudes traveling on that line. The Senator from South Carolina [Mr. BUTLER] tells me that it is the first time he has ever seen a proposition to pay money for the settlement of a new country. I do not understand, distinctly, what the Senator means by "paying money for settling a new country!" If affording protection to settlers and travelers, to their families, and to their property, constitutes what he terms "paying" them, I apprehend that he has read the history of his country to very little purpose, if he says this is the first time such a proposition has been made. I think I could point to millions that have been expended for the protection of the settlers in the State of Georgia; to fifty millions expended for the protection of the settlers in the State of Florida. I do not know how many millions have been devoted to the same purpose in Alabama, Louisiana, Arkansas, Missouri, and in all the new States. Millions upon millions have been expended to protect settlers and emigrants, their families and their property, in these States, and is this Western route to be an exception to the general rule? By no means. The bill only provides, and only proposes to do on this line of travel what you have constantly done elsewhere, what you have always recognized as a sacred obligation—to afford protection to life and property wherever you have a settlement within the limits of the country. If gentlemen concur with me in this view, if the obligation to protect the route is recognized, then I am ready to enter into the discussion of this question—the legitimate question—what is the cheapest, best, and most effectual mode of accomplishing this great and important duty. The Senator from South Carolina [Mr. BUTLER] speaks of four millions of dollars, and repeats it over and over again, as if it were a fixed and established fact, that the passage of this bill would impose on the Government the expenditure of that amount! By what authority does he fix the cost at four millions of dollars? By way of jest, I suppose, the Senator from New Hampshire, [Mr. HALE,] on a former occasion spoke of the cost being three millions of dollars; but that assumption was predicated on the supposition that the horses for these three thousand men were to be furnished by the Government, and that all the supplies of every description required for their subsistence were to be sent to them by the Government from the States, instead of their being raised along the line by the men. I know of no means by which we can arrive at the precise amount of the expenditure. I have no idea, however, that it would be one half or one third of the lowest sum stated or suggested by the opponents of this bill. I cannot say, nor is it material, how much the precise amount of expenditure will be, provided it is your duty to afford the protection, and provided, further, that this is the cheapest and most efficient mode of accomplishing that object.

Sir, it is an easy thing to excite ridicule against a measure of public policy, if we are disposed to make light of the subject instead of discussing it gravely. I hardly know how to meet gentlemen in debate for the reason that I am unable to understand what their policy is. If I could be informed as to what point I should direct the argument, whether it be that no protection is to be furnished, or whether it be that this is not the proper mode in which to afford that protection, then I should be able to answer. Sir, it looks to me as if the design was to deprive us of every thing like protection in that vast region lying between the Mississippi and the Pacific ocean. If that be the object of those gentlemen who oppose this measure, I hold that they, rather than we, are the allies of these steam lines to which allusion has been made. But I know that that cannot be the motive. It cannot be that they wish to drive all our emigrants who wish to go to California or Oregon, some six, seven, or eight thousand miles by water, instead of allowing some of them to go across the country by land. What, then, is the object of gentlemen?

Is it to force the Pacific States and the Territories of the Union to separate from the Atlantic States, and become an independent Government? Sir, whatever the object may be, it requires not the spirit of a prophet to foresee that it is utterly impossible to preserve this Union—that it is utterly impossible to preserve that connection between the Atlantic and the Pacific, if you are to keep a wilderness of two thousand miles in extent between you.

Again, sir, you have gone too far now to refuse this protection. You have authorized settlements and established territorial governments in the intermediate country. You have organized two distinct Territories lying half way between the Atlantic and the Pacific States of the Union, in the very midst of that wilderness. You have encouraged your people to move there; you have promised them protection for their lives and their property, and in pursuance of your own invitation, and under the obligation and protection of your own laws, twenty thousand men, women, and children, are now on their way through that wilderness to their new homes, exposed to all the ravages which savage hordes may inflict upon them from time to time. And are you now to abandon them? Are you now to abandon your own fellow-citizens, whom you have encouraged to go there, or will you be true to the dictates of duty and honor and afford them protection? Money, sir, money is the argument which is used against the performance of duty. Sir, if it is to be made a question of money, then, as I said before, this is an economical measure. Look at your expenditures within the borders of New Mexico during the last year? I have not examined the details of the reports, but I have heard it said upon this floor, that during the last year you expended money to the amount of six millions of dollars. And if that is so, let me ask what you have accomplished? You have not, with all the money, been able to keep the Indians in check, or to protect the lives and property of your citizens there. Is it proposed now to go on in this way and expend six millions more every year? And if it takes six millions annually for that Territory, will it not take six millions also for each of the others under the same plan of operation?

Sir, I hold that you are bound to incur even that enormous expenditure, if you cannot afford the requisite protection at a less cost. I deny that it is a question whether they shall be protected or not. I deny your right to withhold protection from these people. You are under a moral obligation to do it; you cannot refuse to do it; and the only question is, as to the best and cheapest mode of performing that which is imperative to be done. If any gentleman on this floor can show that it can be done by another mode cheaper than the one I have suggested, I am ready to adopt it. If any gentleman will point out a provision of the bill which is not well adapted to the object contemplated, I am quite willing that it should be stricken out, and another one substituted in its place. If any Senator will show me how this duty can be performed at less expense, I will readily adopt his amendment; but I neither understand nor appreciate the course of argument which opposes this bill and supplies nothing in the place of it, so that the great duties which are imposed upon us may be performed under the circumstances of the case.

Mr. President, I was not ambitious to come forward with a proposition of this kind. The Committee on the Territories took the subject under their consideration, because, under the rules of the Senate, they were charged with the protection of these Territories; and for the further reason that memorials upon memorials in piles, from all the Western States, have been flowing in upon us during the entire session, and the Senate have referred them to the Committee on the Territories, so that that committee should take such steps as they might deem to be necessary.

Mr. MASON. Memorials for what?

Mr. DOUGLAS. Memorials for the protection of the emigrant lines; memorials for protection between the Mississippi river and the Pacific ocean; memorials for protection by military force; memorials for the establishment of law and order there; memorials, in short, asking for protection to life and property along the whole line. We have in the committee-room innumerable memorials upon this subject; and scarcely a day passes in which we do not receive more of them, setting out the hardships, the murders, and the ravages which are there daily committed. We felt it to be our duty to do something. We do not pretend that we have devised the best system that can be devised; we can only say that we have devised the best that has occurred to us. If any Senator has a better one, let him come forward and produce it—if he has a cheaper one, let him propose it; but, until some other one is proposed, we contend that this is entitled to consideration; and that until a cheaper mode can be devised, the item of expenditure is not a proper argument against this mode of doing that which we are bound to do.

Mr. DAWSON. I am in favor of the motion of the Senator from Virginia, to refer this subject to the Committee on Military Affairs. I consider it as embracing one of the most important propositions that have been for a long time presented to this body—presented without an estimate or without any previous understanding on the part of the Senate as to the amount of money it is to involve. I propose to say a word or two to the Senator from Illinois, on the subject of the expense involved in this measure, and to ask him whether, before he presented this bill here, he made any investigation as to what would be the amount of expense of raising and equipping these three regiments. There are to be three thousand mounted men, who are to be raised and paid at the same rate as the mounted riflemen who were sent to California. Has he taken into consideration, so as to advise us before we give our votes upon this subject, what will be the cost of transportation necessary to carry the subsistence some two thousand miles to stations near to California? Has he thought of that? And has he made an estimate of the buildings that will be necessary for the convenience and comfort of the soldiers and as shelter for their horses, and of the utter impossibility of procuring lumber or even common trees on these vast prairies to build these houses with? Has he ascertained how long it will take to clear the land where all this subsistence is to be raised? Not a word of it, sir, have we heard; and yet the Senator from Illinois denounces those who happen to speak of probable expenses, which certainly appear not less enormous than probable, when the lives of emigrants are taken into consideration! Sir, I hold that this is no way to lay down a proposition. Lay down your plan; show your estimates for everything you propose to do. Tell us what is to be the distance of this telegraphic line which is to be protected? Why, sir, if I am rightly informed, it is some eighteen hundred or two thousand miles. And three thousand men are to be dotted along this line for its protection! And suppose you divide them into companies of a hundred each, how many stations will you have over the two thousand miles? One station for every sixty miles! And then, to show you the plausibility of this bill, these men are to protect these telegraphic lines, while at the same time it is thrown out to the country that they are to subsist themselves by agricultural labor! Sir, it cannot be done. They cannot do it. There will be a constant traveling backward and forward to protect the emigrants as well as the telegraphic posts. Sir, a proposition like this evidently appertains to the jurisdiction of the Committee on Military Affairs, and I desire to have it investigated by that committee, in order that I may be justified in giving my vote.

It is necessary, too, sir, that we should consider the character of the country over which this line is to be built; and in that will be found numerous and large items which the Senator does not appear to have considered at all, such as the numerous rivers which are to be bridged or ferried over in the long distance of two thousand miles. What is likely to be the expense of erecting bridges or of constructing all the ferry-boats necessary in this long journey? How are the materials to be got? or, if you make boats where the materials are found, how are you to get them to the rivers where they are to be used? All these are vastly important considerations. I am not disposed to withhold the needful protection to the emigrant. Sir, that is the object which we ought to have in view; and when we present a bill of this nature, involving so great an undertaking, I think we ought not to dream of commencing it until we have pretty thoroughly understood where we are going, and how we are to get there.

It has been said that $4,000,000 will not suffice to cover the expenditure which will be incurred by this bill. Sir, we all know that the cost of transportation has been immense even from Independence to Santa Fe, over a regular-built route; and yet these three thousand men are not only to support themselves by agricultural labor, but are to make a road and build bridges over a space of two thousand miles. Sir, what plausibility is there in such a proposition? Everything which is contemplated in this bill, Mr. President, must be carried into execution by the appropriation of money. The builders of these bridges and ferry-boats will have to be mechanics transported from one end of the line to the other, because these three thousand soldiers will be all the time on duty, or taking care of their horses. There are so many ways in which money will be rendered necessary here, that it is due to the country and the Senate—the Senator from Illinois himself not having, perhaps, sufficient time, in consequence of the press of other duties, to look so minutely into the details as seems to me to be necessary—that the chairman of the Committee on Military Affairs should investigate this whole subject, and present it in the shape in which it ought to be presented to the Senate and the country. Then we shall more fully understand it; and when we come to vote upon it, we shall do so with more satisfaction, whether we should find it necessary to vote for it or against it. I therefore feel obliged to vote for the motion of the Senator from Virginia, that this bill may be recommitted to the Committee on Military Affairs, especially considering that the Senator who is at the head of that committee knows something of the cost of transportation in some of those regions.

One thing further. This bill had passed my notice except in one point of view. I supposed it was intended as a means of erecting a great telegraphic line, as I casually observed it; and one thing for which I supposed this military escort was necessary was for the protection of this telegraphic line. Now the idea of a telegraphic line through a savage country extending some two thousand miles, seems to me to be hardly very practicable. It would have to be traversed over every day for the repair of accidents, the result either of storms or of mischievously disposed persons. Why, sir, even for that, three thousand men would not be enough. I am glad to find, however, that it was not, as I at first supposed, to make an appropriation of the public money for the benefit of an individual. I think if the bill is referred to the Committee on Military Affairs, it will be likely to come back in such a shape as will present to us various public considerations which should be taken into the account by this body.

Mr. DOUGLAS. I feel bound to resist the reference of this matter to the Committee on Military Affairs. I feel bound to resist it for the reason that at this late period of the session it would be equivalent to a rejection of the bill.

Mr. DAWSON. If the gentleman will only show me an estimate of the cost of transportation, &c., I will not propose such a reference.

Mr. DOUGLAS. I was remarking that a reference could be made, if at all, with quite as much propriety to the Committee on Roads and Canals, over which you preside, (Mr. BRIGHT in the chair.) Gentlemen may make a more plausible argument, since the object of this bill is to make a great road over a vast wilderness, and to keep up bridges, to show that the bill ought to go to the Committee on Roads and Canals, in order that they may bring forward the estimates of the cost of building the road. And when the Committee on Roads and Canals shall have reported, another gentleman, desiring that further delay may be made, may move to have it referred again to the Committee on the Post Office and Post Roads, because it provides for carrying the mails; then, after that, gentlemen may say that it must be referred to the Committee on Public Lands, in order that they may report upon that part of the bill which proposes to grant land to the soldiers along the line. Thus you will find, that if the jurisdiction over this matter is taken from the Committee on the Territories, you have no committee to which it is proper to refer the bill. With the same plausibility that the gentleman urges a reference to the Military Committee, you may urge a reference to the Committee on Roads and Canals, to the Committee on the Post Office and Post Roads, to the Committee on Public Lands, and, perhaps, to two or three other committees; and, sir, the whole effect of any reference will be, to kill the bill.

The gentleman wishes for estimates; he wishes to know the cost of the buildings, of the bridges, and boats along the line. Why does he want the estimates, and if he wants them, how is he to get them?

Mr. DAWSON. Call for them.

Mr. DOUGLAS. And where from? Will you call from the vast wilderness, where you have neither an officer nor a soldier, nor an agent of any kind? Or will you send an agent there, and wait till next year for a reply? I apprehend you will wait a longer time than that, before you will have a reply to your call. That is the very thing to which I object. We have not the means to get at the estimate; you have not a man in the nation prepared to make an estimate. And why do you want an estimate? The provision in the bill is, that the troops shall build station houses and posts for themselves with their own hands, out of the materials to be obtained along the route. No matter what the cost is, it does not cost the Government a dollar, for they are to be built out of the material along the line, and by the soldiers themselves, who are to be paid by the compensation provided in the bill. The gentleman talks about the cost of the transportation of the materials which may be needed for building these posts and stations. I perceive that the Committee on Military Affairs do not understand the spirit of the bill. Who ever dreamed of hauling lumber two thousand miles to build a bridge, when you may make an adobe bridge from sun-dried brick, made of the clay found on the very spot? The materials may be taken out of the very bank of the rivers. I fear that if the bill were sent to the Committee on Military Affairs, the Senator from Georgia [Mr. DAWSON] would get the estimates far above four millions of dollars, if he proposed to haul the material across the country for building these bridges, &c., instead of getting the material along the line, and constructing these buildings of adobe brick. I take it, the material may be obtained along the line.

Mr. DAWSON. Can you make ferry-boats of adobe brick?

Mr. DOUGLAS. I know the gentleman is suggesting these inquiries for the purpose of drawing my attention from the provisions of the bill; but I will go through with my course of remark. It so happens that he has not studied the geography of the country. The rule is, and everybody who has seen the prairies knows, that when you approach a stream, you find there is timber skirting its banks. And when you travel across a prairie and see timber rising in front of you, you rest assured that water is near. It so happens that Providence has placed timber near the streams, so that bridges and boats can be constructed for crossing them.

In the same way you go through with all the estimates for which the Senator from Georgia asks. He wishes to know the estimated cost of transportation. Why, sir, this bill provides for dispensing with transportation by compelling these stations to raise their supplies along the line, and thus avoid that enormous expense which is incurred every year by the regular Army for transportation. The gentleman cannot get it out of his head that this is to be conducted upon the extravagant scale upon which the regular Army is conducted, and it is for that reason that I fear to have the bill go to the Committee on Military Affairs, on account of the amount of money which they may think it necessary to provide.

Sir, we show clearly the object of the bill. It is to make a road and protect that road, and all the people who travel upon it or settle along the route. We wish to do it in the best and cheapest possible mode; and we know the best mode is to make it for the interest of the men owning the soil to protect the soil. There is no mode by which you can do it except by a line of settlers from the valley of the Mississippi to the Pacific ocean. That line of settlements can only be formed by making the road and protecting it. You need it for a military road as well as for commercial and domestic purposes. You need it to regulate your intercourse with the Indians, and it is your duty to make it for the protection of those who have already gone there under the protection of your laws.

When you look at this, you will see that all these estimates are unnecessary, because the expenditure is to be met by the men themselves. But the Senator says, these men will have to be engaged in the duties of soldiers, and therefore cannot have time to build themselves houses. Sir, the moment you have one hundred men stationed at a post, the presence of that number operates as a perfect security. Fifty can go on to the next station and raise it, and twenty of those who remain may be engaged in cultivating the soil.

The Senator from Georgia asks how long a time it will take to clear the country, and prepare it for the cultivation of the soil? The gentleman does not happen to live in a prairie country; he is not aware that all the land is already cleared, and therefore ready for the plow at this very moment.

Mr. DAWSON. Does it not take a year to raise a crop, and a year to raise hogs?

Mr. DOUGLAS. That is the very point I was coming to. It will not take a year to raise the hogs, as the Senator appears to anticipate, for I expect that they will drive their horses, their cattle, and their hogs with them, as the emigrants do; whenever they remove for the purpose of taking up a position elsewhere, they invariably drive all the live stock necessary for their use with them, and that stock will be able to support itself on the prairies during the summer, and those very prairies constitute vast meadows on which the grass necessary for the subsistence of the stock during the winter can be cut. The only thing you have to supply, therefore, is a portion of the breadstuffs during part of the first year, until the corn crop can mature. For that reason I suggested that the expenditure for the first year will be greater than for any subsequent year.

But I must remind the Senate again, that the pointing out these objections, and the suggestion of these large expenditures, show us that we are to expect no protection at all; they evince direct, open hostility to that section of country.

The Senator from South Carolina [Mr. BUTLER] points out this expenditure, without taking into consideration the argument that this mode is fifty per cent, cheaper than any that has ever yet been devised and reported on by the Committee on Military Affairs. I want the opponents of this bill to meet the argument. Have they done so? If they do not adopt this system, what system will they adopt? I want again to remind them that every objection, every argument they use, shows clearly that they are predetermined to deprive us of all protection. We wish to understand what line of policy is to be pursued towards us; whether it is simply a choice of means that is to be consulted, or whether we are to be subjected to a denial of all justice. This is the very point which we wish to understand. The Great West demands some protection of this nature; the Pacific coast demands it; the whole nation demands it. Is there a man in this Senate who does not know that to refuse to withhold that protection, is to advocate the disunion of this Republic? Is there a man in this body who does not know that this Union cannot exist unless we have some means—either this road, or a railroad, or some other means of communication, with the Pacific?

I want Senators to meet this broad question, and, if they are opposed to open a communication between the Atlantic and the Pacific, if they are in favor of disunion, let them declare it. Let the people of the United States understand it distinctly. I care not what cause they allege for their course, whether they rest it on the score of economy, or on any other footing. It is true that the protection we ask for will cost money; the protection of the Union costs money in every section. We have expended money freely in Georgia, and in those other States from which this opposition comes; we have expended millions on millions on the coast of the Old Dominion. Never has the great West objected when Virginia asked for one, two, five, or seven millions for the protection of the Old Dominion; and that against an imaginary, anticipated, foreign invasion! But when we of the West ask for protection for ourselves, our women, and children, over whose heads the tomahawk is suspended, we are told that it costs money! Economy is the argument put in contrast with a call for the preservation of life. I think it is time that gentlemen understood the bearings of this question.

I repeat that I do not stand upon the provisions of this bill. Modify them as you please, provided you accomplish the object. Change them as you please. Offer amendments to every section, so that not a line I have written shall remain, and I will accept them, provided you carry out the object of the bill; provided you afford protection to emigrants and settlers, and open a communication with the Pacific.

Mr. BUTLER. I wish to say a word or two in explanation and in answer to the Senator from Illinois, before dismissing this subject, for I am not prepared to vote upon it now. I told him candidly that I had not the information to enable me to vote intelligently upon it at this time.

Mr. DOUGLAS. I am willing to accede to the request of the Senator to postpone the consideration of the bill until some day named by him.

Mr. BUTLER. I have not considered the provisions of the bill. It struck me as a remarkable bill, however, and one which broaches a new policy; and in that I am entirely correct. The Senator from Illinois has repeated the words, "Will you deny us protection?" I think the word "protection" has been very often repeated, as though I had denied the power or right of every Government, and this Government especially, to protect its citizens in the enjoyment of life and property. But how is the Government to afford that protection? Are you to have guardians for every man, woman, and child, who chooses to leave one part of the country to go to another? That would be one mode of protection. Are you to afford a military escort for the traveler from one part of the country to another? In every instance the protection which is to be afforded to every people by their Government, is the protection of the law. The protection by the Army, of course, may be in enforcement of the law. You organize a territorial government. For what? To give your people protection. You have an army. For what purpose? To give your people protection. If the Senator from Illinois will convince me that this is the best mode of increasing the Army—and heretofore protection has been afforded to our citizens and emigrants going abroad, by the law, and by the Army, by the war-power—I may look with favor upon his proposition. But this is the commencement of a new policy, that, under the guise of regulating emigration, or promoting the Union, is to be adopted! Sir, I shall not be surprised shortly to see some bill introduced into this body to hasten the millennium, [laughter,] some specific measure; and I have no doubt money would be one of the measures for hastening the millennium. [Continued laughter.] What declamation would you hear then! What fruitful themes for declamation the Union supplies!

But when the honorable Senator from Illinois rises and proposes a measure here, he must take the responsibility of satisfying the body that the measure is proper in itself. He has no right to retort on those who oppose it, that they have not satisfied him that their objections are valid. That is no mode of treating a proposition of this kind. He must satisfy me upon his responsibility, as a statesman and a politician, that the measure is right. I have a right, and we all have a right, to make every objection we can, until we have sufficient reasons to satisfy the body that the measure is proper, and ought to be adopted. He should satisfy us that this is the best mode of increasing the Army—if it is necessary to increase it three thousand men—for the purpose of protecting our emigrants or settlers against the Indians. That protection has heretofore been extended by the sword, and by an army under the command of the Government; but to make roads, and bridges, and ferries, and plant corn-fields, to enable your emigrants to go from one part of the country to another, has never been done from the beginning of the Government to this time. That is a form which protection has never assumed. The only protection that many have had has been by going in bodies and protecting themselves, or they have had the ordinary protection from the Army, or from the laws. Adventurers who go from one part of the country to another must devise means for protection to some extent—not entirely, I admit; but I am opposed to making the Government the guardian of every one. I like the principle of the common law; let every man protect himself to some extent; but when he cannot do it, give him the protection of the law and of the Army; but to make a road, and plant corn-fields, and do all this, is a new mode of giving protection. It is, to be sure, feeding our people at the expense of the Treasury.

I am not prepared to vote upon the bill now. I should desire time to be convinced in regard to its details. I do not say that I am opposed to it entirely; but I must retort upon my friend, when he tells me that I have made objections which he cannot understand and does not think valid, that I expect him, as the author of the measure, to satisfy me, and all those who act with me, in regard to its provisions.

Mr. DOUGLAS. To what time does the Senator desire the bill to be postponed?

Mr. BUTLER. I should like four or five days, to converse with the Senator or some other person on the subject.

Mr. DOUGLAS. I am willing to postpone the further consideration of the bill for a week—say until next Tuesday.

Mr. BUTLER. I move to postpone it until this day week.

Mr. BORLAND. I have a few words to say, not so much against the postponement—though I am prepared to act upon the bill speedily—as in response to a suggestion of my friend from South Carolina, [Mr. BUTLER,] which looked a little like shifting me from my position in supporting a measure which I have taken some trouble to uphold. He thought, from the rule of action by which I seemed to be governed in this case, that I might, without inconsistency, go over to the support of the Collins line of steamers. If he, or any of the advocates of the Collins line, or of any other measure, can show me that it stands on a foundation similar to this, I will go for it at once and without hesitation. But the Senator treated it as a most amazing proposition that we should undertake to protect emigrants going from one portion of our country to another, and asked if we were to appoint a guardian for every man, woman, and child who chooses to move from one region of the country to another? He says he is willing to put them under the protection of law and the army.

Mr. BUTLER. It has never been done otherwise.

Mr. BORLAND. Now, let me ask if this bill proposes to do any more for the persons who, for commerce or for any other purpose, seek a new home in our own territory—even if we do pay three or four millions a year—than we pay now, and have paid from the foundation of the Government, in protecting those who, for purposes of commerce, or any other purpose, choose to leave our borders and go into foreign countries? For what do we keep up a Navy? An American citizen chooses to build a ship, and load it with commodities for purposes of speculation or pleasure, and go thousands of miles across the ocean, perhaps into regions now unknown, and discover new territories with which to trade or reside. Let him be subjected to an outrage there—let his rights of person or property be infringed, and what is the consequence? What has already been acknowledged as the obligation of this Government is to send armed ships there, and seek redress for the injury received in person or property; and for the purpose of doing that, and of being always ready to do it, we are now paying $8,000,000 a year to maintain a Navy.

If, for the purpose of protecting our citizens who, for commerce or for pleasure, or any other purpose, often leave our own shores and go thousands of miles across the ocean, we are bound to maintain a Navy, at an expense of eight millions of dollars a year, I ask the Senator how can he object when we propose—even at the extravagant estimate which he has made of four millions a year—to protect our citizens, men, women, and children, who choose to seek new homes on our own soil, and in pursuance, too, of the policy which this Government has adopted, and has been carrying out for years, of acquiring new territory, and inviting and encouraging its settlement by the enactment of liberal laws? How can we refuse protection to these, while we are giving every day to another class of our people who are better able to protect themselves, and are certainly no more entitled to protection?

As to the estimate which has been made, that it will cost four millions a year to carry out the objects of this bill, I know it is extravagant, but I shall not undertake to discuss it now. I presume the further consideration of the subject will be postponed until a future day. In the mean time I will look into it, and if it shall become necessary, I think I shall be able to show by figures which no one can dispute, that the proposition can be carried out at an expense not only far below that which Senators opposing it have suggested, but at such a reduction upon the present expenditures for military services intended for the same purpose, but which serve no good purpose whatever.

Mr. BELL. I understand the motion pending is to postpone the further consideration of the bill. I do not wish to discuss the subject now, but I was about to suggest to the friends of the measure—and I beg leave to say that I do not know but that I shall be one myself when I come to understand the practicability and extent of the objects proposed to be attained by it—whether we could not get some advantage by committing it, as was proposed, to the Committee on Military Affairs in the mean time. I have spoken to the chairman of that committee [Mr. SHIELDS] on this subject, and he says truly, with the other Senator from Illinois, [Mr. DOUGLAS,] that it is a matter which does not admit of definite estimates; still I beg leave to suggest that there are some branches of information which would essentially aid us in coming to a proper conclusion, and if we postpone it that that committee might give us some very valuable information upon the subject. For example, I think we want topographical information, and I presume it is more readily within their means and convenience to present it to the Senate than any other committee. I suppose the various reports of exploring parties, of engineers and others who have made reports to the Department, could be collected, and some valuable information be brought before the Senate by a little attention and industry on the part of the committee. I think it important to ascertain whether the objects stated by the honorable Senator from Illinois are practicable. I have not, to be sure, very thoroughly studied the geography of the country as stated by the honorable Senator; but is it possible to effect the plan of protection which the honorable Senator proposes? I think we want light on that subject. My general information upon the subject teaches me that we have about five hundred miles of sterile desert crossing streams in which there is but a very slight margin of vegetation; and the suggestions thrown out by the honorable Senator, it seems to me—unless we have more information than I have on the subject—are not practicable with regard to one of the most exposed portions of the route; for example, the route on which the cattle and horses, not only of the military force, but of the emigrant parties are in danger every year of perishing on account of a deficiency of grass on the road, for although grass does spring up on the plain from our western borders to the Rocky Mountains, yet it is sparse. This is a part of the subject on which information could be furnished by the Military Committee, and I should like to see it.

Mr. DOUGLAS. I would suggest that all the information on that subject that can be furnished, is printed by the Senate, and in the hands of everybody, in the report of Colonel Fremont, who encamped, night after night, on this very route.

Mr. BELL. Is that the route proposed in the bill?

Mr. DOUGLAS. Yes, sir.

Mr. BELL. And it is supposed to be practicable to establish large posts, one hundred miles from each other, and intervening posts, twenty miles distant, between the main points?

Mr. DOUGLAS. Yes, sir.

Mr. BELL. Then there is another point upon which we might get the information condensed. We have not time to look into the reports, made by the exploring parties, within the time that the gentleman thinks we ought to act upon the bill. He proposes to establish settlements for cultivation at various points. Is there such a soil on the route as to admit of that? The prairies, over which the road is proposed to pass, are not the rich prairies of Illinois, Iowa, or a part of Missouri. I understand they are of a very different character. I should like to have some condensed report on that subject. It could be extracted readily. If the posts are to be sustained by cultivation at the points where they are to be established, it is an important question whether or not the country is fertile enough for the purpose of forming the nucleus of a settlement. If it be practicable, the object is a worthy and a noble one; but I beg leave to propose now to the honorable Senator from Illinois the question—and I would like him to answer it if he is prepared—whether he expects any such line of posts as this would be a sufficient communication overland—sufficient military communication for the still greater ulterior purpose of holding the two great sections of this country together? How would that facilitate the passage of armies? It would only subsidize the soldiers themselves, and would not even supply provisions to emigrants; and when we want to transport troops and munitions of war, does not the whole project fall far short of the greater object of opening a communication? In that point of view, it is important to ascertain if we can make an approximate estimate of the cost of the undertaking, and if it will cost three or four millions a year, (and I think it cannot cost less than three millions the first year,) in reference to that, another question arises, whether this plan would be the cheapest? The honorable Senator says it is the cheapest plan, and the best one united. If it will cost three or four millions the first year, and two or three millions the second, had we not better commence at once a great mode of communication by railroad or plank road, or some other means which would enable us, with sufficient facility and cheapness, to keep up the communication, and hold the two grand sections of the Union together, and protect the western frontier? These military posts, it seems to me, will not accomplish that object. They are to be temporary. They are to give protection to the emigrant, but they open no such communication as the country will demand, between the Atlantic and the Pacific coasts, and must demand before a great while, particularly, as the Senator suggests, if we should be involved in a war with any powerful maritime nation abroad. If it is to cost us ten millions of dollars in three years, as some gentlemen sincerely believe,—and others think it will cost more,—would it not be more advantageous to employ that immense sum in the commencement in making a railroad from our western borders to the base of the Rocky Mountains? That ten millions would make such a road. Would it not be cheapest to commence at once some great communication of this kind? These are all subjects which do not seem now to be settled definitely, but they are worthy to be considered.

Another suggestion: The honorable Senator proposes to make these posts—these three thousand men to be stationed along a line of two thousand miles—for the protection of emigrants, and he says there are twenty thousand on the route now—some gentlemen suggest thirty thousand. I have heard of no depredations committed by the Indians on them this year. The emigrants are only upon the route about four months in the year; but the bill proposes to establish and keep upon that line three thousand men through the whole year. There are eight months in the year when they are not necessary for the protection of the emigrants. As I understand it, about four months complete the travel by emigration from the western part of the frontier to the settlements in our western Territories. I may be mistaken in that, but it is my impression. In the mean time the three thousand men, and not only the men, but their three thousand horses must be subsisted.

Has the honorable Senator taken into his calculations the estimate that such a force alone will absorb the subsistence upon which the cattle and the horses of the emigrants themselves must depend? The grass upon that desert of five hundred miles, on this side of the Rocky Mountains, does not spring up luxuriant and rich as it does in Illinois, Iowa, or Missouri. It is scant for a large portion at all seasons, and even the emigrants are detained on their journey, and their beasts of burden die for want of a sufficient supply of grass—at least such are the accounts I have seen.

If the bill is postponed, I beg leave to suggest whether it would not be profitable to the whole Senate to send it to the Committee on Military Affairs, so that we may have the necessary information condensed and presented to us—or let it be recommended to the Committee on the Territories for that purpose. I care not to which it is sent, provided this information is obtained. I do not think it sufficient for the honorable Senator from Illinois to say that every gentleman can examine the voluminous reports made on this subject, giving an account of the various explorations made on the line. I think it is ordinarily the duty of the committee which brings in such a measure to present it in such a shape that Senators who are occupied particularly in the investigation of other matters which are before their respective committees may see at a bird's-eye-view the whole subject as far as there is any information to be obtained in regard to it. I merely suggest that we might have such a report at the time to which it is proposed to postpone the further consideration of the bill.

Mr. BRADBURY. Mr. President, it is admitted on all hands that this is a very important measure, necessarily attended with very great expense. I have not seen, as yet, any urgent necessity for it demonstrated. It is said that it is to give protection to the emigrants, who are passing to the Pacific. Now, I would like to hear from the honorable Senators who have advocated the bill, the extent of the depredations that have recently been committed by the Indians upon the emigrants. I think that some year or two ago, forty-seven thousand emigrants passed Fort Laramie in a single year. That was probably a larger number than usually pass; and I am not in possession of facts which show that any considerable number, or any of them, fell victims to the savages. It is possible that the Indians may have committed some depredations; it is possible they may have committed some murders; but I think the number has been unusually small, and that the security with which the emigrants pass through the Indian territory, exceeds that which border settlers have usually enjoyed.

I think that before so important a measure as this receives the sanction of the Senate, we ought to have some distinct data, showing definitely an urgent and imperative necessity for it. It is urged that we should establish a line of communication with our possessions on the Pacific, if we would hold them. Such a line of communication is essential. I believe there is great force in this suggestion; but telegraphic communication is the last mode to answer that purpose. If we would connect ourselves with our western possessions, and bind them to us so as to hold them permanently, it must be by a railroad. In the first place, it would be utterly impracticable to maintain and keep up a line of communication by telegraph. The distance is some two thousand miles, and how liable it would be to interruptions, extending for such a distance, from accident and from design, when passing through a country occupied by numerous tribes of mischievous and hostile Indians. When interrupted, how is it to be restored? How are you to ascertain the point where the wire is broken, and to repair it without serious delay? Then the extremes are so remote, and the intermediate stations so far from each other. All this will be attended with very great practical difficulty. Who is to maintain and operate the stations along the line? Is the military force to do it? It is obvious, I think, that telegraphic communication is peculiarly adapted for, and can only be safely sustained through a settled country, and not a wilderness like this.

Again, regarding a railroad to the Pacific as essential, if we would hold our possessions on that coast, I object to this bill as a measure that would embarrass, and probably defeat, the railroad, by absorbing the means necessary for that purpose. The connection should be across the continent, and by continuous permanent settlements along the whole line, uniting the East and the West, with the means of rapid and easy communication. This can be effected only by a railroad. Such a road would furnish not only the means of conveying intelligence, but of carrying the products of settlers to a market, and bringing back their supplies, and thus enabling them to settle in these interior regions. It would settle the country. Now it is well known that the means by which a railroad must be built, is the public land along the line.

This bill proposes to absorb that means, and is therefore antagonistic to a railroad. It provides that each one of the three thousand troops that are to be raised, should have, in addition to the pay and emoluments of mounted riflemen, six hundred and forty acres of land apiece. This would be selected along the line, and of course the best land would be taken, and you would thus absorb the means that may prove essential for carrying forward successfully the great and important measure of a railroad.

Again, there is a serious objection on the ground of expense. It is not a trivial affair to maintain three thousand mounted troops at points so remote, where, as has already been shown by the honorable Senator from Tennessee, there are long distances where the supplies for men and horses must be transported. We find, too, that when we increase the army, it is difficult to reduce it again; and if these men are raised, I fear the increase will be permanent. It is said, I know, that at the expiration of three years these troops can be disbanded. In such case they will be either settled along the line, or they will return to their homes again. Now, I would like to ask gentlemen practically acquainted with matters of this character, whether it would not be more difficult and more expensive at the end of three years, if this military force should be disbanded, to protect the disbanded men than the emigrants who are now traveling along that line? We will then have a narrow line of settlements of two thousand miles in extent. They will be entitled to protection. They can truly say they were invited by the Government to occupy these remote, isolated positions—they can say that the Government has withdrawn its aid and support from them, and that they have a necessity to apply their exertions and labors to support themselves and families, and that therefore they ask military posts to be established along the line for their protection, unless they can be under pay for protecting themselves. Their protection would cost much more, I apprehend, than that of the emigrants who now pass through the country.

Mr. BORLAND. The Senator suggested just now, if I understood him, that he was in favor of building a railroad across that desert country. He objects to the necessity for military protection to those settlers along that line at the end of three years. I wish to ask him if he thinks it would cost more to protect these settlers than it would to protect a railroad along a course of one thousand or fifteen hundred miles, with no settlements at all?

Mr. BRADBURY. I will answer the honorable Senator. When a railroad is established, we furnish the means of communication which will establish a permanent and large line of settlements the whole distance. By means of a railroad the farmer can bring his produce to market. You establish that which will be a benefit to settlers, and enable them to sustain and protect themselves; for they can go there in large numbers, and in this respect you have the great advantage of a railroad over a telegraphic line. I presume the honorable Senator does not suppose that the farmers are to transport their produce to market along the telegraphic line. It is for this reason that a railroad will lead to permanent and large settlements from the Atlantic to the Pacific, and will bind the two portions of the Union together, which a telegraph cannot do. It is for this reason that I fear, if this measure is adopted, you will defeat one which will be of substantial, permanent, and national benefit.

The PRESIDING OFFICER, (Mr. BRIGHT.) The question is on the motion to postpone the further consideration of the bill till Tuesday next, and make it the special order for that day.

Mr. RUSK. I hope it will not be made the special order. It will then stand in the way of other business.

Mr. HALE. I ask a division of the question. The PRESIDING OFFICER. Then the question will first be on the motion to postpone.

Mr. DOUGLAS. I feel authorized to modify the motion so as to postpone the consideration of the bill for a week without making it the special order.

The motion to postpone was agreed to.

RATES OF POSTAGE.

A message was received from the House of Representatives by Mr. FORNEY, its Clerk, announcing that it had passed a bill to amend an act entitled "An act to reduce and modify the rates of postage within the United States, and for other purposes," approved March 3d, 1851.

On motion, the Senate adjourned.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

TUESDAY, July 13, 1852.

The House met at eleven o'clock, a. m. Prayer by the Rev. C. M. BUTLER.

The Journal of yesterday was read and approved.

The SPEAKER. The business first in order is the further consideration of House bill No. 144, to amend an act entitled "An act to reduce and modify the rates of postage in the United States, and for other purposes."

LAND DISTRICTS IN IOWA.

Mr. HENN. I ask the unanimous consent of the House to take up Senate bill No. 478, now upon the Speaker's table, "to create three additional land districts in the State of Iowa," and to have it considered at this time before proceeding to the execution of the special order.

Mr. JOHNSON, of Georgia. Is it the intention of the gentleman to have the bill referred, or to put it upon its passage?

Mr. HENN. I desire to put it upon its passage. I will state to the gentleman from Georgia that the Committee on Public Lands of the House have agreed to a bill precisely in the same words as this bill which has passed the Senate. It is very important that this bill should pass before any proclamation is got out for the sale of the lands in the western portion of the State of Iowa.

Mr. JOHNSON. I should be very happy to accommodate the gentleman from Iowa; but I must insist on the regular order of business.

Mr. HENN. The bill will not occupy more than five minutes, and I hope the gentleman will withdraw his objection to it.

Mr. JOHNSON. I cannot withdraw it.

CALIFORNIA BATTALION.

Mr. McCORKLE. I have an indulgence to ask of the House, in reference to a very important matter, which I think no gentleman will object to when I state what it is. I ask the unanimous consent of the House to take up from the Speaker's table a bill which provides for the appointment of three commissioners from the Army to adjust, examine, and report to the next Congress upon the claim of the California battalion—a battalion who served in California during the Mexican war, and who subsisted themselves and purchased their own arms.

Mr. JOHNSON, of Georgia. I object, and insist on the regular order of business.

Mr. McCORKLE. If the gentleman will hear the facts, I think he will withdraw his objection.

Mr. CLINGMAN. I should like to know what is the regular order of business?

The SPEAKER. The further consideration of House bill No. 144, reported from the Committee on the Post Office and Post Roads.

Mr. CLINGMAN. [Well, sir, the regular order of business has been insisted on by my friend from Georgia, [Mr. JOHNSON.] I have no objection to this discussion if it is to come out of the morning hour, but otherwise I must object to it.

Mr. OLDS. I object to it if it is to come out of the morning hour.

Mr. JOHNSON. I insist on the regular order of business.

On motion by Mr. HUNTER, by unanimous consent,

Ordered, That the petition and papers of Henry Pauling be withdrawn from the files of the House, and referred to the Committee on Claims.

RATES OF POSTAGE ON NEWSPAPERS.

The SPEAKER. The regular order of business is the further consideration of House bill No. 144, to amend an act entitled "An act to modify and reduce the rates of postage in the United States, and for other purposes," and the pending question is on the amendment offered by the gentleman from Ohio, [Mr. DISNEY.]

The amendment was read as follows:

And be it further enacted, In all cases of publication of the uncalled for German letters, it shall be the duty of the Postmaster General to cause such publication to be made in the German newspaper having the largest circulation in the vicinity, such publication to be governed in every respect by the provisions of the law in relation to the publication of uncalled for letters in the English language.

Mr. DISNEY. At the suggestion of several gentlemen, and with a view of making the amendment broader, so as to embrace all other languages, I will modify my amendment so as to read as follows:

That when a list of uncalled for letters shall be published in any newspaper printed in any foreign language, said list shall be published in such newspaper having the largest circulation within the range of delivery of said office.

The SPEAKER. If there be no objection, the gentleman will be allowed to modify his amendment.

No objection was made.

The SPEAKER. Upon this amendment the yeas and nays have been ordered.

Mr. OLDS. I hope the call for the yeas and nays will be withdrawn.

The SPEAKER. That can only be done by unanimous consent.

There being no objection, the yeas and nays were withdrawn.

The question was then taken on Mr. DISNEY's amendment, and it was agreed to.

There being no further amendment to the bill, it was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time; and was subsequently read the third time.

The bill as amended was read through by the Clerk.

Mr. BROOKS. Has the previous question exhausted itself yet?

The SPEAKER. It has.

Mr. BROOKS. I am about to move for the recommitment of this bill to the Committee on the Post Office and Post Roads, with some instructions, which I hope will meet with the approbation of the House. I would not make the motion if, upon this question of the weight of two and a half ounces, as reported in the original bill, there had been a fair vote. It will be remembered that two and a half ounces was the weight originally agreed upon by the committee, but it was subsequently altered. On taking a vote in the House on maintaining the original proposition of the committee—two and a half ounces—there was a majority of the House in favor of it; but it was necessary to make a quorum, and members voting blindly to constitute that quorum, reversed that majority into a minority. It is for that reason that I claim the indulgence of the House in asking for the recommitment of the bill, which is now the only way left to obtain a true vote upon the principle on which I wish to divide the House.

Mr. Speaker, it is quite unnecessary for me to repeat the arguments that I advanced the other day on this subject, because those arguments have been repeated on the other side of the House, as well as upon this. The principle on which I oppose this bill is, that this limitation of the weight of periodicals and newspapers to two ounces, as it now stands in this bill, is a premium for bad printing and for a bad quality of paper—a retrograde in the art of printing, and a discouragement of all printing.

It is said that newspapers of the present size will come within two ounces. But it is the policy of this country, or it ought to be the policy of this country, to encourage printers to print as large newspapers as possible, containing the largest possible amount of reading matter, provided they can do it for a given sum of money. This bill as it now stands reverses that policy, and it offers a premium for the printing of newspapers upon paper of bad quality and of low weight, and in that way would result in great injury to the community.

I voted for the amendment of the gentleman from Maine, [Mr. WASHBURN.] because it bettered the bill somewhat; but the principle which we have incorporated in the bill, by the adoption of that amendment, is a vicious principle; its whole tendency is to confine the circulation of papers published in one State to that State, and to that State only. Its whole tendency will be sectional; to make the people of one State know only the politics of that State, and the politics of no other State; and to prejudice the people of one State against taking papers published in another State. For instance, the people of the States of New York and Pennsylvania can have the benefit of the papers published in the cities of New York and Philadelphia; but the moment those papers pass into New Jersey or Delaware the postage is enhanced, because they are carried half a mile across the Hudson river into New Jersey, and fifteen or twenty miles to the Connecticut line on the other side. And in the same way, papers published in Cincinnati cannot be taken into the State of Kentucky without an enhancement of the postage. The States are considered separate nations by this bill, having no right to take the papers published in each other.

The motion I propose to submit now is to recommit this bill to the Committee on the Post Office and Post Roads, with instructions "to report a bill not raising the rates of postage on newspapers under one thousand miles, or limiting the weight of newspapers or periodicals beyond the existing law."

I remarked the other day that this bill did, in fact, increase the rates of postage on newspapers under one thousand miles. I think I demonstrated that, and it is not necessary to repeat the argument. I therefore propose to instruct the committee to report a bill not raising the rates of postage on newspapers under a thousand miles. The maximum weight of newspapers under the present law is three ounces. This bill makes it two ounces.

Mr. JONES, of Tennessee. I rise to a question of order. Was not the previous question ordered on this bill?

The SPEAKER. Not upon its passage.

Mr. JONES. Has the bill been engrossed?

The SPEAKER. It has.

Mr. JONES. Then no amendment is in order.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from New York proposes to recommit the bill with certain instructions.

Mr. JONES. The committee cannot amend the bill now.

Mr. BROOKS. We can commit the bill with instructions. I was remarking, when I was interrupted, that under the existing law the maximum weight of newspapers is three ounces. This bill proposes to make the maximum two ounces. The second branch of the instructions, therefore, directs the committee to report a bill not limiting the weight of newspapers and periodicals beyond the existing law. I now ask for the previous question on my motion, upon which I shall call for the yeas and nays.

The SPEAKER. Upon that proposition the previous question has been demanded.

Mr. OLDS. I merely rise to ask the question whether the rule allowing an hour's speech after the previous question has been ordered, would allow me to reply to the gentleman from New York, [Mr. Brooks,] as I reported the bill? I have not yet occupied that hour. I will say to the House, however, that I do not want five minutes.

The SPEAKER. The Chair thinks the gentleman has a right to address the House.

Mr. JONES, of Tennessee. I submit the question to the Chair, whether the instructions are in order or not? The bill is certainly not amendable here, and the gentleman from New York cannot move to recommit this bill with instructions to report another bill.

Mr. BROOKS. I do not propose to do that. I have the right, under the one hundred and forty-sixth rule, to move its recommitment, whether it can be amended or not. I moved to recommit with instructions.

Mr. JONES. The bill is engrossed, and cannot be amended.

The SPEAKER. The one hundred and twentieth rule is this:

"After commitment and report thereof to the House, at any time before its passage, a bill may be recommitted."

Mr. JONES. Exactly; but not with instructions to amend.

The SPEAKER. The Chair thinks that would follow as a matter of course, as one of the objects for which a bill is to be recommitted.

Mr. JONES. We cannot amend it here, and certainly we cannot give instructions to a committee to do what we cannot do. It seems to me that the only mode to attain that object now, is to reconsider.

The SPEAKER. There is a general power to instruct committees, and the gentleman will not, I suppose, deny that the committee itself may amend after it is recommitted. There is, then, a general power, the Chair again remarks to the House, to instruct its committees, and the Chair is therefore inclined to think the instructions are in order.

Mr. CLINGMAN. Such has been the uniform practice of the House.

The previous question then received a second, and the main question was ordered to be put.

Mr. OLDS. I desire only to occupy a few moments of the time of the House, in reply to the suggestions of the gentleman from New York, [Mr. Brooks.] I am satisfied that this opposition upon the part of the city press is becoming almost factious towards this bill. I believe the opposition to be entirely confined to that interest. Now, sir, what are the facts? This bill does not raise the postage upon papers that circulate within the county—it entitles them to go free; and it goes beyond the old law, because it provides that they may go to a post office out of the county, provided the subscriber lives in the county, which is not the case with the existing postage law.

Thus far, then, this bill does not increase the postage. Then, this bill does not increase the postage within the State where the paper or periodical is published, because the provision introduced by the gentleman from Maine, [Mr. Washburn,] which was assented to by the House, allows them to circulate within the State at the minimum rate fixed in the bill, which is a very low one indeed, being only half a cent upon a paper weighing two ounces. Now, sir, what is really the provisions of this bill of which the gentleman complains? It is not true, as the gentleman says, that it increases the rate of postage upon all distances up to a thousand miles. It does not increase the postage for distances between five hundred and fifteen hundred miles. It does, perhaps, increase the rate in some degree under five hundred miles.

But, sir, ought this increase to be a subject of complaint? Is it a hardship for a gentleman who takes the New York Express double sheet, living in New Orleans, that he shall be compelled to pay one cent postage for the transmission of that paper through the mail of the United States? Is that a great hardship, sir?—such a one as the city press ought to complain of? And yet that is precisely the rate of postage fixed in this bill. The double sheet New York Express, New York Herald, and New York Tribune, can go from the city of New York to Galveston, Texas, for one cent postage. And if that is a hardship, I do not know what there is they cannot complain of as a hardship.

But we are compelled to look a little to the revenues of the office. I should be willing to reduce the rates of postage not only upon letters, but upon papers, still lower than they are now, if such could be done with due regard to the interests of the country and the revenues of the Post Office Department. But so long as you permit your franking privilege to exist, you cannot reduce the postage upon letters and upon newspapers as low as it really ought to be. The amount of circulation of free papers, and of exchange papers, is enormous; and I will venture the assertion, that of all the newspapers delivered from the post office in the city of New York, not one half pay any postage at all. Yes, sir, I am prepared to say that more than one half are delivered at that office without the payment of any postage. It will still be so under this law.

Mr. BROOKS, (interrupting.) I would ask the gentleman if, under this law, it would not cost a cent to send a newspaper from Cincinnati to Covington, just across the river, in Kentucky?

Mr. OLDS. It is so under the old law. It is impossible to fix upon any rule that will do equal and exact justice to all men. Under any general rule you may lay down there must be cases of peculiar hardship. You have to fix a line somewhere. You had to fix it under the old law, and you must fix it under the new.

I was about to remark, that I would be glad to reduce the postage upon newspapers still lower. I do not wish to cripple the press, or decrease the dissemination of intelligence throughout the country; but in order to reduce the postage either upon letters or printed matter, you must consent to do away with your franking privilege. Are gentlemen prepared to do this? For one, sir, I am willing to come up to the mark.

In Great Britain, a member of Parliament, the Queen of Great Britain herself, or the Postmaster General of England, cannot frank a letter. This is a privilege that has grown up in this country, fastened on the post office system of the country, and unless you dispense with it, you are obliged to raise the postage upon letters and papers received by the people of the country. It is a necessary consequence of the franking privilege, enjoyed by members of Congress and others.

Now, I am willing to have as low a system of postage as possibly can be established consistent with a proper regard to the revenues of the Post Office Department. This bill will increase the revenues, and it will work no hardships at all to the circulation of newspapers, and the dissemination of knowledge through the country. It is not such a tax as will be burdensome to the people. I will ask you, sir, suppose you reduce the rates of postage still lower, in accordance with the provisions of the motion submitted by the gentleman from New York [Mr. Brooks] to recommit with instructions, what will be the consequence? Why, sir, you will have to increase the tax upon the people of the country to raise a higher revenue to defray the expenses of the Post Office Department. You have already found that you have to appropriate a million and a half of dollars, and perhaps two millions of dollars, to sustain the Post Office Department, and in that, sir, you do not take into consideration your ocean mail service. The appropriation you make to E. K. Collins is not a charge upon the Post Office Department. The Aspinwall line and the Bremen and Havre lines are not a charge upon that Department. Leaving the whole of the ocean mail service out of the calculation, and yet you have to appropriate more than a million and a half of dollars to support your present postal facilities; and yet the gentleman from New York, [Mr. Brooks,] to sustain the interest of the city press, asks for a greater reduction of the postage upon city papers. Let me not be misunderstood, Mr. Speaker. I have no hostile feeling against the city press. I wish them well, and trust they may double their country circulation annually. But my position as chairman of the Committee on the Post Office and Post Roads, compels me to look to the interest of the whole country. I should be derelict in duty did I not look to the revenues of the Post Office Department, and, as far as in my power, avert the imposition of increased taxes upon the people.

Believing, as I honestly do, that the bill, in the shape in which you now have it, will meet the wants and the approbation of the country, I trust that the motion to recommit will not prevail, and that the bill will be suffered to pass in the form in which it now is without further delay.

Mr. BROOKS. I call for the yeas and nays upon my motion.

Mr. HART demanded tellers upon the yeas and nays; which were ordered; and Messrs. HART and SAVAGE were appointed.

The House was then divided, and the tellers reported—ayes 36, noes 92.

So the yeas and nays were ordered.

The question was then taken upon the motion to recommit the bill with instructions, and it was disagreed to—yeas 33, nays 133; as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Abneromble, John H. Boyd, Briggs, Brooks, George H. Brown, Carter, Chandler, Clingman, George T. Davis, Evans, Giddings, Hart, Haws, Henn, Horsford, John W. Howe, Jenkins, James Johnson, Daniel T. Jones, Mann, Martin, McCorkle, Henry D. Moore, John Moore, Newton, Sackett, David L. Seymour, Skelton, Stanley, Abraham P. Stephens, Sutherland, Wallace, and Walsh—33.

NAYS—Messrs. Aiken, Allison, Averett, Babcock, David J. Bailey, Barrere, Beale, Bell, Bingham, Bissell, Bragg, Brenton, Buell, Burrows, Burt, Busby, Joseph Cable, Caldwell, Lewis D. Campbell, Thompson Campbell, Caskie, Chapman, Chastain, Cobb, Daniel, John G. Davis, Dawson, Dean, Dimmick, Disney, Dockery, Doty, Duncan, Dunham, Durkee, Edgerton, Edmundson, Ewing, Faulkner, Florence, Fowler, Freeman, Thomas J. D. Fuller, Gamble, Gaylord, Gentry, Gilmore, Goodenow, Gorman, Green, Grey, Grow, Hamilton, Hammond, Harper, Isham G. Harris, Sampson W. Harris, Haven, Hendricks, Hibbard, Holladay, Houston, Howard, Thomas M. Howe, Hunter, Ingersoll, Ives, Jackson, Andrew Johnson, John Johnson, Robert W. Johnson, George W. Jones, J. Glancy Jones, Preston King, Kuhns, Kurtz, Letcher, Lockhart, Mace, Edward C. Marshall, Humphrey Marshall, Mason, McLanahan, McQueen, Meade, Millson, Miner, Molony, Murphy, Murray, Nabers, Olds, Orr, Andrew Parker, Samuel W. Parker, Peaslee, Penn, Perkins, Phelps, Powell, Price, Richardson, Riddle, Robbins, Robie, Robinson, Ross, Savage, Schermerhorn, Schoolcraft, Scurry, Origen S. Seymour, Smith, Benjamin Stanton, Richard H. Stanton, Thaddeus Stevens, St. Martin, Stuart, Sweetser, Taylor, Thurston, Townshend, Venable, Walbridge, Ward, Watkins, Welch, Alexander White, Wilcox, Wildrick, Williams, Woodward, and Yates—133.

So the House refused to recommit the bill.

[Mr. BARRERE, from the Committee on Enrolled Bills, reported as correctly enrolled "A joint resolution for the relief of Elizabeth F. Thurston, of the Territory of Oregon;" which received the signature of the Speaker.]

The question now being, Shall the bill pass? it was put and agreed to.

So the bill was passed.

Mr. OLDS moved a reconsideration of the vote on the passage of the bill, and to lay the motion to reconsider upon the table; which latter motion was agreed to.

SPRINGFIELD AND TERRE HAUTE RAILROAD.

The SPEAKER. The business next in order is the consideration of House bill No. 289, entitled "A bill granting the right of way and a portion of the public lands to the States of Indiana and Illinois to aid in the construction of a railroad from Springfield, Illinois, to Terre Haute, Indiana." The gentleman from Indiana [Mr. DAVIS] is entitled to the floor.

Mr. DAVIS, of Indiana, took the floor.

Mr. JONES, of Tennessee. If the gentleman will yield the floor, I will move that the consideration of this bill be postponed until to-morrow morning. We cannot get through with it now before the expiration of the morning hour.

Mr. DAVIS. I will yield to the gentleman for the purpose of submitting the motion he has suggested.

Mr. JONES. I then submit the motion that the further consideration of the bill be postponed until to-morrow.

The question was then taken, and it was agreed to.

Mr. COBB. There are three or four other bills in the precise situation of the one, the consideration of which has just been postponed. They will be also, I suppose, postponed until to-morrow. If that is not the understanding, I will move to take one of them up.

Mr. STUART. As there is only three minutes remaining of the morning hour, I suggest that we, by unanimous consent, proceed to the consideration of business in the House. There will be then no difficulty, as the bills to which the gentleman alludes will come up in their proper place.

The SPEAKER. The consideration of these bills having been postponed until to-day, if not acted upon now, will be taken up in their order some other day.

Mr. HOUSTON. I move to take up the deficiency bill, which was reported from the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union yesterday.

The SPEAKER. The morning hour has not expired yet by one minute.

PUBLIC PRINTING.

Mr. GORMAN. I wish to make a report from the Committee on Printing.

The SPEAKER. A report from the Committee on Printing is not in order during the morning hour, which has not yet expired by three quarters of a minute.

Mr. SACKETT. Has not the morning hour now expired?

The SPEAKER. It has.

Mr. GORMAN. I believe I have the floor now.

The SPEAKER. The House on yesterday ordered the main question to be put on the deficiency bill, and the Chair, if called upon to execute the rules rigidly, must decide that that takes precedence over all other propositions.

Mr. JONES, of Tennessee. The main question was not ordered on the deficiency bill. The call for the previous question was seconded, and I then moved that there be a call of the House. In that condition the House adjourned.

Mr. GORMAN. If the main question was not ordered, I am in order.

The SPEAKER. The Chair is now satisfied that the main question was not ordered to be put; but the Chair is not satisfied that the gentleman has a right to make a report unless the House has determined whether or no the main question shall be ordered to be put.

Mr. CABELL, of Florida. I insist upon the regular order of business.

[Cries of "Question!" "Question!"]

The SPEAKER. A motion for the call of the House, which motion the gentleman from Tennessee states he submitted, is not in order after the call for the previous question has been seconded.

Mr. JONES. It is not in order after the main question has been ordered to be put, but it is in order after the call for the previous question has been seconded.

The SPEAKER. A motion for the call of the House is not in order after the call for the previous question has been seconded, by express rule of the House.

Mr. VENABLE demanded the yeas and nays upon ordering the main question to be put; which were ordered.

The question was then taken on ordering the main question to be put, and it was agreed to—yeas 117, nays 52; as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Abercrombie, Thomas H. Bayly, Barrere, Bell, Bibbhaus, Bowne, John H. Boyd, Bragg, Brenton, Briggs, Brooks, George H. Brown, Burrows, Burt, Joseph Cable, Caldwell, Lewis D. Campbell, Carter, Chandler, Chapman, Churchwell, Clingman, Cobb, Conger, Curtis, George T. Davis, John G. Davis, Dawson, Dean, Disney, Doty, Duncan, Evans, Faulkner, Florence, Fowler, Thomas J. D. Fuller, Gamble, Gentry, Giddings, Gilmore, Goodenow, Goodrich, Hammond, Harper, Hart, Haws, Haven, Henn, Horsford, Houston, Howard, John W. Howe, Thomas M. Howe, Thomas Y. How, Hunter, Ingersoll, Ives, John Johnson, Robert W. Johnson, J. Glancy Jones, Kuhns, Kurtz, Lockhart, Mann, Edward C. Marshall, Humphrey Marshall, Martin, Mason, Millson, Miner, Henry D. Moore, John Moore, Morrison, Murray, Nabers, Outlaw, Samuel W. Parker, Perkins, Phelps, Price, Richardson, Riddle, Robbins, Robie, Robinson, Russell, Sackett, Schermerhorn, Schoolcraft, Scudder, David L. Seymour, Origen S. Seymour, Skelton, Smart, Snow, Stanly, Benjamin Stanton, Frederick P. Stanton, Richard H. Stanton, Abraham P. Stephens, Stone, St. Martin, Stuart, Sutherland, Taylor, Thurston, Walsh, Ward, Watkins, Welch, Wells, Alexander White, Wilcox, Wildrick, Williams, Woodward, and Yates—117.

NAYS—Messrs. Willis Allen, Averett, Babcock, Beale, Bobcock, Buell, Thompson Campbell, Chastain, Daniel, Edgerton, Edmundson, Ewing, Floyd, Freeman, Gorman, Green, Grey, Grow, Hamilton, Isham G. Harris, Sampson W. Harris, Hendricks, Hibbard, Hillyer, Holladay, Jackson, Jenkins, Andrew Johnson, Daniel T. Jones, George W. Jones, Letcher, McLanahan, McQueen, Meade, Molony, Morehead, Murphy, Olds, Orr, Andrew Parker, Peaslee, Powell, Ross, Savage, Scurry, Smith, Thaddeus Stevens, Sweetser, Townshend, Venable, Wallace, and Woodward—52.

So the main question was ordered to be put.

Mr. HOUSTON. The motion submitted by me on yesterday to recommit the bill, was made with a view to keep the bill before the House. I would now like the House to give me permission to withdraw that motion, so that we may proceed to vote upon the bill.

There was no objection, and the motion was withdrawn.

The SPEAKER. The amendments of the Senate will be read through, in connection with those of the Committee of the Whole. If it be the pleasure of the House, the amendments to which there is made no objection will be voted upon in a mass.

Mr. AVERETT. This is a very important bill, and as there are only one hundred and sixty members present, for the purpose of getting a fuller House, and as a motion for a call of the House is not now in order, I move an adjournment; and upon which motion I demand the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were refused; and the motion to adjourn was disagreed to.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will now read the amendments of the Senate, and those proposed by the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union in connection.

The Clerk having read the amendments, the following, to which there was no exception, (the action upon which in Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union having been heretofore stated,) were concurred in without a division, viz: Nos. 1, 3, 4, 6, 8, 9, 10, 12, 14, 15, 16, 17, 18, 20, 21, 22, 23, 24, 26, 27, and 29.

The House then proceeded to consider those amendments upon which a separate vote had been asked.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will report those amendments upon which a separate vote was asked:

The second amendment of the Senate was read, as follows:

Page 2, line 26, after the word "dollars," in the clause providing for the temporary clerks in the office of the Third Auditor, strike out the words:

"Provided, That no clerk shall receive more than at the rate of $1,000 per annum under this act."

And insert the following in lieu thereof:

"Which sum shall be distributed among the clerks according to the discretion of the Secretary of the Treasury: Provided, That no salary from this fund shall exceed $1,200 per annum."

This amendment of the Senate was amended in the committee, by inserting after the word "exceed" the words "$1,000 per annum, except two, who shall receive $1,200."

The question now being upon concurring in the amendment of the Committee of the Whole to the Senate amendment—

Mr. ABERCROMBIE demanded the yeas and nays; but they were not ordered.

The question was then taken, and the amendment of the committee was concurred in.

The amendment of the Senate, as amended, was then agreed to.

The fifth amendment of the Senate, upon which a separate vote had been called for, was read, as follows:

Page 5, line 95, after the clause appropriating $80,000 for running and marking the boundary line between the United States and Mexico, according to the treaty of Guadalupe Hidalgo, insert the following:

"Provided, That nothing herein contained shall be so construed as to sanction a departure from the point on the Rio Grande, north of the town called Paso, designated in the said treaty."

The committee had amended this amendment, by striking out the words "from the point on the Rio Grande north of the town called Paso, designated in the said treaty," and inserting, in lieu thereof, the words "from the true line of the treaty," so as to make it read:

"Provided, That nothing herein contained shall be so construed as to sanction a departure from the true line of the treaty."

The question being upon concurring in the amendment of the committee to the Senate's amendment, it was put, and upon a division, there were—yeas 70, nays 76.

Mr. BROOKS demanded the yeas and nays; which were ordered.

The question was then taken, and there were—yeas 73, nays 103; as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Abercrombie, Allison, Barrere, Bell, Bibbhaus, Bowne, John H. Boyd, Brenton, Briggs, Brooks, George H. Brown, Buell, Burrows, E. Carrington Cabell, Joseph Cable, Caldwell, Lewis D. Campbell, Chandler, Chapman, Conger, G. T. Davis, Dockery, Duncan, Evans, Floyd, Fowler, Giddings, Goodenow, Goodrich, Gray, Harper, Haws, Haven, Horsford, John W. Howe, Thomas M. Howe, Thomas Y. How, Hunter, Jenkins, James Johnson, Preston King, Kuhns, Mann, Martin, Miner, Henry D. Moore, Morehead, Outlaw, Andrew Parker, Samuel W. Parker, Perkins, Porter, Reed, Robie, Schermerhorn, Schoolcraft, Scudder, Smart, Snow, Stanly, Benjamin Stanton, Thaddeus Stevens, Taylor, Thurston, Townshend, Walbridge, Walsh, Ward, Washburn, Watkins, Welsh, Alexander White, and Williams—73.

NAYS—Messrs. Aiken, Averett, Babcock, David J. Bailey, Thomas H. Bayly, Beale, Bissell, Bragg, Burt, Bushy, Thompson Campbell, Carter, Caskie, Chastain, Churchwell, Clingman, Cobb, Curtis, Daniel, J. G. Davis, Dawson, Dean, Dinmick, Disney, Doty, Dunham, Edgerton, Edmundson, Faulkner, Florence, Freeman, Thomas J. D. Fuller, Gamble, Gaylord, Gilmore, Gorman, Green, Grow, Hamilton, Hammond, Isham G. Harris, Sampson W. Harris, Hart, Hendricks, Henn, Hibbard, Hillyer, Holladay, Houston, Howard, Ingersoll, Ives, Jackson, Andrew Johnson, John Johnson, Robert W. Johnson, George W. Jones, J. Glancy Jones, Kurtz, Letcher, Lockhart, Edward C. Marshall, Humphrey Marshall, Mason, McCorkle, McLanahan, McQueen, Meade, Molony, Morrison, Murphy, Murray, Nabers, Orr, Peaslee, Penn, Phelps, Powell, Price, Rantoul, Richardson, Riddle, Robbins, Robinson, Ross, Russell, Sackett, Savage, Scurry, David L. Seymour, Origen S. Seymour, Skelton, Smith, Frederick P. Stanton, Richard H. Stanton, Abraham P. Stephens, Stone, Stuart, Sweetser, Venable, Wallace, Wilcox, Wildrick, and Woodward—103.

So the House refused to concur in the amendment of the committee.

The amendment of the Senate was then agreed to, on a division—yeas 91, nays not counted.

The seventh amendment of the Senate, upon which a separate vote had been asked, was then read, as follows:

Insert after line one hundred and eight,
 "For compensation of the Surveyor General of Arkansas, per act of August 8, 1846, $2,000."
 "For clerks in the office of the Surveyor General of Arkansas, per act of August 8, 1846, $6,300."

The question being upon agreeing with the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union, in non-concurring with the Senate in this amendment—

Mr. JOHNSON, of Arkansas. I will ask in what position that amendment is?

The SPEAKER. The Committee of the Whole upon the part of the House propose to strike that amendment out.

Mr. JOHNSON. I would ask permission of the House to make a five minutes explanation in regard to this amendment.

Leave being unanimously granted,

Mr. JOHNSON resumed. I was absent from the city when this amendment was considered in Committee of the Whole. Thus the Senate amendment providing for the payment of a deficiency of salary due to the officers of the surveyor general's land office of Arkansas was stricken out.
 It is money which will have to be paid some time or other. The service was performed, and the chairman of the Ways and Means himself, I believe will say that this money will have to be paid some time or other, and the reason why this provision was stricken out was because the surveyor general's office of Arkansas ought to have been discontinued heretofore.

Mr. HOUSTON. Will the gentleman allow me to make a single remark? There is no doubt about the service; but the question presented to the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union was, that the service was rendered in violation of the action of the last Congress in refusing or declining to put in this appropriation.

Mr. JOHNSON. That is the statement of the gentleman in regard to it. Then I will ask the chairman of the Committee on Ways and Means, if he does acknowledge this fact, that at some time or other the money must be paid?

Mr. HOUSTON. I have no doubt that this money will be paid. I have told gentlemen so here repeatedly. I think the gentleman will agree with me, that the service has been rendered in violation of the law by the Commissioner of Indian Affairs. But he is doing right in endeavoring to get the appropriation for his own State. I believe it will be paid some time or other. I have no objection to its being paid.

Mr. JOHNSON. There is a general law in existence which discontinues the surveyor's office at a certain point. It was recommended at the close of Mr. Polk's administration that the office should be closed, but the next Administration that came in after Mr. Polk's, when their attention was called strictly to the condition of that office and the public surveys, recommended that it should be continued, and the House of Representatives expressly passed a law making an appropriation to continue it. This has been the law. The Thirty-first Congress made that recommendation, and this office has been continued ever since. The officers discharged the duties which were imposed upon them, and there is now an account due them for services rendered which my friend from Alabama [Mr. Houston] acknowledges will be paid some time or other. The Senate provided for it by inserting an amendment which ought never to have been stricken out. It never would have been stricken out if the matter had been properly explained; but I was absent from the city, and there was no one else here to explain it. That is the way the matter stands. I ask that the House will refuse to concur in the amendment of the Committee of the Whole to the Senate amendment, and that they will agree to pay the money due for services rendered in the Surveyor General's office. I will not detain the House any longer.

The question was then put, and the House refused to concur with the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union in striking out the Senate amendment.

The amendment of the Senate was then agreed to.

The eleventh amendment of the Senate (upon which a separate vote was asked) was read, proposing to strike out "$1,000," and insert
 "$1,200," in the proviso of the following clause:

"For compensation of extra clerks employed in the office of the Commissioner of Pensions, $30,000: Provided, That no clerk shall receive more than at the rate of $1,000 per annum under this act."

This amendment was amended by the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union by striking out the proviso of the Senate and inserting the following in lieu thereof:

"Provided, That no clerk shall receive more than at the rate of $1,000 per annum under this act, except two, whose annual salary shall not exceed $1,200."

The question being upon concurring in the amendment of the committee to the Senate's amendment, it was taken by tellers (Messrs. Fuller, of Maine, and Chandler acting as such) and decided in the affirmative—ayes 73, noes 55.

The amendment of the Senate as amended was then agreed to.

The thirteenth amendment of the Senate to the clause providing for the payment of interest on the awards to the Choctaw claimants, upon which a separate vote had been demanded, was read, as follows:

"Provided, That after the 30th day of June, 1852, all payments of interest on said awards shall cease, and that the Secretary of the Interior be, and he is hereby, directed to pay said claimants the amount of principal awarded in each case respectively, and that the amount necessary for this purpose be, and the same is hereby, appropriated: Provided further, That the final payment and satisfaction of said awards shall be first ratified and approved as a final release of all claims of such parties, under the fourteenth article of said treaty, by the proper national authority of the Choctaws, in such form as shall be prescribed by the Secretary of the Interior."

This amendment had been amended by the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union, by inserting after the word "appropriated" the words "not exceeding $872,000."

The question was taken upon the amendment of the committee, and it was agreed to, and then the amendment of the Senate as amended was concurred in.

The first clause of the nineteenth amendment, which had been stricken out by the committee of the Whole on the state of the Union, was read, as follows:

"For contingent expenses of the Senate, $137,775."

The question being on agreeing to this clause—

Mr. JONES demanded the yeas and nays; but they were not ordered.

The question was then put upon agreeing to the amendment of the Senate, and it was decided in the affirmative.

So the amendment was agreed to.

The second clause of the nineteenth amendment, upon which a separate vote had been demanded, was read, as follows:

"To enable the Secretary of the Senate to pay for the copies of the report of Doctor David Dale Owen, United States geologist, on the geology of Iowa and Wisconsin and Minnesota Territory, heretofore ordered to be executed for the use of the Senate, under the special direction of the Commissioner of the General Land Office, thirty-one thousand two hundred and eighteen dollars and seventy-five cents: Provided, That no more than fifty cents a copy shall be paid for the binding of the book."

The question was then taken, and the amendment was agreed to.

The third clause of the nineteenth amendment, upon which a separate vote had been demanded,
 was read, as follows:

"To enable the Clerk of the House of Representatives to pay for three thousand five hundred copies of the report of Doctor David Dale Owen, on the geology of Iowa and Wisconsin and Minnesota Territory, ordered by a resolution of the House of Representatives, to be executed under the special direction of the Commissioner of the General Land Office, $16,187 50: Provided, That no more than fifty cents a copy shall be paid for the binding of the book."

The question was then taken on the amendment, and it was agreed to.

The twenty-fifth amendment, upon which a separate vote had been demanded, was read, as follows:

"For additional compensation for increasing the transportation of the United States mail between New York and Liverpool, in the Collins line of steamers, to twenty-six trips per annum, at such times as shall be directed by the Postmaster General, and in conformity to his last annual report to Congress, and his letter of the 15th of November last, to the Secretary of the Navy, commencing said increased service on the first of January, 1852, at the rate of $33,000 a trip, in lieu of the present allowance, the sum of $236,500: Provided, That it shall be in the power of Congress at any time after the 31st day of December, 1854, to terminate the arrangement for the additional allowance herein provided for, upon giving six months' notice."

The question being upon agreeing to this amendment of the Senate,

Mr. SWEETSER demanded the yeas and nays.
 The yeas and nays were ordered.

The question was then taken, and it was decided in the affirmative—yeas 89, nays 87.

YEAS—Messrs. Aiken, Thomas H. Bayly, Bell, Bibb-hans, Bowne, John H. Boyd, Briggs, Brooks, George H.
 Brown, Burrows, E. Carrington Cabell, Caldwell, Lewis

 —87.

Pending the call of the roll,—

Mr. DIMMICK stated that he had paired off with his colleague [Mr. FULLER] on this particular question, or that he should have voted in the negative.

Mr. MACE stated that he had paired off with Mr. BENNETT, and that he also was opposed to the measure.

Mr. MARSHALL, of Kentucky, said that he had paired off with Mr. STEPHENS, of Georgia.

Mr. WILCOX stated that he had paired off with Mr. LANDRY.

Mr. ORR said that he had paired off with Mr.
 POLK, and was against the amendment.

Mr. EASTMAN said that he had paired off with Mr. MEACHAM, and that he was opposed to the amendment.

Mr. BARRERE said that he had paired off with Mr. BOWIE, and that he was opposed to the amendment.

So the amendment was agreed to.

Mr. CARTER. I move to reconsider the vote by which the amendment was agreed to, and to lay the motion to reconsider upon the table.

Mr. CABLE, of Ohio. Is it in order to move to lay the bill upon the table?

The SPEAKER. It is in order.

Mr. CABLE. Then I make that motion, and
 I demand the yeas and nays.

Mr. SWEETSER. I move that the House adjourn.

Mr. CARTER. I withdraw my motion to reconsider.

Mr. SWEETSER. Then I withdraw the motion to adjourn.

The yeas and nays were ordered upon Mr.
 CABLE's motion.

Mr. HART. I wish to inquire what would be the effect of this motion? Will it lay all the amendments upon the table?

The SPEAKER. The bill with all the amendments.

The question was then taken, and it was decided in the negative—yeas 73, nays 104, as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Abercrombie, Averett, David J. Bailey,
 Beale, Bocoock, Bragg, Brenton, Albert G. Brown, Buell, Busby, Joseph Cable, Thompson Campbell, Caskie, Chastain, Churchill, Cobb, Dawson, Dimmick, Durkee, Eastman, Edgerton, Edmundson, Floyd, Freeman, Gaylord, Gorman, Green, Grow, Hamilton, Isham G. Harris, Sampson W. Harris, Hendricks, Hibbard, Hillyer, Holladay,
 John W. Howe, Thomas Y. How, Ives, Jenkins, Andrew
 Johnson, James Johnson, Daniel T. Jones, George W.
 Jones, Preston King, Letcher, Mason, McLanahan, Mc-Queen, Millson, Molony, Murphy, Nabers, Olds, Orr, Andrew Parker, Peaslee, Powell, Richardson, Ross, Russell, Savage, Scurry, Origen S. Seymour, Skelton, Smith, Benjamin Stanton, Sweetser, Townshend, Venable, Wallace, Wilcox, Wildrick, and Woodward—73.

NAYS—Messrs. Aiken, Allison, Thomas H. Bayly, Barrere, Bell, Bibbighaus, Bowne, J. H. Boyd, Briggs, Brooks, George H. Brown, Burrows, Burt, E. Carrington Cabell, Caldwell, Lewis D. Campbell, Carter, Chandler, John G.
 Davis, Dean, Dockery, Doty, Duncan, Dunham, Evans,
 Ewing, Florence, Fowler, Thomas J. D. Fuller, Gamble,
 Gentry, Gilmore, Goodenow, Goodrich, Grey, Hammond,

Harper, Hart, Haws, Haven, Henn, Horsford, Houston, Howard, Thos. M. Howe, Hunter, Ingersoll, Jackson, Robt. W. Johnson, J. Glancy Jones, Kuhns, Kurtz, Lockhart, Mann, Edward C. Marshall, Humphrey Marshall, Martin, McCorkle, Meade, Miller, Miner, Henry D. Moore, Morehead, Morrison, Murray, Samuel W. Parker, Penn, Perkins, Porter, Price, Rantoul, Reed, Riddle, Robie, Robinson, Sackett, Schermerhorn, Schoolcraft, Scudder, David L. Seymour, Smart, Snow, Stanley, Frederick P. Stanton, Abraham P. Stephens, Stone, Stuart, Sutherland, Taylor, Thurston, Walbridge, Walsh, Ward, Washburn, Watkins, Welch, Alexander White, Williams, and Yates—104.

So the House refused to lay the bill upon the table.

Pending the call of the roll—

Mr. ORR said: I shall vote aye. I have originally voted against this bill, and I have agreed to pair off with Mr. Polk upon the Collins amendment, but, nevertheless, I feel at liberty now to vote to lay the bill upon the table.

The question recurred upon agreeing to the second clause of the twenty-fifth amendment, as follows:

"For defraying the expenses of the supreme, circuit, and district courts of the United States, including the District of Columbia; also for jurors and witnesses, in aid of the funds arising from fines, penalties, and forfeitures incurred in the fiscal year ending June thirtieth, eighteen hundred and fifty-two, and previous years, and likewise for defraying the expenses of suits in which the United States are concerned, and of prosecutions for offenses committed against the United States, and for the apprehension and safe-keeping of prisoners, in addition to former appropriations, ninety thousand dollars: Provided, That no officer of the United States, who is in attendance upon any court of the United States, in the discharge of the duties of said office, shall receive any pay or compensation for his attendance as a witness on behalf of the Government, at the same time that he receives compensation as such officer."

Mr. JONES, of Tennessee, demanded the yeas and nays; which were not ordered.

The question being taken upon the amendment, it was agreed to.

The third clause of the twenty-fifth amendment of the Senate was then agreed to, viz:

"To enable the Secretary of the Interior to pay to the clerks employed in the Census Office on extra duty, at the rate of $100 for full service, according to the office roll, the sum of $10,500."

The fifth clause of the twenty-fifth amendment of the Senate, upon which a separate vote was asked, was read as follows:

"For the reconstruction or repairs of the steamer Bibb, used in the survey of the Nantucket shoals, $18,000."

The question being on agreeing to the amendment,

Mr. HUNTER demanded the yeas and nays; which were not ordered.

The question was put, and the amendment was agreed to.

The sixth clause of the twenty-fifth amendment, for establishing a depot of coal for naval purposes at Key West, in the State of Florida, $20,000, was then agreed to.

The seventh clause of the twenty-fifth amendment of the Senate, for the purchase of a site on which to erect a custom-house in Bangor, Maine, $1,500, was read.

The question being on its adoption—

Mr. HUNTER demanded the yeas and nays; which were not ordered.

The question was then taken, and the amendment was agreed to.

The eighth clause of the twenty-fifth amendment, for the purchase of a site on which to erect a custom-house at Bath, Maine, $11,000, was then agreed to.

The ninth clause of the twenty-fifth amendment of the Senate was read, as follows:

"For the completion of the custom-house at Mobile, Alabama, $100,000."

This amendment of the Senate had been amended by the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union by the addition of the following clauses:

"For the completion of the custom-house at Louisville, Kentucky, the additional sum of $43,700.

"For the completion of the custom-house at Cincinnati, $50,000.

"For the completion of a custom-house and other public offices connected therewith, at Pittsburg, $35,000.

"For the completion of the fire-proof building in the city of St. Louis, Missouri, for a custom-house and independent treasury building, and other offices of the United States, $37,000.

"For the completion of a custom-house at Norfolk, Virginia, $50,000."

The question being on concurring with the committee in its amendments to the Senate amendment—

Mr. HUNTER asked for the yeas and nays; but they were not ordered.

The amendments were then severally concurred in.

The question then being upon agreeing to the Senate amendment as amended—

Mr. MOORE, of Pennsylvania, demanded tellers.

Mr. LETCHER demanded the yeas and nays. The yeas and nays were not ordered.

Mr. MOORE called for tellers; which were ordered; and Messrs. STANTON, of Tennessee, and CAMPBELL, of Illinois, were appointed.

The question was then taken, and the tellers reported—ayes 98; noes not counted.

So the amendment of the Senate as amended was agreed to.

The twenty-eighth and thirtieth amendments, upon which separate votes had been asked, were then agreed to.

Mr. HOUSTON. What is the question now before the House?

The SPEAKER. The amendments of the Senate have all been disposed of.

Mr. HOUSTON. Then what is the question now?

The SPEAKER. There is no question before the House.

BOOKS FOR NEW MEMBERS.

Mr. STANTON, of Tennessee. I ask the unanimous consent of the House to offer the resolution which I send to the Chair.

The Clerk read the resolution, as follows:

Resolved, That the Clerk of this House be, and he is hereby, directed to purchase and furnish to each new member of the House who has not heretofore received them, the same books that were purchased for and furnished to the new members of the last Congress; and that, as far as possible, he purchase them of the original publishers: Provided, That this resolution shall not authorize the reprinting of any such books.

Mr. JONES, of Tennessee, objected.

THE INDIAN APPROPRIATION BILL.

Mr. HOUSTON. I desire to offer a resolution to close debate upon bill No. 43, making appropriation for the service of the Indian Department, and for the fulfillment of Indian treaties. I shall propose to close the debate at twelve o'clock tomorrow, so that, if the House sees fit, there can be a session this evening, to enable those gentlemen who desire to speak to do so. I shall call for the previous question; but if the gentleman from Arkansas [Mr. JOHNSON] desires to offer an amendment, I will give way to enable him to do so, and then I shall call for the previous question.

COLLINS LINE—MOTION TO RECONSIDER.

Mr. WHITE, of Alabama. I rise to a privileged question. I move to reconsider the vote by which the amendment of the Senate to the deficiency bill, in relation to the Collins line, was agreed to.

The SPEAKER. Did the gentleman from Alabama vote with the majority?

Mr. WHITE. I did, sir.

Mr. CLINGMAN: I move to lay the motion to reconsider upon the table.

Mr. AVERETT. I move that the House adjourn.

Mr. OLDS. On that motion I call for the yeas and nays.

[Cries of "Oh, no!" and "Let us adjourn!"]
Mr. OLDS. Well, I withdraw the call for the yeas and nays.

Mr. HOUSTON. I desire to ask a question of the Chair. If we get into this contest about the Collins line, of course the balance of the day is gone. Is it not in order to pass over this motion to reconsider until tomorrow, unless it is pressed now, and have a vote upon my resolution, so that we can devote this evening to speech-making?

The SPEAKER. That can only be done by the unanimous consent of the House.

Several Members objected.

The question was then taken on Mr. AVERETT's motion, and it was agreed to; and the House adjourned until tomorrow at eleven o'clock, a. m.

PETITIONS, &c.

The following petitions, memorials, &c., were presented under the rule, and referred to the appropriate committees:

By Mr. RIDDLE: The petition of Henry C. Carter, of Kent county, State of Delaware, praying Congress to grant him relief, in consequence of imposition by an agent upon the General Land Office.

By Mr. JONES, of Tennessee: The petition of William Moore and others, for mail routes from Pulaski, via Fayetteville, Tullahoma, and McMinnville, to Sparta.

Also, the petition of Abner S. Boone and others, for mail routes between the same points.

By Mr. MOORE, of Pennsylvania: A memorial of the Agricultural Society of Philadelphia, in favor of an Agricultural Bureau.

IN SENATE.

WEDNESDAY, July 14, 1852.

Prayer by the Chaplain, Rev. C. M. BUTLER.

Mr. SHIELDS presented a memorial of the Mayor and Common Council of the city of Alton, Illinois, praying that the city of Alton may be made a port of entry; which was referred to the Committee on Commerce.

Mr. BORLAND presented the petition of the Green Mountain Rifle Corps, praying that the Secretary of War may be authorized to furnish the corps with arms and accoutrements; which was referred to the Committee on Military Affairs.

REPORTS FROM STANDING COMMITTEES.

Mr. HAMLIN, from the Committee on Commerce, to which was referred the joint resolution to provide additional security for the lives and property of persons navigating the Western waters, reported it back with an amendment.

He also, from the same committee, to which were referred resolutions of the Legislature of Wisconsin, and the memorial of citizens of St. Lawrence county, New York, in relation to a ship canal round the Falls of St. Mary, asked to be discharged from the further consideration thereof; which was agreed to.

He also, from the same committee, to which was referred the memorial of Sarah and Lucinda Turner, praying an appropriation to test Tripplitt's invention for preventing the explosion of steam-boilers, asked to be discharged from the further consideration thereof; which was agreed to.

Mr. BRADBURY, from the Committee on the Judiciary, to which were referred a resolution of the Senate directing the Judiciary Committee to inquire into the expediency of making it penal for any officer of the Army, or other person appointed by the President, having a salary by law for his compensation, to contract, directly or indirectly, for supplies for Government; and also, a communication from the Secretary of War relating to the same subject, reported a bill amendatory of the act "concerning public contracts," approved April 21, 1848; which was read and passed to the second reading.

He also, from the same committee, to which was referred the petition of Susan C. Randall, praying compensation for extra duties performed by her late husband, Archibald Randall, in the circuit court of the United States, submitted an adverse report thereon; which was ordered to be printed.

Mr. FELCH, from the Committee on Public Lands, to which were referred the petition of Frederick Parsons, praying a grant of bounty land; and the petition of John Spencer, late receiver of public moneys at Fort Wayne, Indiana, praying indemnity for losses on account of a suit against him by the Government, submitted adverse reports thereon; which were ordered to be printed.

Mr. ATCHISON, from the Committee on Indian Affairs, to which was referred a joint resolution for the purchase of the half-breed tract on Lake Pepin, in Minnesota Territory, reported it back without amendment.

Mr. RUSK, from the Committee on Indian Affairs, to which was referred the memorial of George Stealey, praying compensation for his services and expenses while on a mission to the Indian tribes in California, submitted a report, accompanied by a bill for his relief; which was read and passed to the second reading. The report was ordered to be printed.

COLLECTION DISTRICTS IN OREGON.

Mr. HAMLIN. The Committee on Commerce, to which was referred the bill from the House of Representatives, entitled "An act authorizing the President of the United States to designate the places for the ports of entry and delivery for the collection districts of Puget's Sound and Umpqua, in the Territory of Oregon, and to fix the com'pensation of the collector at Astoria, in said Territory," have directed me to report it back without amendment, and recommend its passage. A bill similar to this has already passed the Senate, very nearly in the form of the present bill. In the Senate bill salaries were proposed for certain officers there. The House have passed this bill, diminishing the salaries below the amount fixed in the Senate bill. The Senator from Indiana [Mr. BRIGHT] is extremely desirous that the bill should be put upon its passage, and I ask that it may be considered now.

There being no objection, the Senate proceeded to consider the bill as in Committee of the Whole. It proposes to authorize the President of the United States to designate the places for the ports of entry for the collection districts of Puget's Sound and Umpqua, in the Territory of Oregon, upon receiving satisfactory information as to the best location for the said ports, instead of the places now established by law. It further provides that the annual compensation of the collector at Astoria, in Oregon, shall be $3,000, including the fees of his office, commencing on the 1st day of July, 1852.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to a third reading, read a third time, and passed.

RESOLUTIONS ADOPTED.

Mr. BRADBURY submitted the following resolution; which was considered and agreed to:

Resolved, That the Committee on Pensions be instructed to inquire into the expediency of continuing a pension to Mrs. Thankful Reynolds.

Mr. FELCH submitted the following resolution; which was considered and agreed to:

Resolved, That the Committee on Public Lands be instructed to inquire into the expediency of establishing a new land district, embracing the county of Benton, in the Territory of Minnesota.

THE ISLAND OF HAYTI.

Mr. MASON. I ask leave to offer the following resolution:

Resolved, That the President be requested to communicate to the Senate, if not incompatible with the public interest, copies of the correspondence of Robert M. Walsh, Esq., whilst acting as Commissioner of this Government at the Island of Hayti.

It appears that our commercial intercourse with that Island is increasing rapidly. I am informed, from sources entitled to credit, that the correspondence of this gentleman, who was recently a special commissioner to Hayti, will be found to be of much interest, both politically and commercially. I ask, therefore, that the resolution may be considered at this time.

There being no objection, the resolution was considered and agreed to.

AMENDMENT OF THE RULES.

Mr. NORRIS submitted the following resolution; which, under the rules, lies over for one day:

Resolved, That (the House of Representatives concurring) the sixteenth joint rule of the two Houses be amended by adding the following thereto: "And all general appropriation bills shall be sent at least ten days previous to the day fixed for the adjournment of Congress."

If amended as proposed, the sixteenth joint rule will read:

"No bill that shall have passed one House, shall be sent for concurrence to the other on either of the last three days of the session; and all general appropriation bills shall be sent at least ten days previous to the day fixed for the adjournment of Congress."

LOSSES OF SPANISH SUBJECTS.

The engrossed joint resolution for the relief of the Spanish consul, and other subjects of Spain residing at New Orleans, and of subjects of Spain residing at Key West, by indemnity for losses occasioned by violence of the mob in the year 1851, was read the third time.

Mr. MASON. In consequence of some modification made yesterday, at the instance of the Senator from Louisiana, it will be necessary to insert, after the word "Havana," the words "in Cuba." I ask the unanimous consent of the Senate to make that amendment.

The amendment was agreed to, and the joint resolution was passed.

On motion by Mr. SOULE, the title of the resolution was amended by striking out the words "by violence of the mob."

SUSPENDED LAND ENTRIES.

The engrossed bill to revive and continue in force for a limited time the provisions of an act relative to suspended entries of the public lands, was read a third time and passed.

REDUCTION OF POSTAGE.

The bill from the House of Representatives to amend an act entitled "An act to reduce and modify the rates of postage in the United States, and for other purposes," passed March 3, 1851, was read a first and second time by its title, and referred to the Committee on the Post Office and Post Roads.

WASHINGTON CITY GUARDS.

The engrossed joint resolution to supply the Washington City Juvenile Guards with arms, was read a third time; and the question was, Shall it pass?

Mr. HALE. Mr. President, I have great doubt as to the propriety of passing this resolution. I do not know precisely the nature of the company referred to in it, but I perceive they are styled "Juveniles," and I suppose they form a sort of infant military school. I believe that the experiment of establishing infant military schools, when tried, has failed. I see that among the petitions presented this morning, is one by an honorable Senator from Arkansas, from some juveniles somewhere else, asking the same privilege. The arsenals in which the United States arms are deposited, are scattered all over the United States. The juveniles in other places will learn the juvenile privileges which have been extended here, and we shall have applications pouring in upon us from one end of the country to the other. If we do for one company what this resolution proposes to do, we must, to be impartial, distribute arms to whoever asks them, and so we shall have to furnish all the children throughout the United States with fire-arms.

I suppose these juveniles are about fourteen years of age. The next thing will be, some juvenile company will be formed of boys eight or ten years of age; and they will petition for small pistols and revolvers, and we will have to furnish them to all who are large enough and stout enough to carry them. If they are not large enough and stout enough to carry them, we shall have to furnish them with dirks and small arms. I think, without any attempt to be jocose on this occasion, that it is an evil example. I think we had better not pass the resolution. It would be well for us to pause. I believe that the military spirit does not need any more encouragement or fostering than it has already had. It has elected one President lately, and it is going to try very hard to elect another. [Laughter.]

Besides, sir, I am opposed to it on another principle. If you give out the arms of the United States to adults—men who have become capable of assuming legal responsibilities—you may then have some security that the arms will be safely kept, and returned when they are wanted, fit for the purposes for which the United States want them. But if you distribute them to juveniles, they cannot assume legal responsibilities. They may give their word of honor—and I am not certain that that is not better than the legal responsibilities of older men, but it is not such as Governments deal with. I think, with all disposition to sympathize with young men and boys—and nobody has more of it than I have—that this is a mistaken manifestation of that sympathy, and encouragement, which ought not to be extended to them. I appreciate highly the generous motives of the Senator who introduced the resolution, but I think that he is mistaken. But, whether he is or not, such is my judgment. I shall feel constrained to vote against the resolution, and I shall ask the yeas and nays upon it.

Mr. CLEMENS. When the Senator from New Hampshire, yesterday, objected to the third reading of this resolution, I was at some loss to understand the reason; but he has explained it to us to-day, to my entire satisfaction. The Senator, it is known to most of us, is a Free-Soil candidate for the Presidency; he has no military glory to run upon, and hence he is opposed to the military spirit. [Laughter.] Now, this is one of the most innocent things imaginable. The resolution does not provide that these boys shall be furnished with guns. No one ever contemplated that they should have muskets, because they cannot handle them. It simply proposes to authorize the Secretary of War to furnish them with such arms as, in his judgment, they can use to advantage. There is scarcely a city, there is scarcely a village of three thousand inhabitants, anywhere in the country, in which there is not such a company. I myself belonged to one for years; and I take occasion to say now, that I sincerely believe a boy of that age will learn more, as to the uses of fire-arms in three weeks, than a grown man will in seven.

There can be no harm in this. The Secretary of War is required to do nothing. The resolution simply gives him the discretion to furnish this company with old sabres, if he chooses—something with which they can do no damage. No one supposes he will give them muskets, for they would be useless to them. They could not manage them. He may furnish them with any light arms he sees proper. The Government has some twenty-odd thousand old sabres, that might be employed in that way, without any great detriment to the public; unless it should encourage the military spirit, and thus assist in defeating the Senator from New Hampshire for the Presidency. [Laughter.]

Mr. HALE. Mr. President, I had hoped that after the Union was so thoroughly saved as it has been, and the Wilmot proviso was dead, and its friends buried, flings at their corpses or remains would be spared; but it seems it is not so. The honorable Senator indulges in what he supposes to be wit; and I have no doubt it was, because I saw several laugh. But I think that the thing ought to be treated seriously by the Senate. What sort of arms would the Secretary deem suitable for these juveniles?—I believe they are styled "juveniles." I do not know exactly their ages, but as they are called juveniles, I suppose they must be infants under the age of twenty-one. Some of them would no doubt be capable of handling pretty large arms—heavy muskets; and then it would be graduated down. I think that the whole thing is wrong. If you once commence, you will not stop here. Another petition has already been presented for the same object; and petitions will continue to come in.

When I got up I did not know but that I should indulge a little more fully than I think, upon reflection, it is best for me to do, in remarks upon a certain subject which the allusion of the Senator from Alabama would give me an opportunity of doing. I refer to the position in which I stand in relation to the matter to which he has referred. But upon the whole, as the Senate is not very full, and I do not think the steam is quite up yet, I will not do it. [Laughter.] But I will take occasion to tell the Senator this: I do not know the course which I or my friends may take, but I think when the election is over the party defeated will not be at a loss to know how it happened that it was defeated. That is all I will say at present. I ask the yeas and nays on the passage of the resolution.

The yeas and nays were ordered, and being taken, resulted—yeas 23, nays 14; as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Adams, Atchison, Boring, Charlton, Clemens, De Saussure, Dodge of Wisconsin, Dodge of Iowa, Douglas, Felch, Gwin, James, Jones of Iowa, King, Mallory, Mason, Norris, Rusk, Sebastian, Shields, Soule, Sprague, and Toucey—23.

NAYS—Messrs. Bayard, Bradbury, Bright, Brodhead, Chase, Davis, Dawson, Geyer, Hale, Hamlin, Miller, Sumner, Upham, and Wade—14.

So the resolution was passed.

ORDER OF BUSINESS.

Mr. SHIELDS. I rise for the purpose of asking the Senate to take up the bill to provide for the protection of the Territories of New Mexico and Oregon, and the States of California and Texas.

Mr. GWIN. I gave notice yesterday, that I should to-day call up the California land bill.

Mr. SHIELDS. I wish to take up a bill in which the Senator is very much interested. My impression is, that it will occupy but a very little time. It is, as he knows, a subject of very great importance. The bill to which I allude, is a bill which has passed the House, and to which the Committee on Military Affairs of the Senate has reported an amendment. With the permission of the Senator from California, I would like to call it up, and have it amended as proposed and sent back to the House.

Mr. GWIN. I am very much in favor of the measure which the Senator from Illinois proposes to take up. But I gave notice yesterday that I should to-day ask the Senate to take up the bill to which I have referred. It is a bill of very great importance to California, and I hope it will be taken up. It has been reported for several months and has been lying on our tables for a long while.

Mr. SHIELDS. I do not wish to interfere with the Senator from California. I know that the bill which he proposes to take up is very necessary, and I have no wish to interfere with it. The bill which I propose to take up concerns his own people more, perhaps, than any other portion of the country; but I will withdraw the motion to enable him to take up the bill to which he alludes.

PUBLIC LANDS IN CALIFORNIA.

On the motion of Mr. GWIN, the Senate proceeded, as in Committee of the Whole, to consider the bill "to provide for the survey of the public lands in California, and the granting of donation privileges, and for other purposes."

The Committee on Public Lands reported an amendment to the bill, which was to strike out all of the original bill after the enacting clause and insert a new one.

Mr. GWIN. Mr. President, I propose, as I gave notice yesterday, to offer a substitute for the whole bill. I will proceed very briefly to give the reasons which have induced me to offer the substitute. I am in favor of the bill as reported by the Committee on Public Lands, but I have been informed that there is great doubt whether the bill can pass the other House in the form in which it has been reported. I have, therefore, in order to secure legislation with regard to the public domain in California, proposed this substitute. It does away with the donation system provided for in the original bill, and substitutes in its place the preemption system.

It is now four years since California, by the treaty of Guadalupe Hidalgo, was recognized as an integral part of the American territory, and nearly two years since she was admitted as a sovereign State into the Union; but the machinery of the land system has not yet been put into full operation in our State. One of the conditions in the act of Congress of the 9th of September, 1850, for her admission is, "That the people of said State, through the Legislature, or otherwise, shall never interfere with the primary disposal of the public lands within its limits, and shall pass no law and do no act whereby the title of the United States to, and right to dispose of the same, shall be impaired or questioned," the Constitution having delegated to Congress "the power to dispose of, and make all needful rules and regulations respecting, the territory or other property belonging to the United States." This constitutional delegation of power, and the law for the admission of our State, plainly point out the duty of Congress in this matter, and the settled policy of the nation, fixed by a long series of legislative acts as to all the other territory of the United States, and now grown into an established system, require that the public lands in California shall be laid open to sale without delay, which the suffering interests of our people now imperiously demand.

Soon after California was represented in Congress, a bill to effect this object was introduced, among other measures, affecting our landed interests; and, although constantly pressed and strenuously urged at the last session, owing to exciting and extraordinary causes, of public notoriety, the only step towards the measure was the introduction of an item into the general appropriation act of 3d March, 1851, providing a sum for the surveys of public lands and private claims, and compensation, limited to two years, for a surveyor general. The legislation which I have heretofore proposed and advocated contemplated the granting of donations to actual settlers, upon liberal principles. Since then the "homestead" bill, being, in some respects, a kindred measure, and of a general character, has passed the other House, and is now before the Senate. In consideration of this fact, objections have been advanced against making special provisions for donations in the California land bill, creating well-founded apprehensions that its passage may be jeopardized, deferred, or defeated, if this measure, in a special bill for our State, be now insisted upon. I am willing, therefore, to waive the principle for the present, being moved to do so by a conviction of the necessity for such speedy legislation as will secure to our people the early benefits of the land system by survey, public sale, and especially by a preemption system that will make their rights attach from the instant of the passage of the law on agricultural lands, whether surveyed or unsurveyed. I now introduce a substitute for the original bill, on which I ask the immediate action of the Senate, and to which I think no reasonable exception can be taken. It creates, permanently, the office of surveyor general for California, fixes his salary; provides for incidentals; for an official seal by which to authenticate papers; gives him the same power in regard to surveys in California as the surveyor general of the State of Louisiana has in that State; authorizes him, in executing surveys, to act in cases of conflicting boundaries, but not to preclude a legal investigation and decision by the proper tribunals; stipulates a maximum price for the survey of private claims and public lands; gives power to the head of the Department, if he deems proper, to direct the surveys according to the geodetic method; to depart from the rectangular system where the public interests may require it; authorizes the President, with the advice and consent of the Senate, to appoint a register and receiver, with the usual powers; fixes their salary; directs the location of the land office at a convenient place, with power to remove it, and to create two or three land districts in California, and appoint officers; lays open all the agricultural unsurveyed public lands in California, whether surveyed or unsurveyed, to preemption, according to the act of 4th September, 1841, removing the restriction in that act as to the extent of possessions of claimant, or in regard to abandonment of his residence to move on public lands; grants the sixteenth and thirty-sixth sections to the State for school purposes; directs all unsold public lands to be proclaimed and offered, and thereafter makes them subject to private sale at $1 25 per acre; forbids the register and receiver from taking fees, except for deciding preemptions, but allows receiver actual expenses for making deposits.

The bill which I have prepared as a substitute, further provides that, where there shall be a house erected and a cultivation on the school sections, the State authorities shall take an equivalent in other lands; forbids a settlement on a tract selected for a military post, or within a mile of such post; declares that certain town or village sites, shall not be subject to entry by settlers under this act, but shall be subject to the act of 23d May, 1844, for the "relief of the citizens of towns upon the lands of the United States, under certain circumstances," except such towns as are on mineral lands, to which the act gives the inhabitants a right of occupancy and cultivation, until Congress shall dispose of the same; confers authority for paying for surveys by the day, instead of the mile, when necessary; orders that officers may hold over after their commissions have expired, until their successors enter on duty; directs the surveyor general, when compatible with other duties, to inspect the surveying operations on the field, to see that the work is faithfully done, or to depute an agent for the purpose; authorizes a seal to be provided for the surveyor general of Oregon, and fixes his salary; and grants to California two entire townships for a seminary of learning; provides as to the manner of selection, and grants to the State ten sections of land for the purpose of erecting public buildings.

Such is an outline of its provisions—all of which have been, time and again, sanctioned by legislative acts as to other States, and are founded upon precedents too well established to be now disputed—precedents, too, that authorize and allow a far more liberal policy towards our State, especially, in reference to donations, and in regard to which I now give notice that, unless provided for in a general law, I shall hereafter insist upon by introducing a measure to convert the preemptions under this act into donations, by dispensing with any payment on the land.

Seven months of the present session have elapsed—we are hastening to the close of the first session of the Thirty-second Congress—and I now call upon the Senate for a speedy passage of this bill, so indispensable and of such vital importance to the present and future welfare of my constituents.

Mr. FELCH. The bill originally introduced into the Senate was referred to the Committee on Public Lands, which committee reported it back with an amendment, which was a substitute for the whole bill. The Senator from California now proposes a further amendment, which is, in fact, a substitute for both of them. I wish to propose an amendment or two to the proposition of the Senator from California, but I suppose that, in the present stage of the proceedings, it will be hardly competent for me to do so, as it would be an amendment to an amendment to an amendment.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. (Mr. NORRIS in the chair.) The Chair did not understand that to be the state of the case.

Mr. GWIN. If the substitute which I have offered is adopted in place of the original bill, and the amendment reported by the Committee on Public Lands, it will then be open to amendment, I suppose.

Mr. HUNTER. I think the Senator from California is mistaken. If the substitute is once adopted it cannot be amended. All amendments must be made before the Senate adopt the substitute.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair understands the rule to be, that when amendments are moved to the original bill, the question is taken first on those amendments, then on the amendment to the substitute, and then the question is taken on the substitute itself.

Mr. HUNTER. I think that is the rule.

Mr. GEYER. I submit that the amendments reported by the committee are the first in order, and that this amendment is intended as a substitute for the amendment of the committee.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair understands the rule to be, that the original bill is first to be perfected before the question is taken on the substitute.

Mr. GEYER. Is this a substitute for the original bill?

Mr. HUNTER. As I understand it, this is a substitute for the original bill, and therefore I apprehend the Chair is perfectly right.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair now understands that the committee reported a substitute for the whole bill. The first question, therefore, will be on the amendment of the committee.

Mr. FELCH. If that amendment is adopted, will it then be open to amendment?

Mr. HUNTER. I now see the state of the case. The bill was referred to the committee, and the committee proposes to amend it by a substitute, and the Senator from California now proposes to amend the substitute of the committee. The best plan to get out of the difficulty will be to vote down the substitute of the committee, and then let the Senator from California offer his amendment as a substitute for the original bill.

Mr. DAVIS. This is a motion to amend the original bill, is it not?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The original bill was referred to the Committee on Public Lands, and that committee reported a substitute for it.

Mr. DAVIS. The committee report in favor of striking out the whole of the original bill. Now it is competent for the Senate to amend that bill before it is stricken out. Therefore, if this is proposed as an amendment to that, I think it is in order.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The original bill is open to amendment; but if no amendment be offered, the question will be on the substitute reported by the committee.

Mr. HUNTER. I understand that the Senator from California and the Committee on Public Lands have agreed that they will consider his substitute in place of their own. It will save time, therefore, to vote down the substitute of the committee. The question will then stand as between the original bill and the substitute of the Senator from California. Of course, amendments can be offered to the original bill, before the vote is taken on the substitute.

Mr. ADAMS. I understand the rule, as suggested by the Senator from Virginia, that the original bill is under consideration now, and may be perfected before the substitute is voted upon; but there being no proposition to amend or perfect the original bill, the question comes up first upon striking out, and then the substitute will be open to amendment. If that should be rejected, then, as the Senator from Virginia suggests, the proposition of the Senator from California would come up.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question

now is on agreeing to the amendment reported from the Committee on Public Lands.

Mr. FELCH. I hope we may vote down that proposition; not but that I prefer it altogether to that which is offered by my friend from California, for I am disposed to be more liberal than his substitute proposes to be, to the settlers on the public lands in that portion of the country. But as he apprehends difficulty, apart from the merits of the case, and desires to substitute a preemption right instead of a donation right, of course I yield at once, and hope the Senate will vote down the amendment of the committee.

The amendment reported by the Committee on Public Lands was rejected.

Mr. GWIN. I now offer my substitute for the original bill; which is to strike out all after the enacting clause, and insert the following:

That the surveyor general for the district or State of California, who is now, or may hereafter be appointed by the President, by and with the advice and consent of the Senate, shall keep his office at such place as the President, in view of the public convenience, shall from time to time direct; and the surveyor general, if he has not already done so, and his successors in office, before entering upon duty, shall take and subscribe an oath or affirmation before a judge of a United States court, or other competent officer, to support the Constitution of the United States, and faithfully discharge the duties of his office, and give bond in the same amount as other surveyors general, the penalty thereof to be increased whenever the Secretary of the Interior shall deem proper. He shall be entitled to receive a salary at the rate of $4,500 per annum, payable quarterly, to commence from the time of entering into bond.

SEC. 2. And be it further enacted, That there shall be allowed for clerk hire in the office of the surveyor general, the sum of $11,000 per annum, or so much thereof as may be necessary; and for office rent, fuel, and other incidental expenses of his office, such sums as shall be found necessary by the Secretary of the Interior. And the Secretary of the Interior is hereby authorized to cause an official seal to be prepared for the office of the said surveyor general; and any copy of, or extracts from the plats, field-notes, and other records and documents on file in his office, when attested as such, by the said seal, and the signature of the surveyor general, shall, in all judicial matters, have the same force and effect as the originals.

SEC. 3. And be it further enacted, That the said surveyor general shall have the same power and authority, and perform the same duties respecting the public lands and private claims in the State of California, as by law appertain to, and are required of the surveyor general in Louisiana, except so far as the same may be modified by this act. He shall engage a sufficient number of skillful surveyors as his deputies, whom he shall cause to survey, measure, and mark base and meridian lines through such points, and perpetuated by such monuments, and such other correction parallels and meridians as may be prescribed, and also to survey and establish the other lines of the public lands. He shall also cause all private claims to be surveyed after they have been confirmed; and in the location and survey of them, he shall have the same power and authority as are conferred on the land officers of Louisiana, by the sixth section of the act of 3d March, 1831, creating the office of the surveyor general for that State; and for surveying the base and meridian lines, and private claims, and meandering navigable waters, the deputy surveyor shall be allowed not exceeding $16 per mile; and for surveying the other lines of the public lands, there shall be paid not exceeding an average of $12 per mile: Provided, That none other than township lines shall be surveyed when the lands are mineral or are deemed unfit for cultivation; and no allowance shall be made for such lines as are not actually run and marked in the field, and were actually necessary to be run.

SEC. 4. And be it further enacted, That if, in the opinion of the Secretary of the Interior, it shall be advisable, he is hereby authorized to direct such surveys after what is known as the geodetic method. And whenever, in the opinion of the Secretary of the Interior, a departure from the rectangular mode of surveying and subdividing the public lands would promote the public interest, he may direct such change to be made in the mode of surveying and designating the said lands as he may deem proper, with reference to the existence of mountains, mineral deposits, and the advantages derived from timber and water privileges: Provided, That such lands shall not be surveyed into less than one hundred and sixty acres, or subdivided into less than forty acres, unless under peculiar circumstances.

SEC. 5. And be it further enacted, That there shall be appointed, by the President, by and with the advice and consent of the Senate, a register of the land office and receiver of public moneys for the State of California, at such time as, in his judgment, the public interest may demand, with a salary each of three thousand dollars per annum, payable quarterly; and the land office shall be located at such place as the President, in view of the public convenience, shall from time to time direct; and previously to entering on the duties of their offices, they each shall take and subscribe an oath or affirmation, before one of the judges of the United States courts, or other competent officer, to support the Constitution of the United States, and faithfully to discharge the duties of their respective offices, and shall give bond in the same amount as other registers and receivers of the public land offices; and their general duties and responsibilities shall be the same as other officers of like character: Provided, however, That at such time or times as in his judgment the public interests may so imperatively require, and in the absence of any further and special legislation of Congress on the subject, it shall be lawful for the President of the United States to divide the State of California into two or three separate and distinct land districts, as circumstances shall determine to be necessary, embracing, respectively, the upper and lower, or the upper, middle and lower portions of the State; and he shall appoint, by and with the advice and consent of the Senate, or during the recess of Congress when necessary, a register of the land office and receiver of public moneys for each of such land districts; and the land offices for the same, respectively, shall be located at, and be removed from time to time to such places as the President shall deem most suitable for public convenience.

SEC. 6. And be it further enacted, That all the public lands in the State of California, whether surveyed or unsurveyed, with the exception of sections sixteen and thirty-six, which shall be and hereby are granted to the State for the purposes of public schools in each township, and with the exception of lands reserved and appropriated under the authority of this act, and excepting also the lands claimed under any foreign grant or title and the mineral lands, shall be subject to the preemption laws of 4th September, 1841; and shall, after the plats thereof are returned to the office of the register, be offered for sale, after six months' public notice in the State of the time and place of sale under the laws, rules, and regulations now governing such sales, or such as may be hereafter prescribed: Provided, That where unsurveyed lands are claimed by preemption, the usual notice of such claim shall be filed within three months after the return of the plats of surveys to the land offices, and proof and payment shall be made prior to the day appointed by the President's proclamation for the commencement of the sale, including such lands, the entry of such claims to be made by legal subdivisions, and in the most compact form: And provided further, That the restrictions in the act of 4th September, 1841, as to the extent of the possessions of the claimant, and of quitting or abandoning his residence on his own land to reside on public land in this State, shall interpose no bar to their obtaining the benefits of this act; and all of said lands that shall remain unsold after having been proclaimed and offered, shall be subject to entry at private sale as other public land, and at the same minimum price per acre; and the register and receiver shall not be entitled to any percentage or fees, except for deciding preemption cases, when each of them shall be allowed the same fees as are paid to other like officers; but the receiver shall be entitled to his actual necessary expenses, going and returning in making his deposits.

SEC. 7. And be it further enacted, That where any settlement, by the erection of a dwelling house, or the cultivation of any portion of the land, shall be made upon the sixteenth and thirty-sixth sections, before the same shall be surveyed, or where such sections may be reserved for public uses or taken by private claims, other lands shall be selected by the proper authorities of the State in lieu thereof, agreeably to the provisions of the act of Congress, approved on the 20th of May, 1826, entitled "An act to appropriate lands for the support of schools in certain townships and fractional townships, not before provided for," and which shall be subject to approval by the Secretary of the Interior. And no person shall make a settlement or location upon any tract or parcel of land selected for a military post, or within one mile of such post, or on any other lands reserved by competent authority; nor shall any person obtain the benefits of this act by a settlement or location on mineral lands.

SEC. 8. And be it further enacted, That the public lands, not being mineral lands, occupied as towns or villages, shall not be subdivided, or subject to sale, or to be appropriated by settlers, under the provisions of this act; but the whole of such lands, whether settled upon before or after the survey of the same, shall be subject to the provisions of the act entitled "An act for the relief of the citizens of towns upon the lands of the United States, under certain circumstances," approved May 23d, 1844, except such towns as are located on or near mineral lands, the inhabitants of which shall have the right of occupation and cultivation only until such time as Congress shall dispose of the same; nor shall any lands specially reserved for public uses, be appropriated under the provisions of this act.

SEC. 9. And be it further enacted, That whenever the public surveys, or any portion of them, authorized by this act, or by the act approved September 27, 1850, entitled "An act to create the office of surveyor general of the public lands in Oregon, and to provide for the survey and to make donations to settlers of the said public lands," are so required to be made as to render it expedient to make compensation for the surveying thereof by the day, instead of by the mile, it shall be lawful for the Commissioner of the General Land Office, under direction of the Secretary of the Interior, to make such fair and reasonable allowance as, in his judgment, shall be necessary to insure the accurate and faithful execution of the work.

SEC. 10. And be it further enacted, That, except where the President of the United States shall see cause otherwise to determine, each officer to be appointed in virtue of this act, and also every other like officer of the United States, may continue in the uninterrupted discharge of his regular official duties, and is hereby authorized accordingly so to act, after the day of expiration of his official commission, and until a new commission shall be issued to him for the same office, or otherwise, until the day when a successor shall enter upon the duties of such office; and the existing official bond of any such officer so acting, shall be deemed and held to be good and sufficient, and in force until the date of the approval of a new bond to be given by him if reappointed, or otherwise, for the additional time wherein he may so continue officially to act, pursuant to authority hereof. And the provision as to bonds to be given by deputy surveyors for the faithful execution of their duties, in a penalty of double the estimated amount of money accruing to them under their surveying contracts, as required by the act of March 3d, 1831, entitled "An act to create the office of surveyor general of the public lands for the State of Louisiana," referred to in the third section of this act, shall be and the same is hereby made applicable to public surveys in the State of California, and the sufficiency of the sureties to all such bonds shall be approved and certified by the proper surveyor general; and the same provision is hereby extended to all other branches of the public surveying service elsewhere; and all such bonds heretofore required of deputy surveyors, according to usage in the surveying service, shall be deemed and held to be of the same validity as if the same had been required by law. And it is hereby made the duty of each of the respective surveyors general of the public lands of the United States, so far as is compatible with the desk duties of his office, occasionally to inspect the surveying operations while in progress in the field, sufficiently to satisfy himself, from actual inspection, of the fidelity of the execution of the work according to contract, and the actual and necessary expenses incurred by him while so engaged, shall be allowed; and where it is incompatible with his other duties, for a surveyor general to devote the time necessary to make a personal inspection of the work in progress, they he shall be, and hereby is, authorized to depute a confidential agent to make such examination; and the actual and necessary expenses of such person shall be allowed and paid for that service, and $8 per day during the examination in the field: Provided, That such examination shall not be protracted beyond thirty days, and in no case longer than is actually necessary; and when a surveyor general, or any person employed in his office at a regular salary, shall be engaged in such special service, he or they shall only receive his necessary expenses in addition to his regular salary.

SEC. 11. And be it further enacted, That the Secretary of the Interior be, and he is hereby, authorized and required to cause to be provided for the office of surveyor general of Oregon a seal, with such device as shall be deemed suitable, and copies of any papers on file in his office which may be authenticated by him under said seal shall be evidence in all cases in which the originals would be evidence; and from and after the passage of this act the salary of said surveyor shall be $3,500 per annum.

SEC. 12. And be it further enacted, That the quantity of two entire townships, or seventy-two sections, shall be and the same is hereby granted to the State of California, for the use of a seminary of learning; said lands to be selected by the Governor of the State, or any person he may designate for that purpose, in legal subdivisions of not less than a quarter-section of any of the unsold, unoccupied, and unappropriated public lands therein, subject to the approval of the Secretary of the Interior, and to be disposed of as the Legislature shall direct: Provided, however, That no mineral lands, or lands reserved for any public purpose whatever, or lands to which any settler may be entitled under the provisions of this act, shall be subject to such selection.

SEC. 13. And be it further enacted, That there shall be and is hereby granted to the State of California the quantity of ten entire sections of land, for the purpose of erecting the public buildings of that State; said lands to be selected by the Governor, or any persons he may designate, in legal subdivisions of not less than a quarter-section of any of the unsold, unoccupied, and unappropriated public lands in that State, and subject to the approval of the Secretary of the Interior: Provided, however, That none of said selections shall be made of mineral lands, or lands reserved for any public purpose whatever, or lands to which any settler may be entitled under the provisions of this act.

Mr. FELCH. I wish to propose one or two verbal amendments. The first one is to strike out the words "reserved and" in the sixth line of the sixth section, and to insert after the word "act" the words "or reserved by competent authority." That part of the section will then read—

"That all the public lands in the State of California, whether surveyed or unsurveyed, with the exception of sections sixteen and thirty-six, which shall be, and hereby are, granted to the State for the purposes of public schools in each township, and with the exception of lands appropriated under the authority of this act, or reserved by competent authority," &c.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. FELCH. I propose further to amend the same section, by inserting in the twenty-second line, after the word "subdivisions," the words "according to the United States surveys." That part of the section will then read—

"Provided, That where unsurveyed lands are claimed by preemption, the usual notice of such claim shall be filed within three months after the return of the plats of surveys to the land offices, and proof and payment shall be made prior to the day appointed by the President's proclamation for the commencement of the sale including such lands, the entry of such claims to be made by legal subdivisions, according to the United States surveys," &c.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. FELCH. I further move to amend the same section by adding at the end the following proviso—

"Provided, That nothing in this act shall be construed to authorize any settlement to be made on any of the public lands not surveyed subsequently to the 1st day of January, in the year 1853, nor shall any rights of such settlers be recognized by virtue of any settlement or improvement made subsequent to that date."

Mr. GWIN. I trust the Senator from Michigan will so change his proviso as to confine his restriction to one year after the passage of this act. It may so happen that this act may not be passed by the first of January next. I would suggest to him to strike out the words "1st of January, 1853," and insert "one year subsequently to the passage of this act."

Mr. FELCH. I will modify the proviso so as to meet the views of the Senator from California.

The proviso as modified was read, as follows:

"Provided, That nothing in this act shall be construed to authorize any settlement to be made on any public land not surveyed, unless the same be made within one year from the passage of this act; nor shall any rights of such settlers be recognized by virtue of any settlement or improvement made upon such unsurveyed lands subsequent to that date."

Mr. FELCH. The bill now recognizes the rights of settlers to preemption on lands that are not surveyed; of course it must do so, or no rights could be recognized, as no lands have been surveyed as yet. The bill, as originally reported at the last session of Congress, followed in its provisions the bill in relation to settlements in Oregon, granting to settlers donation rights, not merely at the present time, but prospectively, as in Oregon, until the end of two years from the next January; a considerable portion of that time has now elapsed, and I propose in the amendment to give settlers time to secure the preemption rights on the unsurveyed lands, hoping that a commencement may be made in the surveys, so that they may obtain privileges, either by entry or by preemption claims. I do not think, considering the great length of time required to obtain information in California in regard to the provisions of this act, that the time mentioned—one year—would be too long; certainly not too long, when compared with the time allowed in the bill relative to Oregon; but that is a matter for the consideration of the Senate.

Mr. HUNTER. It may all be right, but still I want some information in regard to the bill. I believe it is a departure from the system which has been pursued on this side of the Rocky Mountains, as we have never given preemption rights ahead of the surveys, except in special cases. Perhaps it is also a departure from the system in another respect, as it proposes to permit whites to go and settle upon Indian lands.

Mr. GWIN. There are no Indians in California who can claim rights, other than possessory rights, to any of the agricultural lands. Their locations on these lands are mostly broken up. The Indians are in the mountains, in and beyond the gold regions. There are few Indian tribes, so far as my information extends, who would be disturbed in consequence of the passage of this act. There is no obstacle, therefore, on this ground, in the way, and it is important that the bill should pass, as it will entitle persons who have settled on lands belonging to the United States, whether surveyed or unsurveyed, to their preemption rights, and give them security in their possessions until the surveys are made; for Senators should remember, that only $25,000 have been appropriated for the purpose of extending the land system of the United States to California; and although some township lines have been run, none of the public lands have as yet been surveyed, nor can they be, to the extent that the wants of the country demand, for many years to come. The only thing that it remains for us to do, therefore, is to devise means for the purpose of securing occupants in the peaceable possession of their lands.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. FELCH. In the forty-seventh line of the eleventh section, there is a provision for the payment of the actual and necessary expenses of the officer who may be deputed by the surveyor general to inspect, in his stead, the surveying operations while in progress in the field. It provides that, in addition to the allowance and payment of the actual and necessary expenses of such person, he shall be paid eight dollars per day during the examination in the field. I move to amend this part of the section by striking out "eight," and inserting "five," so that this officer shall be remunerated at the rate of five dollars per day.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. GWIN's substitute, as amended, was agreed to, and the bill was reported to the Senate.

Mr. GEYER. I observe, in the sixth section, it is proposed to grant to the State of California sections sixteenth and thirty-sixth, in every township, for purposes of schools. I do not know, Mr. President, what is the reason for that difference in this act, from the course which has been taken in regard to other States and Territories, with the exception of Oregon, and why it is proposed to grant two sections in every township for the support of schools. I do not look upon it as a grant to a State; but I suppose that these donations are made by way of encouraging persons to settle upon the public lands, and that they are given to the towns as an inducement that they will have this land appropriated to schools; while in the other land States the sixteenth section alone has been reserved. I understand the thirty-sixth section was also reserved in Oregon and dedicated to schools. But I suppose that arose from the peculiar condition of that country. A different system from that which has been adopted in the other States and Territories was adopted there by way of inducing persons to go into that remote region to occupy that territory, then belonging to the United States, which had remained unsettled by citizens of the United States for many years. I do not know that any such bounty is necessary to induce settlements in California; and I therefore move to strike out the words "and thirty-sixth."

Mr. GWIN. If the Senator from Missouri will take into consideration the time when the Oregon bill passed, he will find that it was within the last two years, and that it has precisely the same provision which is in this bill. I am sure that the same advantages, in regard to education, are due to the people of California which have been granted to the people of Oregon. It seems to me it would be a most flagrant act of favoritism to give to the people of Oregon, who are divided from the people of California only by an imaginary line, double the amount of land for school purposes which you give to the people of California. As to the inducements to emigration, the Oregon bill was passed with more especial reference to the settled policy of the Government; and the same course will be pursued with respect to remote Territories hereafter. I hope this distinction will not be drawn against the people of California, when the same amount of land precisely has been granted to the people of Oregon, and when there are many advantages given to the people of that Territory which are not asked for in this bill. The donation principle is admitted in the bill for Oregon; and though we will contend for that principle hereafter, if the homestead bill does not become a law, all we ask now is simply that we may have the land system extended to California, and the same amount of land granted for school purposes as was granted to Oregon.

Mr. GEYER. Mr. President, if I thought my proposition would have the effect of a discrimination against California, I would withdraw the motion to amend at once; but it is because there is a discrimination in favor of California that I have made the motion. Provisions are proposed to be made for the people of California, which were never made for those of any other State. I would have no earthly objection to the dedication of four sections of land in every township, for the purposes of schools, if that is to be the system to be adopted in reference to the public lands; indeed, I believe the interests of the Government would be promoted by providing that four sections in every township should be given for that purpose, instead of one. But my attention was called to this by the fact that in every other land State, the sixteenth section alone has been reserved for the benefit of schools, and I am not able to understand why a discrimination was made in favor of California. It was made in the case of Oregon, and it was made as an exception, and I supposed it arose from the fact that some additional inducement was necessary to be offered to prevail on persons to go into that remote region and settle; it was to some extent necessary for the defense of that Territory of the United States, that it should be occupied by citizens of our own country, and on that account I supposed it was that two sections were dedicated to school purposes in every township. I do not understand that the same reason exists now in relation to California, and I beg the Senator from that State [Mr. GWIN] to understand that it is because it is making an exception, departing from our general policy, that I object to it. Allowing, and believing it to be good policy for the Government generally to appropriate a larger portion of the public land than has heretofore been appropriated for purposes of education, it is only because this seems to be an exception to the general policy that I object.

Mr. SHIELDS. I will state to the Senator from Missouri, [Mr. GEYER.] that when I was on the Committee on Public Lands, we had this bill before that committee, and I concurred in this provision in relation to California; and I did so from a conviction that even after this bill had passed, California would have less valuable school land than either the State of the honorable Senator or my own. Such is the character of the country, that though they get nominally twice as much land, they will really have less in value. Now, the Senator knows that the whole of that country is of an entirely different formation from anything on this side of the mountains; that the only portion of the country capable of cultivation, is that lying along the rivers, and even that, in most instances, must be irrigated in order to be profitably cultivated. I take it for granted that the country is very much like that which we saw in Mexico, when we passed through it, rather of an Asiatic formation; and if so, California, even if you double the quantity given to other States, would have a less quantity of valuable land, given for this purpose, than the State of Missouri, or Iowa, or Illinois. That was the impression upon which I acted then, and I am satisfied, that if the Senator will reflect for a moment that that country is only capable of being cultivated along the rivers, and even there, in many instances, only by irrigation, he will see that this land will not be sufficient to afford the means of education which we have in the States of the Mississippi valley, where the land is so much more fertile.

Mr. BORLAND. I am in favor of retaining this proviso, on the general ground that it is a proper and good policy to double the quantity of land usually given for common-school purposes; and in connection with this, I will mention now—for I presume some Senators may have forgotten it—that, two years ago, the Senate passed, without a dissenting voice, a bill granting to all the new States having public lands within their borders, this additional section of land in each township, and further allowing an exchange of all the school sections, where they might be found to be of inferior or unsalable quality. The bill was introduced by myself, and was reported favorably upon by the Committee on Public Lands. It passed the Senate, and most probably did not pass the House in consequence of its not being reached. Such a bill, I believe, is on the Calendar now from the Committee on Public Lands. I trust, therefore, that you will pass this section as it is. I think it is desirable that it should be passed. I did suggest to the Senator from California that it might be well to amend it by making the provision applicable to all the States; but as he wishes his bill to stand upon its own merits, I will not offer that amendment.

Mr. GEYER. As I said before, I am not disposed to press this amendment, because I believe the provision of the bill, as it now stands, to be unjust to other States; not on that ground at all. The explanation given by the Senator from Illinois has satisfied me that this case may probably be an exception. The lands of California may probably not be such lands as would be of any great value. At the same time, I am pleased to learn that the Senate, on one occasion, have passed an act to extend it to other States; and I, for one, would be ready to vote for such a proposition as would equalize grants to the States to any number of sections not exceeding four sections to every township for the purposes of education. I withdraw the amendment.

Mr. FELCH. I wish to offer an additional proviso to the sixth section:

The amendment was read, as follows:

And provided further, That this act shall not be construed to authorize any settlements to be made in any tract of country in the occupation of any Indian tribes, or to grant any preemption right to the same.

Mr. GWIN. The rights of the Indians to any territory in California are merely possessory; and I would like to learn from the Senator from Michigan whether this would have any reference to certain settlements made by the Board of Indian Commissioners under treaties which they made, and which, perhaps, it is not improper to say, were not confirmed by the Senate. They have been placed on portions of the public land they did not occupy before. I am quite willing to concede that these Indians have possessory rights, as they had them when the country came into the possession of the United States, when they occupy the same locations, but there are at present very few of them in the agricultural districts. Those who are located in the agricultural districts were chiefly at the mission stations. I believe there were at one time some thirty thousand Indians at the various missions in California. There are some few Indian villages on the Sacramento and other rivers. There is one on Captain Sutter's possessions. But they are diminishing every year, and I am not anxious to disturb them in their possessions, but am also unwilling to acknowledge any right of soil in these tribes. Let them remain at the villages they now occupy, and confine the operation of the proviso to that object, and I will not oppose it.

Mr. SHIELDS. I would take the liberty of asking the Senator from California, what provision is made in regard to the land occupied by these Indian missions?

Mr. GWIN. None at all. It does not bear upon them. A large number of grants have been made of lands formerly cultivated by the missions. The bill merely relates to the public domain distinct from the lands. These lands, for a few varas immediately around the missions, are claimed by the priests, and these claims are, I presume, being adjudicated upon by the board of commissioners. The bill has no reference to these claims whatever. They may be brought before Congress in a separate bill, if it is decided that the board of land commissioners have not power to extend to them the relief which the representatives of the church ask.

Mr. FELCH. My object in offering this amendment is certainly not to embarrass any of the settlers of California. A suggestion was made by the Senator from Virginia, that we might possibly, in legislating on this matter, be interfering with some of the rights of the Indians of that country. The truth is, that we have little actual knowledge on the subject of the Indian tribes in that country. Officially, we have none, for I believe we have no treaties that ever were made with any of them. It is, however, understood that a large portion of the country occupied by the whites is relieved of the original inhabitants. Still I understand that there are portions of the country to which the Indians have retired—perhaps mineral portions—and which they are occupying to a considerable extent. My object was to avoid the possibility of white people going among the Indians and making settlements, and claiming that the United States had given sanction to it by this law in opposition to the rights of the Indians. The way to get rid of the Indians is not by sending white men to claim rights among them. It is to form treaties with them, as the Government has heretofore done, according to the provisions of the Constitution. Although this bill is intended to provide for those settlers who are now there, and those who may go there within a limited time, I think we should endeavor to keep it free from all embarrassments of the kind to which I have alluded. I therefore apprehend, that while this proviso will not interfere with any settlements made there, because the settlements will be made where there are no Indians, yet I think it is a safeguard which is due to the Indian themselves, and which we ought to throw around their rights. I do not apprehend that this proviso will embarrass anybody; but, on the other hand, it seems to me to be quite proper that we should give the Indian that security which I desire to give him by this proviso.

Mr. GWIN. I shall not oppose it. I do not think it will have any particular bearing any way.

The question was then taken on the amendment, and it was agreed to; and the section, as finally amended, is as follows:

"Sec. 6. And be it further enacted, That all the public lands in the State of California, whether surveyed or unsurveyed, with the exception of sections sixteen and thirty-six, which shall be and hereby are granted to the State for the purposes of public schools in each township, and with the exception of lands appropriated under the authority of this act, or reserved by competent authority, and excepting also the lands claimed under any foreign grant or title, and the mineral lands, shall be subject to the preemption laws of 4th September, 1841, and shall, after the plats thereof are returned to the office of the register, be offered for sale, after six months' public notice in the State of the time and place of sale under the laws, rules, and regulations now governing such sales, or such as may be hereafter prescribed: Provided, That where unsurveyed lands are claimed by preemption, the usual notice of such claim shall be filed within three months after the return of the plats of surveys to the land offices, and proof and payment shall be made prior to the day appointed by the President's proclamation for the commencement of the sale, including such lands, the entry to such claims to be made by legal subdivisions, according to the United States surveys, and in the most compact form: And provided further, That the restrictions in the act of 4th September, 1841, as to the extent of the possessions of the claimant, and of quitting or abandoning his residence on his own land to reside on public land in this State, shall interpose no bar to their obtaining the benefits of this act; and all of said lands that shall remain unsold after having been proclaimed and offered, shall be subject to entry at private sale as other public land, and at the same minimum price per acre; and the register and receiver shall not be entitled to any percentage or fees, except for deciding preemption cases, when each of them shall be allowed the same fees as are paid to other like officers; but the receiver shall be entitled to his actual necessary expenses, going and returning in making his deposits: Provided, That nothing in this act shall be construed to authorize any settlement to be made on any public land not surveyed, unless the same be made within one year from the passage of this act; nor shall any rights of such settlers be recognized by virtue of any settlement or improvement made on such unsurveyed lands subsequent to that date: And provided further, That this act shall not be construed to authorize any settlements to be made in any tract of country in the occupation of any Indian tribes, or to grant any preemption rights to the same."

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question will now be on concurring in the several amendments made as in Committee of the Whole.

The amendments were concurred in, and the bill was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading.

EXCHANGES OF SCHOOL LANDS.

Mr. MALLORY. I now move that the Senate postpone all prior orders, with a view to take up "A bill allowing exchanges of school lands, and authorizing selections for deficiencies in certain cases."

The motion was agreed to.

The bill was read a second time, and considered as in Committee of the Whole.

It provides, that where any tract of land which has been set apart for the use of schools in any of the several States which contain public land, has been or shall be found of inferior quality, unfit for cultivation, or unfavorably located, the proper school authorities of such State may, and they are hereby authorized to relinquish the same under such rules and regulations as may be prescribed by the Commissioner of the General Land Office, and to select in lieu thereof, in legal subdivisions, a quantity not to exceed the number of acres of the tract so relinquished, of any of the unclaimed and unappropriated public lands then subject to private entry at the minimum price, situated within the township where said relinquished land was situated; or should none of good quality remain in the township, then the selection may be made in each case from any such land within the limits of the particular State, the selection to embrace at one and the same time all the land authorized to be taken by the authorities making the exchange, and to be entered and recorded at the proper land office of the district in which the selected land may lie; and upon the approval by the Secretary of the Interior of the new selection under authority of this act, a patent shall issue as in other cases: provided, that before any such patent shall issue, or any right or interest attach to the land so selected, the proper authorities holding the title to the land proposed to be exchanged, shall execute and deliver to the United States proper deed or deeds, to be approved by the Secretary of the Interior, conveying to the United States an unencumbered title to the premises so proposed to be exchanged; and also, that the principles of the act entitled "An act to authorize the selection of certain school lands in the Territories of Florida, Iowa, and Wisconsin," approved the 15th of June, 1854, and which have been heretofore held to be applicable only to actually surveyed townships, in which the sixteenth section therein was either in whole or in part covered by confirmed titles, leaving other public land in said township be extended so as to apply to those tracts of country, in any of the States referred to in the first section of this act, covered by large private claims, which embrace a greater area than a township and which, therefore, may have precluded the survey in the usual rectangular mode of what would have been a township of public land; and also, that the land authorized to be selected and granted by this act, may be, by the proper State authorities, disposed of for the same purpose and in the same manner as other school lands heretofore granted.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, and ordered to be engrossed for a third reading.

WEST FELICIANA RAILROAD.

Mr. BROOKE. I ask for the postponement of the previous orders, for the purpose of taking up Senate bill No. 306. It is a bill for the relief of the West Feliciana Railroad Company.

The motion was agreed to, and the bill was taken up as in Committee of the Whole.

The bill has been published heretofore. It provides that the duties paid by the West Feliciana Railroad Company on certain iron rails imported by the company in 1836, be refunded by the Government.

Mr. DAWSON. I propose the following additional section to the bill, covering the same principle for a similar object:

Sec. 2. Be it further enacted, That the Secretary of the Treasury be, and is hereby, authorized to refund to the Georgia Railroad and Banking Company the duties collected on certain railroad iron imported by said company: Provided, That the said company shall prove to the satisfaction of the Secretary of the Treasury, that the rails so imported were actually laid down at, or about, the time when the rails of the Red River Company, the Central Georgia Railroad and Banking Company, and the Munroe Railroad Company were laid down, on the rails of which companies Congress has already remitted the duties.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. BRODHEAD. I should really like to know what peculiarity there is in these two cases, that should cause Congress to remit the duty on this iron? Other companies, I believe, pay duties on railroad iron. If there is anything peculiar in these two cases that would make them exceptions to the general rule, I should like to know it.

Mr. BROOKE. In accordance with the request of the Senator from Pennsylvania, I will state the facts of this case. By an act passed in July, 1832, all the railroad iron imported within five years thereafter, and actually laid down, was to be admitted free of duty. In 1836, iron was imported by the West Feliciana Railroad Company—a portion of it was taken direct to New Orleans, and a portion to New York. That part of the iron which was sent to New Orleans was lost by the sinking of the steamer Choctaw, while on her way up the river; and in consequence of difficulties having occurred in securing the right of way, that portion which was conveyed to New York was not laid down within the five years specified by the act, although it was imported within that time; and the company now ask that the duties be refunded to them, inasmuch as they complied, so far as they could, with the act of 1832. I ask for the reading of the report, which sets forth all the facts.

Mr. DAWSON. My friend from Pennsylvania, who represents the iron interest, [Mr. BRODHEAD,] will find that this amendment comes in competition with no interest which he represents. It is only to perform an act of justice, which has been recognized in this body for eighteen years past. It will be recollected that in 1832 the Government of the United States, for the purpose of encouraging internal improvements by the States, permitted railroad iron to be brought in free, as these duties had an oppressive effect upon individual and State enterprise. The act was continued in force down through 1836 and 1837, and until 1842. The facts in regard to that matter have been properly stated by the Senator from Mississippi, [Mr. BROOKE.]

As early as 1833, Georgia undertook to connect the Northern with the Gulf States by a railroad communication, and to open a way for travel to the Mississippi valley. We expended more capital, undertook more weighty contracts, and executed them with greater rapidity than any other State in the Union, altogether for the convenience of the country, and at an immense loss, for our stock went down to forty cents on the dollar. But we have survived all that. It so happened that large shipments of railroad iron were ordered before the passage of the act of 1842, but they did not arrive until after that act went into operation, and duties were paid. From time to time the railroad companies in Georgia, and throughout the South generally, have applied for a remission of the duties, and they have been remitted. The Feliciana Railroad Company applied ten years ago for a remission of duties on this iron. The money which was paid by the company went into the Treasury, and bills for the relief of the company have passed one body or the other heretofore, but have failed to pass through both. All we ask now is, to be placed on precisely the same footing as other companies, and that we may have simple justice done, asking no donations, expecting no liberality, that has not been extended to others. To think of my friend from Pennsylvania, [Mr. BRODHEAD,] who expects me to aid his iron-mongers, rising up and opposing such a measure as this—it is shocking! Why, the money has already been paid over to the Government; and paid, too, under circumstances which did not require it of them more than of other companies which have been exempt.

I am looking at my smiling friend from Iowa, [Mr. DODGE,] and want to remind him that we, in Georgia, have not had a particle of aid in the construction of our great railroad route. We have not had extended to us the same degree of liberality which has been shown by Congress to the new States, nor have we asked it; all that we ask now is justice. I call on the Senators from Iowa, from Illinois, from Tennessee, and from Missouri, and ask them whether they are willing to refuse us this act of justice, and to forget the benefits conferred on them by opening a road from Georgia to the banks of the Tennessee? We have tapped the valley of the Mississippi, and, owing to our exertions, you may now start from Washington, and travel by railroad to the banks of that beautiful river—the Tennessee. Having executed this great work—having carried the road over mountains, having sometimes tunneled mountains, having ordered the iron, which was to have been laid down before the act of 1842 passed, is there anything unreasonable in our coming forward and asking for the remission of the duties paid? Is there anything wrong in it? Certainly not. Why should not this section pass?

My friend from New Jersey, [Mr. MILLER,] if I am not mistaken, reported in favor of this claim some few years ago, when it was under the control of my late colleague Mr. Berrien; and it has been repeatedly reported on favorably.

The facts are what I stated them to be. Under the law of 1832 the iron was ordered, but did not arrive in Georgia until after the act of 1842 had gone into operation. Every other company, similarly situated, has had its duties remitted—the Central Railroad Company had its duties remitted; the Munroe Railroad Company had its duties remitted, and all that we ask is, to be put on a par with those companies; that, having aided by our enterprise in opening a speedy communication with the West, the few thousand dollars which we paid, in the shape of duties, may be refunded, as has been done in all other cases. The losses of the company have been great, and render them more urgent in demanding that measure of justice, which, I am sure, no member of this body can deny, after having accorded it to all others. Certainly, no one can refuse that to one section of the country which has been done for another.

Mr. ATCHISON. By way of reciprocating the extreme liberality always shown by the Senator from Georgia [Mr. Dawson] to the West, and particularly in relation to the public lands, I will make this proposition to him: If he will accept, in lieu of the money paid by way of duties upon this railroad iron, lands that have been offered for sale at $1 25 per acre, I will give it my consideration.

Mr. DAWSON. I have one word to say in reply. It is the honor of the Government that I am desirous of protecting. We paid the duties in money, and the Government surely would not wish us to take the value of it in lands.

Mr. ATCHISON. The Senator charges $2 50 per acre for public lands when we make a bargain for some, particularly for railroad routes; and I thought I was conferring a favor on him by suggesting the possibility of his getting lands at a reasonable rate. He estimates these public lands much higher than we do; indeed, much higher than money, and I conceived that I was making a very liberal proposition.

Mr. COOPER. After the very pathetic appeal made by my friend from Georgia, [Mr. Dawson,] I feel very great reluctance in opposing his amendment. However, notwithstanding his appeal, I shall have to put myself in the same category with that of my colleague, [Mr. Brodhead,] I am opposed to the amendment offered by the honorable Senator from Georgia; although, as I understand the proposition, I am not opposed to that of the Senator from Mississippi, relating to the West Feliciana Railroad Company. I understand that that comes under the provisions of an act passed a number of years ago, by which the duties were designed to be remitted on iron imported for certain railroads. The amendment proposed by the Senator from Georgia does not follow the principle of the law to which I have just referred; and although I have no doubt that a few thousand dollars put into the pocket of this great company would enable it to extend its operations and divide larger profits to the stockholders, yet when I begin to grant bounties, I shall not grant them to great corporations. I am in favor of protection to American industry so far as protection can be afforded by discrimination in levying duties. If I could abandon the principle at all, it would not be in favor of great corporations; it would be in favor of those who we are told suffer from the imposition of the duties. Sir, on some other occasion I may attempt to prove to the Senate that the imposition of duties does not always, nor even generally, enhance the price, but that it has a contrary effect. It is very easy to show, too, by reference to particular articles, for instance, the article of nails, that a duty of four cents per pound was at one time imposed, and very speedily we brought the whole price down to three and one fourth cents per pound. That is but one illustration of the effect to which I have referred. But I believe, that whilst I am willing to grant that which the principle of the act of 1836 intended to grant, I am not willing to go any further, and give bounties to these great corporations.

Mr. BRODHEAD. I would inquire of the Senator from Georgia whether the amendment which he proposes has ever been acted upon by a committee of this body?

Mr. DAWSON. I understand that it has been acted upon several years ago; and I believe the Senator from New Jersey [Mr. MILLER] can verify the fact. I have been referred by the Hon. John P. King to papers stating all these facts, and alleging their existence.

I regret very much to hear the Senator from Pennsylvania express the idea that the duties on iron do not enter into the prices paid. If that be true, then no protection is wanted upon iron. But my impression was that the duties were paid by the consumer. That is my position; but we will not controvert that point. I wish, however, to state the facts in regard to this case a little further. In 1832, a law was passed permitting railroad iron to come in free of duty. That law remained in force for five years, and it was extended for five years more, namely, till 1842, when it was altered, permitting, however, all railroad iron which had been then ordered, or was on the way, to be admitted duty free. Some of this iron was not laid down for three or four years after this alteration of the law, owing to the poverty of the companies, and yet the duty was remitted upon it. That grew out of the character of the times. Now, here are Senators on this floor, from every State of the Union, all of which began their improvements about that time, and I ask if a single company, in any one State, has been required to pay the duties, or if they have paid them under the circumstances prescribed by the act of 1842, whether they have not been remitted? Yes, sir, all of them. These are the only two exceptions. The Georgia railroad is a private company. On the rails laid along part of this great line the duties were remitted; but on this other part they were not remitted, owing to the facts I have stated. Now, gentlemen say that, having got so much, why should we ask for more? But, sir, see what the little State of Georgia has done with her own capital! She has carried out this great link at an enormous expense; and if we are disposed to encourage the States to make these internal improvements, which are useful to the whole nation, this is certainly one of them. Gentlemen talk about having a connecting link from Boston to Louisiana. What State in the whole Union has done more than Georgia to carry out such a link? What State has expended more millions for the public convenience than that State? Massachusetts, I understand, is the first State in the Union in regard to railroads; New York, I believe, is next; I believe Pennsylvania is next, and Georgia is the next to Pennsylvania.

Now, let me mention another fact. For years our stock was a perfect sacrifice. The original constructors of these roads lost fifty per cent. on the value of their stock. They realized no dividends for years, and still, through their energy and perseverance, with the view of accomplishing the purpose originally intended, they did carry that purpose out. I believe, however, the Senate has no disposition to debate the matter any further.

A SENATOR. What is the amount?

Mr. DAWSON. I do not know, but the matter is to be brought entirely within the provisions which have been applied to all the other bills which have been passed; and the Secretary of the Treasury is to say whether all the facts are as alleged, so as to bring this case within the provisions of the law which has been provided for cases of this kind. He is to decide, after an examination of the facts, whether it comes within the principle. We have surrounded that principle in every way, with every safeguard, for the protection of the Treasury. This matter does not at all interfere with the iron interest; and even if the money is taken out of the Treasury, that ought to be no reason why the iron interest should oppose it. I dislike to see the iron interest get into a squabble about so small a matter as this.

Mr. HALE. Mr. President—
The PRESIDING OFFICER, (Mr. NORRIS in the chair.) The Chair will suggest that this debate is not in order, as there is nothing at this moment before the committee. It will be better to allow the bill to be reported to the Senate, as the amendment has been agreed to in Committee of the Whole.

Mr. HALE. Then let the bill be reported to the Senate.

Mr. BORLAND. Before the question is taken on concurring in the amendment, I want to make an inquiry from the Senator from Georgia.

Mr. HALE. I am entitled to the floor. I yielded in consequence of the Chair having informed me that there was nothing before the committee.

The bill was then reported to the Senate as amended, and the question recurred on concurring in the amendment.

Mr. HALE. Let the amendment be read.
It was accordingly read.

Mr. HALE. I heard but a little of the remarks of the Senator from Georgia, and what I did hear pleased me so much, that I regret that I did not hear more. But I believe that Senator is right in saying that Congress has uniformly released the duties in cases of this sort. Under these circumstances, if the iron was ordered under a law which admitted it free of duty, in the expectation that it would be received under the operation of that law, and there was a failure to receive it prior to the passage of a new act changing the terms on which it might be received and imposing duties, Congress has remitted the duties. I am willing to go as far as that now; but I wish to have the assurance that such is the fact with reference to this bill. We do not know when the iron was ordered, or when it was received, but we are called upon to pass an act, provided the Secretary of the Treasury shall be satisfied that the rails were received at the time that certain other rails were received. The Senator from Georgia shall have my vote, if he can show that the iron was ordered under a law which would admit it free of duty, or with a low duty, and that from any casualty it failed to be received till a higher duty was fixed, as I am for imposing only such a duty as would have been proper when the iron was ordered; but that is not shown.

Mr. MILLER. As I reported this bill to the Senate, I wish to make a few remarks. By the act of 1832, Congress declared that the duties on any railroad iron imported and laid down within three years after the passage of that act should be remitted. Congress extended the terms of that act to 1845, I think. In this case, all the iron was imported within the time. Part of it was lost in the Mississippi river, by the sinking of the steamboat which was transporting it to New Orleans, and, of course, could not be laid down. The company could not give their affidavit that the iron had been laid down; hence the necessity of an act to relieve them in that respect. The remainder of the iron, as the petitioners stated, was not laid down within the three years, owing to difficulties from pressure in the money market, which they did not anticipate, and for other sufficient reasons. But it was all afterwards laid down upon their own road. As Congress has remitted the duties in numerous cases of a similar character, and as this comes within the spirit of the act of 1832, I think it should pass. In the case of the company in Georgia, I believe the iron was ordered previous to the passage of the act of 1842.

Mr. DAWSON. It was in 1841.

Mr. MILLER. But I think it did not get into the country within the three years prescribed in the act.

Mr. DAWSON. No, sir.

Mr. MILLER. In the case of the Feliciana railroad the iron was imported within the three years; but in the case of the Georgia railroad it was not. But the Feliciana company did not lay down the iron within three years, owing to peculiar embarrassments. A bill for their relief has once passed the Senate. My friend from Pennsylvania need not be at all alarmed about the passage of this bill.

Mr. DAVIS. I should be glad to see something on the face of the amendment by which a proper case can be shown. I quite agree that this case falls within the spirit and meaning and principle of the act permitting the iron to be imported free, and the act of 1842. At the same time I should be very much disappointed if we were to open, by any process of legislation, a new class of cases. If there were anything in the amendment which would show that this case belonged to that class of cases, so that we are all satisfied that we are not opening new ground for further applications from other persons not in the same condition, I should be better satisfied likewise. I am satisfied, from the explanation of the Senator from New Jersey, that it is within that class of cases.

Mr. DAWSON. I think the whole thing is sufficiently evident on the face of it. I will read the amendment again, for the information of the Senator. It is as follows:

SEC. 2. Be it further enacted, That the Secretary of the Treasury be, and is hereby, authorized to refund to the Georgia Railroad and Banking Company the duties collected on certain railroad iron imported by said company: Provided, That the said company shall prove to the satisfaction of the Secretary of the Treasury that the rails so imported were actually laid down at or about the time when the rails of the Red River Company, the Central Georgia Railroad and Banking Company, and the Munroe Railroad Company, were laid down, on the rails of which companies Congress has already remitted the duties.

The object was to place the case within the laws at present existing.

Mr. FELCH. It seems to me that we ought to subject this amendment to the examination of a committee. The facts in the case are scarcely known to the Senate at all. On two former occasions a petition was presented to Congress, and in both instances, I believe, was referred to the Committee on Finance, and no report was ever made, I believe, from any committee; so that we have here, as an amendment to a bill, a claim which has never received the sanction or examination of any committee at all.

Mr. DAWSON. If the Senator will pardon me, I will state that this subject was acted upon before I was in the Senate, and that, as I understand it, the several railroad companies were sought to be relieved by a general bill; but that afterwards they were taken up separately. I know that at that time the honorable Mr. King, who, by the by, is now president of this railroad company, had charge of it, and he turned it over to the care of Mr. Berrien.

Mr. FELCH. It has never before appeared upon the records of the Senate. It seems to have been referred to a committee, but never reported upon. The other companies referred to in this amendment presented their claims, and they were referred to committees, and reported favorably upon. Now I am perfectly willing to apply to this case the same rules which have been applied to other cases; and in order that it may be done, I move to recommit the bill to the committee.

Mr. DAWSON. I am informed that a bill has once passed the other House relating to this very case, before.

Mr. FELCH. I hope the bill may be recommended to the Committee on Finance.

Mr. BROOKE. I hope the Senator from Michigan will not persist in his motion to recommit the bill. I think it would be unfair that my bill, to which there is no objection, should be impeded by the amendment of the Senator from Georgia. I trust, that rather than recommit the bill, the Senate will vote down the amendment and let my bill go on its way rejoicing.

Mr. FELCH. My object is not to embarrass the bill of the Senator from Mississippi; but I am not willing to vote for the amendment of the Senator from Georgia until it has been referred.

Mr. DAWSON. I dislike to embarrass the bill of the Senator from Mississippi; but I also dislike to see opposition to the claim of Georgia alone. I put her in company with Mississippi, not with the view of weakening her claim, but rather on the supposition that being in such good company it might be strengthened. But if it is thought desirable to recommit the bill, I will withdraw my amendment rather than his bill should be jeopardized. I will say, however, to my friend from Michigan, that I do not think he need be alarmed. He might permit the bill to pass to a third reading, and if by to-morrow he should see any reason to reconsider the matter he could make the motion to reconsider, and the bill could be reconsidered accordingly.

Mr. MILLER. I hope that motion will not be concurred in. I will suggest that the further consideration of the bill had better be postponed until to-morrow, and, in the mean time, the Senator from Georgia (Mr. DAWSON) can so amend the section as to render it unobjectionable to the Senate. I will state, that I am not entirely satisfied myself with the phraseology of the amendment. I will again suggest to the Senator from Michigan (Mr. FELCH) that he should withdraw his motion, and allow the bill to pass over until to-morrow.

Mr. DAWSON. I have no objection to the course suggested by the Senator from New Jersey, [Mr. MILLER,] provided that the Senator from Mississippi (Mr. BROOKE) has no objection to it. If the bill should be postponed until to-morrow, I will ask the Senator from Michigan (Mr. FELCH) to look over it in the mean time, and change the language for the purpose of improving it.

Mr. MILLER. I now move to postpone the further consideration of the bill until to-morrow. The motion was agreed to.

THE DEFICIENCY BILL.

A message was received from the House of Representatives, by the hands of Mr. P. B. HAYES, Chief Clerk, announcing that the House had considered the amendments of the Senate to the bill to supply deficiencies in the appropriations for the service of the fiscal year ending the 30th of June, 1852, and that the House had rejected several of the Senate amendments, had concurred in some with amendments, and had concurred in others.

Mr. HUNTER. I ask the unanimous consent of the Senate to be allowed to make a motion. I move to refer the bill which has just come from the House of Representatives to the Committee on Finance.

The motion was agreed to.

EXECUTIVE SESSION.

On motion by Mr. GEYER, the Senate proceeded to the consideration of Executive business, and after some time spent therein, the doors were reopened; and

The Senate adjourned.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

WEDNESDAY, July 14, 1852.

The House met at eleven o'clock, a. m. Prayer by the Rev. C. M. BUTLER.

The Journal of yesterday was read and approved.

The SPEAKER stated as the first business in order the consideration of House bill No. 289, "granting the right of way and a portion of the public lands to the States of Indiana and Illinois, to aid in the construction of a railroad from Springfield, Illinois, to Terre Haute, in Indiana."

Mr. OLDS. At the request of the chairman of the Committee on the Post Office and Post Roads of the Senate, I ask leave to withdraw from the files of the House certain papers, for the purpose of sending them to the Senate.

There being no objection, it was so ordered.

LOCKPORT AND BUFFALO RAILROAD.

Mr. HAVEN. I ask the unanimous consent of the House to introduce the joint resolution which I send to the Chair.

The resolution was read for information, as follows:

Resolved by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled, That the right of way through the public lands of the United States lying in Black Rock, in the county of Erie, and State of New York, be, and the same is hereby, granted to the Lockport and Buffalo Railroad Company: Provided, That in the opinion of the President of the United States, such grant be not injurious to the public interest, and that the location shall be approved by the President, as to the position and width of the said railroad: And provided further, That if the said railroad shall not be completed within two years, or if at any time after its completion, the said railroad be discontinued or abandoned, the grant shall cease and determine.

Mr. SKELTON objected to its introduction.

Mr. HAVEN. I hope no objection will be made to this resolution, as it concerns mainly my own district, and as it is of consequence to the applicants that the grant shall be made at once, if at all. It is usual to pass resolutions of this kind. This House has done it in one or two instances this session. I remember one instance—the case of the plank road in North Carolina, the Payetteville road, and I think there have been others. In this case there is only eighteen acres of land, on which a defensive work called Fort Porter is situated. The fort is some thirty feet or more above the level of the Erie Canal. This land drops down a steep bank, and there is a small plat running along by the canal, on which the company propose to run the railroad track. It cannot go over the hills, or get into the city in any other way. I hope the objection will be withdrawn.

The SPEAKER. Is the objection withdrawn? Mr. SKELTON. No, sir. I object to it.

Mr. PRICE. I ask leave to offer the resolution which I send to the Clerk's desk.

Mr. MACE. I object.

Mr. PRICE. I hope the gentleman will let it be read for information. I am sure there can be no objection to it.

Mr. MACE. I object, and call for the regular order of business.

SPRINGFIELD AND TERRE HAUTE RAILROAD.

The SPEAKER. The regular order of business is the consideration of the Springfield and Terre Haute railroad bill.

Mr. DAVIS, of Indiana. Mr. Speaker, when this bill was reported back from the Committee on Public Lands a few days since, with a recommendation that it be passed, the House extended to me its courtesy by postponing the further consideration of it until to-day. I stated on that occasion that I had confidence in my ability to adduce such facts, and to impart such information as would satisfy the House that if there be merit in a single bill among the series introduced during the present session, embracing the alternate-section principle, there is merit in the one now under consideration. It is for this purpose, sir, that I ask the indulgence of the House for a few moments. I trust that I may ask this favor without being considered obtrusive, for I am confident that no one has occupied less of its time than myself. I intend to be brief, for I am well aware of the fact that much time has been consumed in the discussion of the principles involved in this bill. I am aware that not only the subject, but the patience of the House is well-nigh exhausted, and I am also aware that other great measures of public policy are pressing themselves upon the attention of gentlemen; nevertheless these are important measures—important to the Government, important to the country, and consequently entitled to a fair, deliberate, and candid hearing.

This is a bill granting the right of way, and a small portion of the public lands to aid in the construction of a railroad from Terre Haute, in the State of Indiana, to Springfield, in the State of Illinois, and similar, in all its provisions, to the bill passed during the present session, granting the right of way and a portion of the public lands to aid in the construction of a railroad from Hannibal to St. Joseph, in the State of Missouri. It is contended by honorable gentlemen on this floor, that Congress has no constitutional power thus to dispose of the public domain. The friends of this measure, however, contend that Congress has this power; and, in support of their opinion, refer to the following clause in the Constitution:

"Congress shall have power to dispose of, and make all needful rules and regulations respecting, the territory or other property belonging to the United States."

Sir, I am not a lawyer, and do not claim for myself any peculiar qualification to decide upon or to construe more correctly than another the constitutional law; but, looking at this provision of the Constitution as a plain, practical question, I cannot resist the conviction that the power in Congress is full and ample to dispose of the public lands in the manner and for the purposes sought by this bill. If, however, I distrusted my own judgment, I have the satisfaction to know that every Administration of the Government, from that of Washington down to the present time, have recognized this power in Congress, and have given it their sanction and approval. The numerous instances in which similar grants have been made by Congress, and approved by the Executive, coming down to us through our country's political history, have been so often referred to in debate during the present session, I regard it as a work of supererogation were I to call the attention of the House to them again. It is sufficient for me to say that I am not embarrassed by a single doubt as to the constitutional power of Congress to make these grants. It is, to my mind, clearly a question of policy, of expediency, and as such I intend to treat it.

By casting your eye over the map of the country, you will see that the cities of Philadelphia, Columbus in Ohio, Indianapolis and Terre Haute in Indiana, and Hannibal and St. Joseph in Missouri, are nearly on the same parallel of latitude; a line of railroad on this route would open a direct communication between the Atlantic cities and the heart of the fertile region of the upper Mississippi. Within the next eighteen months that part of this line of road will be completed from Philadelphia to Indianapolis; between Indianapolis and Terre Haute the road is in operation; between Springfield and Quincy a great portion of the road is finished, and the balance rapidly progressing towards completion. The grant of lands to the State of Missouri made during the present session, and to which I have before referred, with the private capital of that rich and enterprising State, will at once enable her to construct the road from Hannibal to St. Joseph, thereby making this great chain complete, except that part between Terre Haute and Springfield, a distance of one hundred and twenty-six miles. The object of the bill under consideration is to supply this link.

From a statement prepared at the General Land Office, and now in my possession, it is estimated that about sixty-one thousand acres of land will be granted by the passage of this bill, a portion of which have been in market and subject to private entry since 1816, and the residue since 1823. They are refuse lands, situated in the middle of a vast prairie, and utterly worthless to the Government; but, sir, pass this bill, aid the private enterprise of the country to add this last link to this great national thoroughfare which must in a few years be continued westward to the Pacific ocean, and they will at once become valuable, and find a ready market at the minimum price of $2 50 per acre, as fixed by this bill. They will be settled and brought into cultivation by an energetic and enterprising people, who, by their labor and industry, will add something to the wealth and prosperity of the country. They will no longer remain a barren waste, valueless to the Government, and an obstacle and barrier to the settlement and improvement of the West.

But it is contended that the value of the alternate sections reserved to the Government by the provisions of this bill will not be increased in value. My experience, sir, compels me to a conclusion directly opposite. In my State about four hundred miles of railroad have already been constructed. The value of real estate immediately contiguous to these roads, without a single exception, has been augmented from one to three hundred per cent., and I think I might safely challenge gentlemen to point to me a single instance where the like result has not been produced by like causes. Let me ask them, would not this principle apply with peculiar force to the case under consideration? These lands are as rich and fertile as any upon which the sun shines; but situated as they are—forming a part of an extensive plain, remote from timber, stone, and other materials for inclosing, building, and other purposes—it is unreasonable to suppose that they will be purchased from the Government while millions of acres of lands equally rich and fertile, possessing all these advantages, can be bought at the same price. But assure to the purchaser of these lands a facility of access and speedy communication with the markets, and I can assure you, sir, that no lands in the Western world will be sought after with greater avidity. These, sir, are some of the beneficial effects to be produced by the passage of this bill. I do not exaggerate or overestimate them. I speak from a full knowledge of the facts, acquired by a life spent in the West; and he who doubts the truth of my conclusions knows but little of western people, and the effect of such improvements upon the value of western lands.

I have intimated that this road is, in its character, national. I repeat it, sir. Completed from Philadelphia to St. Joseph, it will be the longest direct line of railroad on the globe—fourteen hundred miles in length. Passing through the center, or nearly so, of the States of Pennsylvania, Ohio, Indiana, Illinois, and Missouri, a country unequalled upon the face of the earth in its agricultural and manufacturing resources, and all the elements of wealth and greatness—about mid-way between the lakes of the North and the Ohio river—connected by railroads with Boston, New York, Baltimore, and other Atlantic cities—it will unite with the road from Louisville to Nashville and Savannah; to Charleston on the South, and by innumerable roads with the lakes of the North. By the completion of this road a communication and trade hitherto unknown will be opened between these distant regions, binding them together still more closely by the ties of interest, and promoting the common welfare of all. Nature, sir, has marked this as the great overland line of travel from the East to the West. Let me ask gentlemen, if this be not sufficient to stamp it as a work somewhat national in its character?

The bill is objected to because the lands sought to be appropriated lie within the State of Illinois, that State having heretofore been liberally provided for. True, sir, these lands are all within the borders of Illinois; there is not an acre of them within the State of Indiana. She received, a few years since, one million six hundred and nine thousand acres of land, to aid her in extending the Wabash and Erie canal to the Ohio river. I am proud on this occasion, as one of her Representatives, to express the gratitude she still feels for that munificent grant, every acre of which has been faithfully applied to its legitimate purposes. And more, sir; that canal will be completed during the present year, and the waters of the lakes will mingle with those of the Ohio. But, sir, is this objection well taken? The advantages of this grant will not inure to the exclusive benefit of Illinois. She does not come here pressing this bill. Missouri, Indiana, Ohio, Pennsylvania, and other States, have quite as deep an interest in the success of the measure as Illinois.

Now, if the measure be right and just, if the general interest of the country is to be advanced, will gentlemen give it their opposition on the ground alone that the interest of Illinois too is to be promoted by its success? Again, sir, the Ohio and Mississippi rivers are national in their character. Will gentlemen oppose appropriations of the public money for the improvement of these rivers, because thereby the interest of the States contiguous to them may be advanced in a greater ratio than the more remote States of the Union? I trust not. If, by the passage of this bill, sir, a link shall be added to a chain of great national communication, if its own merits commend it to the favorable consideration of the House, I would entreat gentlemen to support it as a measure for the good of the common country.

Mr. Speaker, I have listened with pain to the sectional turn gentlemen have in the course of debate, attempted to give these railroad propositions. I have heard with regret the terms "Western interests," "Western rapacity," "Western land piracy," applied to them. I cannot consent to pass them by in silence; I would be unworthy of a seat in this Hall if I did so. These remarks are gratuitous and out of place; they come with an ill grace from gentlemen whose States have shared so largely in the bounty of the Government, for constructing harbors, light-houses, breakwaters, and other important national improvements, out of moneys, too, paid into the common Treasury by the western and southwestern States as a tribute for the privilege of settling, subduing, and bringing under cultivation the western wilds. In all these appropriations, the West has been governed by a generous and liberal policy. No charge that the public interest had been retarded by the advancement of sectional interests has ever been heard from her Representatives on this floor, to my knowledge, nor will it ever be unless it be in self-defense.

Now, sir, let me tell gentlemen, that if this system of debate is to be persisted in, if western improvements and western measures are to be opposed upon sectional grounds, the West will take care of herself. It is said that "power is always stealing from the many to the few." This remark is peculiarly applicable to the present case, for the time is not far distant when the voice of the West will be more potent in these Halls than it is now.

Sir, I deplore sectional issues of every kind; we are a common brotherhood, seeking the same high destiny. No great measure of public policy can be adopted by this Government affecting the interests of one section, either for weal or for woe, without at the same time, to some extent, affecting the interests of the rest. Were I, sir, to seek a motto giving full expression to the sentiments of my own heart, it would be: "The North, the South, the East, the West, and the Center, one and inseparable, now and forever."

I have doubtless manifested some feeling and anxiety for the passage of this bill, but am unconscious of being governed by local or selfish considerations.

I desire, in conclusion, sir, to address a few words to those gentlemen who supported the Hannibal and St. Joseph railroad bill. That work will be almost valueless without the connection which will be provided for by the passage of this bill. It cannot exist without it. It is the Eastern trade and the Eastern travel which is to sustain it. Such were the views taken by the honorable gentleman from Missouri, [Mr. HALL,] in his able speech delivered in this House during the present session. Such, sir, are my views, and such must inevitably be the conclusion of every gentleman who will calmly and dispassionately investigate the subject.

Gentlemen seem at a loss to understand why it is that the new States have, within so short a period, from a mere handful of hardy pioneers, scattered over a vast, unbroken, and primitive wilderness, become populous, wealthy, and powerful; and in seeking for a solution of the problem, have, no doubt honestly, arrived at the conclusion that this wonderful spectacle is the result of favors bestowed upon them by the Government. The conclusion is erroneous. Were it possible for these gentlemen to go with me to the West, I would give them a practical answer. Sir, I would point them to the prairie and the forest; to the rich and fertile soil; to the exhaustless mineral resources; to the boundless fields of grain; to the beautiful rivers; to the millions of intelligent, enterprising, and industrious people, who have inherited the indomitable energy and patient endurance of their fathers of New England, the chivalrous daring of their ancestry in the sunny South, with the honesty and integrity of both. With such a heritage, sir, the result need not be speculative; it could not be other than it has been.

I trust the bill will pass. If it be in order, I move the previous question.

Mr. DEAN. I wish to make an inquiry of the gentleman [Mr. DAVIS] before he takes his seat; and that is, whether this road is not provided for in the general land bill proposed by Mr. BENNETT?

Mr. DAVIS. It is not.

Mr. JONES, of Tennessee. As the previous question is called for, I move to lay the bill upon the table.

Mr. AVERETT. I move that there be a call of the House, and on that motion demand the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

The question was then taken on the motion for a call, and it was disagreed to—yeas 54, nays 114.

The question then recurred on the motion to lay the bill upon the table.

Mr. MILLSON. I demand the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

Mr. MARSHALL, of Kentucky. I move the reference of the bill to the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union.

The SPEAKER. That motion is not in order; the pending question being to lay the bill upon the table.

The question was taken on the motion to lay the bill upon the table, and it was disagreed to—yeas 78, nays 101; as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Aiken, Allison, Averett, David J. Bailey, Thomas H. Bayly, Beale, Bibbhausa, Bocoek, Bragg, Buell, Burt, Caskey, Chapman, Churchwell, Cullom, Curtis, Daniel, George T. Previous to the announcement of the preceding vote,

Mr. MURPHY stated that he had paired off with Mr. HALL, who is absent from the city.

Mr. DAVIS, of Indiana. As the morning hour has expired, if it be in order, I withdraw my call for the previous question upon the passage of the bill under consideration, and to move to recommit the bill to the Committee on Public Lands, and upon which motion I call for the previous question.

APPORTIONMENT UNDER THE SEVENTH CENSUS OF THE UNITED STATES.

Mr. McLANAHAN. I ask the unanimous consent of the House to submit a report from the Committee on the Judiciary, with regard to fixing the number of Representatives, and to provide for their apportionment under the Seventh Census of the United States. It is a bill which ought to be printed at once.

There was no objection, and permission to report was accorded.

Mr. McLANAHAN. I am instructed by a majority of the Judiciary Committee to report back Senate bill No. 281, entitled "An act supplementary to 'An act providing for the taking of the seventh and subsequent censuses of the United States, and to fix the number of the members of the House of Representatives, and providing for their future apportionment among the several States,' approved 23d May, 1850."

Accompanying that bill, sir, as a minority of the Judiciary Committee, I submit a report, and I will here take occasion to state that, under the circumstances, I have no great objection to the passage of the Senate bill, because already many of the States have distrusted for representation. The act of 1850 on this subject has been so far executed in most of the States of this Union, that it would be impolitic and unwise now to repeal it. I desire, however, to enter my protest against it, and in my report I take the ground that the act of 1850 was in itself unconstitutional, and opposed to the uniform practice of this Government. A departure from the well-settled construction of the Constitution on this subject has occasioned all the delay, all the difficulty and embarrassment in which we are now involved. It is only by returning to the ways in which our fathers walked that we can proceed with safety.

Mr. HOUSTON. I call the gentleman to order.

Mr. McLANAHAN. I have but further to state, that the honorable gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. MARSHALL] also submits a minority report, which will be printed, under the motion that I now intend to make.

Mr. HOUSTON. I do not want to consume time which ought to be appropriated to other business, and therefore call the gentleman to order.

Mr. McLANAHAN. I move to refer the bill to the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union, and that the bill, and reports accompanying it, be printed.

Mr. MEADE. Will a motion to put the bill upon its passage take precedence?

The SPEAKER. It will not.

Mr. MEADE. I submit the motion that the bill be put upon its passage.

Mr. JONES, of Tennessee. I object to the motion.

The question was then taken, and the bill and accompanying reports were referred to the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union, and ordered to be printed.

DEFICIENCY BILL—COLLINS STEAMERS.

The SPEAKER. The question now recurs upon the motion to lay upon the table the motion made by the gentleman from Alabama, [Mr. WHITE,] to reconsider the vote by which the clause in the deficiency bill, for the increase of appropriation to the Collins line of steamers, was adopted.

Mr. HOUSTON demanded the yeas and nays; which were ordered.

The question was then taken on the motion to lay upon the table, and it was agreed to—yeas 92, nays 86; as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Aiken, Thomas H. Bayly, Bell, Bibb, Bowne, John H. Boyd, Briggs, Brooks, George H. Brown, Burrows, E. Carrington Cabell, Caldwell, Lewis D. Campbell, Carter, Chandler, Chapin, Clingman, Conger, Culom, Curtis, George T. Davis, Dean, Doty, Duncan, Evans, Florence, Fowler, Thomas J. D. Fuller, Gamble, Gilmore, Goodenow, Goodrich, Harper, Hart, Haws, Haven, Henn, Horsford, Howard, Thomas M. Howe, Thomas Y. How, Ingersoll, J. Glancy Jones, Kuhns, Kurtz, Landry, Lockhart, Mann, Edward C. Marshall, Martin, McCorkle, Meade, Miller, Miner, Henry D. Moore, John Moore, Morehead, Morris, Murray, Penn, Perkins, Porter, Price, Rantoul, Reed, Riddle, Robie, Robinson, Russell, Sackett, Schermerhorn, Schoolcraft, Seudder, David L. Seymour, Snow, Stanly, Frederick P. Stanton, Richard H. Stanton, Abraham P. Stephens, St. Martin, Strother, Stuart, Suberland, Taylor, Thurston, Walbridge, Walsh, Ward, Washburn, Welch, and Yates—92.

NAYS—Messrs. Abercrombie, Willis Allen, Allison, Averett, Babcock, David J. Bailey, Beale, Biscock, Bragg, Brenton, Buell, Burt, Busby, Joseph Cable, Thompson Campbell, Caskie, Chastain, Churchwell, Cobb, Daniel, Dawson, Disney, Durkee, Edgerton, Edmundson, Faulkner, Floyd, Freeman, Gentry, Gorman, Green, Grow, Hamilton, Isham G. Harris, Sampson W. Harris, Hendricks, Bibbard, Hillyer, Holladay, Houston, John W. Howe, Ives, Jackson, Jenkins, Andrew Johnson, James Johnson, Robert W. Johnson, Daniel T. Jones, George W. Jones, Preston King, Letcher, Mason, McLANAHAN, McMullin, McNair, McQueen, Millson, Molony, Murphy, Nabers, Olds, Andrew Parker, Samuel W. Parker, Peaslee, Penniman Phelps, Powell, Richardson, Robbins, Ross, Savage, Scurry, Origen S. Seymour, Skelton, Smith, Benjamin Stanton, Thaddeus Stevens, Sweetser, Townsend, Venable, Wallace, Watkins, Alexander White, Wilcox, Wildrick, and Woodward—86.

So the motion to reconsider was laid upon the table.

Previous to the announcement of the preceding vote, the following proceedings occurred:

Mr. ORR. I will state to the House that I have paired off with Mr. POLK on this question.

Mr. SMART. I have agreed to pair off with my colleague [Mr. APPLETON] upon this question, provided my vote shall affect the result. I have reason to believe that it will, and therefore cannot vote. He is in favor of, and I am opposed to the appropriation for the Collins line of steamers.

Mr. DIMMICK. I have paired off with my colleague [Mr. FULLER] upon this question. I should have voted in the negative.

Mr. FAULKNER. When my name was called I was on the sofa back of the railing. I supposed that was within the bar of the House, and therefore when the interrogatory was propounded to me by the Chair, whether or no I was within the bar, I responded that I was within the bar, supposing that was the construction and meaning of the rule. The Chair can decide whether I am, or am not, entitled to vote.

Mr. JOHNSON, of Tennessee. I rise for the purpose of making the inquiry whether there is not a law adopted for the government of this House, that requires members when present to record their votes; and whether the mere statement that gentlemen have paired off with others who have gone on trips of pleasure, be sufficient to paralyze a corresponding number, so that they may shrink from their responsibility of a vote.

[Cries of "Order!" "Order!"]

The SPEAKER. The gentleman has a right to rise to a question of order. According to the rules of the House it is made the duty of every member present to vote; yet the Chair has no power to compel members to vote; and it would be for the House to adopt such action as it might think proper upon the subject.

The gentleman from Virginia [Mr. FAULKNER] calls the attention of the Chair and the House to the fact that he was outside of the bar when his name was called, and as the Chair understands, did not come within the bar before the name succeeding that of his own was called.

Mr. AVERETT. I was standing near my colleague when his name was called, and his head went over the bar just after his name was called. [Laughter.]

The SPEAKER. The Chair is called upon to decide according to the statement of the gentleman from Virginia, [Mr. FAULKNER,] that he has not the right to vote.

Mr. RICHARDSON. It is very usual for members to vote standing outside of the bar.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman did not vote when his name was called, but came in afterwards, and in reply to the interrogatory of the Chair, stated he was within the bar and voted.

Mr. RICHARDSON. I have voted very often myself outside, but leaning over the bar.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman is misinformed with regard to the facts. The gentleman did not vote outside of the bar, but as the Chair understands, he voted after he came in, answering the interrogatory of the Chair that he was within the bar.

Mr. RICHARDSON. Supposing he had voted when his name was called, under the construction the Chair gives the rule, he would not have been entitled to vote. It is an everyday practice for members to vote standing on the outside of the bar, and the votes thus given are recorded. If the gentleman has no right to vote, his vote should be stricken from the list.

Mr. STANTON, of Tennessee. This question is very unimportant, as it does not affect the result of the vote.

Mr. JOHNSON, of Tennessee. I am in hopes the rule of the House will be enforced, so that gentlemen, until the result is announced, will keep away from the Clerk's desk.

The SPEAKER. The Chair has stated the rule of the House. It will be for the House to determine whether or not the name of the gentleman from Virginia be stricken from the list. The Chair will further state, that it will not change the result of the vote one way or the other. Is it the pleasure of the House that the name of the gentleman shall be retained on the record?

[Cries of "Certainly!" "Certainly!"]

Mr. STUART. I move to take up a motion to reconsider, made by me in January last.

PRINTING.

Mr. GORMAN. I ask the gentleman from Michigan to yield me the floor until I can make the report from the Committee on Printing, which I have been so anxious to submit for several weeks past.

Mr. STUART. As the gentleman from Indiana, as I understand, does not propose to take action upon that question at this time, but merely to submit the report, and to postpone its consideration, I yield the floor for that purpose.

Mr. GORMAN. I do not propose action now. I am instructed by the Committee on Printing to report to the House, "A bill to provide for executing the public printing, and establishing the prices thereof, and for other purposes."

Mr. G. Desirous of having the House advised of the details of the bill, as it comes up for consideration to-morrow morning, I move that it be printed.

Mr. CARTTER. Can it be printed to-day? Mr. GORMAN. I will say, in response to the gentleman, that I will see it shall be immediately printed, and laid upon the desk of each member to-morrow morning.

Mr. STANLY. I rise to a question of order. I suppose, sir, that this committee reports under the 20th joint rule. I wish to call the attention of the Chair to that rule, and desire to state, that I consider the committee have no authority to make a report of this kind. It is not within their province or their duty. They have no more authority to report this than to report any other matter pending before the House.

Mr. GORMAN. If the gentleman will allow me, I will relieve him from that difficulty. There have been referred to that committee various memorials for the establishment of a printing bureau, others for the adoption of other plans, and a bill of the Senate introduced into that body by Senator CLEMENS, of Alabama. They have all been considered by the committee, and the bill which I have reported is the result of their deliberations.

Mr. STANLY. The reference of these memorials does not confer authority upon the committee. We may refer to them memorials to alter the tariff laws, to establish a branch Mint, to raise an army, and to make appropriations for roads and canals, but the reference does not give that committee jurisdiction over them. If the rules are to be violated in this way, there will be no end of their violation at all. I want the decision of the Chair upon that subject as a precedent for our action hereafter. That committee have no power to handle this subject further than this rule is authority. The 20th rule reads as follows:

"20. A committee, consisting of three members of the Senate and three members of the House of Representatives, shall be chosen by their respective Houses, which shall constitute a Committee on Printing, which shall have power to adopt such measures as may be deemed necessary to remedy any neglect or delay on the part of the contractor to execute the work ordered by Congress, and to make a pro rata reduction in the compensation allowed, or to refuse the work altogether, should it be inferior to the standard; and in all cases the contractor and his securities shall be responsible for any increased expenditure consequent upon the non-performance of the contract. The committee shall audit and pass upon all accounts for printing; but no bill shall be acted upon for work that is not actually executed and delivered, and which they may require to be properly authenticated."

Mr. STANLY. I maintain that under the rule this committee have no jurisdiction over that subject. They have to audit merely the accounts of the public printer, and to take such measures connected with the present public printing, account for the delay in its execution, and say what shall be deducted. They have no authority to report a bill to change the entire law of the land in regard to the public printing.

The SPEAKER. During the last Congress, the Committee on Public Printing reported what was regarded by many gentlemen as a private claim. The question was then made, as it is now made by the gentleman from North Carolina, [Mr. STANLY,] that it was not competent for the Committee on Printing to make such a report. It was decided, however, that as that subject had been referred by the House to the committee, it was clearly in order. The Chair understands from the statement of the chairman of the committee, that the matters embracing the provisions of this bill had been referred to that committee. Unless the Chair has been misled in regard to the facts, it seems to me there can be no doubt as to the right of the committee to report the bill.

Mr. HAVEN. The precise point desired to be made is, not that the committee have not the right to report upon the subject when it is referred to them, but that they cannot report now in advance of the time when they shall be called upon for reports.

The SPEAKER. The rule is very clear that the Committee on Printing may report at any time.

Mr. HAVEN. The question is not whether they may not report at any time upon the ordinary business conferred upon them by law, but whether they can report upon general matters not pertaining to their duties under the existing law which may have been referred to them from time to time? That is the question, I understand.

The SPEAKER. The 21st rule reads thus: "It shall be the duty of the Committee on Printing to report at any time."

There is in this no qualification. The decision of the Chair is, that it is in order for that committee to report upon any matter referred to it, or that they have a right to report upon under the rule, at any time; and he cannot recognize the distinction drawn by the gentleman from New York, [Mr. HAVEN.]

Mr. HAVEN. The point supposed to be made was this: that the rule was made in reference to the existing law, which declares that the committee have charge of this business, and of seeing that the contract is executed, and that they might report at any time upon these points. Now, subsequent to all this, new duties are charged upon it, by reference of matter to them—

The SPEAKER. In that immediate connection the gentleman will allow the Chair to say, that the reasons which the gentleman gives may be very good why the matter referred to that committee should not go there; but they do not, in the opinion of the Chair, furnish a ground for him to decide against its being in order, that matter having been referred to that committee.

Mr. MARSHALL, of Kentucky. It will be recollected—

Mr. HOUSTON. What is the proposition now before the House for discussion?

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from North Carolina [Mr. STANLY] raises a question of order, and several gentlemen have been indulged in explanations.

Mr. HOUSTON. If there is any matter to be settled, I am perfectly willing for it to proceed. I am exceedingly anxious, however, to take up and consider the appropriation bills. But this report has got in by reason of my having lost the floor by a privileged question.

Mr. MARSHALL. It will be recollected, as I stated before—

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Alabama calls to order, and debate is not in order, unless an appeal is taken.

Mr. MARSHALL. I do not propose to discuss a question of order.

The SPEAKER. The Chair overrules the question of order raised by the gentleman from North Carolina, [Mr. STANLY.]

Mr. STANLY. I appeal from that decision, and ask the yeas and nays upon it. If I understand the Chair, a memorial being referred to this committee gives it power to report a bill at any time. At that rate they can report a bill for rivers and harbors—to alter the tariff, or anything else, at any time.

The SPEAKER. The decision of the Chair is this: The House has referred to the Committee on Printing matter precisely such as is embraced in the bill. There is a rule authorizing that committee to report at any time. The Chair, therefore, decides that the bill, or report of the committee, is in order. From this decision the gentleman from North Carolina [Mr. STANLY] takes an appeal.

Mr. MARSHALL, of Kentucky. I do not know whether, under the rules, this subject is debatable at all.

The SPEAKER. It is debatable, in the opinion of the Chair.

Mr. MARSHALL. Being in order, I will make a single suggestion.

Mr. STUART. I gave the floor to the gentleman from Indiana, [Mr. GORMAN,] to make a report, upon the ground that it would not occupy any time. If this thing is to be discussed, I shall feel myself compelled to assume the floor.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Michigan, [Mr. STUART,] and the whole House, by common consent, permitted the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. GORMAN] to make this report. It is before the House, and it is for the House to determine what they will do with it.

Mr. STUART. But I yielded the floor conditionally for that purpose.

Mr. MARSHALL, of Kentucky. I understand that the question of order which the gentleman from North Carolina [Mr. STANLY] made, stopped the making of this report, because his question of order meets the report at the threshold, as to whether such a report can be made.

The SPEAKER. The Chair decides that the question of order was made in time to arrest the report.

Mr. STUART. I ask if I am not entitled to the floor? [Laughter.] I certainly was recognized by the Chair, and yielded the floor temporarily to the gentleman from Indiana. I said to the Chair and to the House, that inasmuch as the gentleman from Indiana only wished to introduce his report, and not to have any action upon it, which would take but a moment, I would yield him the floor temporarily for that purpose.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Michigan so stated when he made the report, but a question of order has been raised upon the report itself, and the gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. MARSHALL] is entitled to the floor. The Chair does not think it can be taken from him.

Mr. STUART. The gentleman from Kentucky is not speaking to the question of order.

Mr. MARSHALL. I propose to speak to the merits of the bill.

Mr. STUART. I understood the gentleman to bring up new matter entirely.

Mr. MARSHALL. I intended to make a motion as soon as I arose, for the reference of this report, in case the Chair had decided the question of order, and no appeal had been taken; but when the Chair announced that the appeal was debatable, I proposed to make a suggestion upon that point.

The SPEAKER. It is in order.

Mr. MARSHALL. The House will recollect, that when the difficulties occurred about the contract with the present public printer, the Committee on Printing assumed the position that this House had no right to instruct that committee, and that by the existing law, and by the constitution of the committee, they were beyond the power of the House. If the Committee on Printing bring in a bill, and it should be the pleasure of this House to recommit it to the Committee on Printing with instructions, what is to prevent them at once from assuming again that this House cannot instruct them to report a bill, and that they would not do it unless they please? And the very fact that they have it in their competency, such a position is evidence of the fact that they have no right to originate legislation; and the House will be placing itself in the absurd position of permitting a committee, on memorials referred to it, to introduce general matters of legislation. When this House acts upon that matter of legislation, and sends it back to that committee, with instructions to prepare it in a definite mode, that committee can return back to the House for reply, that they are out of the power of the House, and that they will not obey it. Gentlemen cannot escape from that conclusion, and this bill ought not to be entertained. It will be recollected, upon that occasion, that while this Committee on Printing had the particular matter of the contract under their supervision, in order to reach the matter of legislation, this House constituted a special committee, for the purpose of revising the laws and reporting a bill. Now, this bill is matter of general legislation, as I understand it, upon which a special committee of this House is now acting. I suppose that the House will refer the bill, at the proper time, to the special committee raised by the House, which has charge of the general subject-matter embraced in the bill.

Mr. STANTON, of Kentucky. I desire to ask at what time this committee was raised?

Mr. MARSHALL. It was raised immediately upon the last report of the Committee on Public Printing, while that matter was pending.

Mr. STANTON. It has been nearly two months ago.

Mr. MARSHALL. I do not know how many months ago.

Mr. STANTON. It has been a considerable time ago. Do they expect to report this session?

Mr. MARSHALL. We expect to report this session. I will state to my colleague, that the committee has concluded upon the basis of its report, and will be ready to report as soon as they can get a scale of prices upon which to base a report. The committee has had no opportunity to report, as they have not the right to report at any time. Probably by the time we shall have an opportunity to report, we shall be ready to do so.

Mr. DEAN. Is a motion to lay the appeal on the table debatable?

The SPEAKER. It is not debatable.

Mr. DEAN. Then I make the motion to lay the appeal upon the table.

Mr. STUART. I suppose I can take the floor now, and go on with my business.

My motion will override anything, except a motion to adjourn. I will never yield the floor again, unless the terms upon which I yield it are understood and adhered to by the Chair and the House. My motion being a motion to reconsider, I understand, under the rules, is a privileged one, and takes precedence of everything, except a motion to adjourn.

Mr. HOUSTON. The motion is to lay the appeal upon the table.

The SPEAKER. The question is upon laying the appeal upon the table. The Chair did not understand the gentleman from Michigan [Mr. STUART] as insisting upon his right to the floor.

Mr. STUART. Yes, sir; I do insist upon it.

The SPEAKER. The Chair will consider that question, and endeavor to decide it correctly.

Mr. DEAN. Does not a question of order take precedence of all other motions?

The SPEAKER. The Chair is of opinion that the privileged question raised by the gentleman from Michigan, must take precedence of the privilege of the Committee on Printing to report, if the gentleman insists upon it.

Mr. HOUSTON. I wish to know what is the state of the question? I have a privileged question remaining undisposed of that is confronted by the question of the gentleman from Michigan. Now I want to know what is the condition of this report, if any has been made?

The SPEAKER. A report has not been made, because the House has not received it, but it remains a proposition, to be determined upon, in the opinion of the Chair, after the expiration of the morning hour to-morrow, unless it be again shut out by some privileged question of a higher grade.

Mr. HOUSTON. Do I understand the Chair correctly, as saying that a report has been received from the Committee on Printing?

The SPEAKER. The question of the reception of the report is before the body. An appeal has been taken from the decision of the Chair, and a motion made to lay that appeal upon the table.

Mr. STANLY. But the Chair decides, that the report was not in order, and that the gentleman from Michigan [Mr. STUART] had a prior right to the floor. That, of course, excludes it altogether.

The SPEAKER. The motion of the gentleman from Michigan takes precedence of the report.

Mr. STANLY. Then how could the report come in at all?

The SPEAKER. The motion of the gentleman from Michigan stops the consideration of the matter before the House, which is the proposition to report.

Mr. HOUSTON. Is this report, then, confined to the morning hour?

The SPEAKER. In the opinion of the Chair, it cannot be considered during the morning hour, but will be the first business in order in the House after the morning hour shall have expired.

Mr. HOUSTON. Then I wish to present another point of order. The express condition upon which the gentleman from Michigan agreed to let the report come in was that it should come in and be taken up in the morning hour. I understood that was the condition, and it was so stated by the gentleman from Indiana, [Mr. GORMAN.]

The SPEAKER. The Chair did not so understand it.

Mr. HOUSTON. Was not that the understanding of the gentleman from Michigan?

Mr. STUART. I certainly so understood it.

The SPEAKER. The Chair understood it simply that the gentleman from Indiana should make his report from the Committee on Printing. He has attempted to do so. Objection was made to the reception of that report upon the ground that it was out of order. The Chair decides it to be in order. An appeal has been taken from that decision, and a motion is made to lay the appeal upon the table.

The gentleman from Michigan [Mr. STUART] now calls up his proposition to reconsider a certain vote; which, in the opinion of the Chair, takes precedence of the motion of the gentleman from Alabama, [Mr. HOUSTON,] and the proposition of the gentleman from Indiana, [Mr. GORMAN.]

Mr. HOUSTON. I am satisfied that the gentleman's motion takes precedence of mine, and confronts me. I have no doubt about that. But I feel an interest in the matter, because if this question of printing intervenes between the appropriation bills and the action of this House, they will be put off until October, and we shall not get the work done at all.

The SPEAKER. Does the gentleman appeal from the decision of the Chair?

Mr. HOUSTON. I wished to present a suggestion to the Chair to see if I understood the Chair correctly in his decision. Here is a report, as I understand it, made from the Committee on Printing, and the Chair now decides without disposing of that report, although it is not made in the morning hour, and therefore not cut off by the expiration of the morning hour, that before that report is disposed of another member can rise and call up a privileged motion—a motion to reconsider—and thereby stop the action of the House upon the unfinished business which was then before it. Now, I am aware if this report had been made in the morning hour, and the morning hour had expired, why, as a matter of course, the gentleman could have called up his privileged question.

The SPEAKER. Will gentlemen suspend for a single moment until the rule is read? The rule is as follows:

"56. When a motion has been once made, and carried in the affirmative or negative, it shall be in order for any member of the majority to move for the reconsideration thereof on the same or the succeeding day; and such motion shall take precedence of all other questions, except a motion to adjourn, and shall not be withdrawn after the said succeeding day, without the consent of the House, and thereafter any member may call it up for consideration."

Mr. STUART. Now, I hope the gentleman from Alabama will allow me to proceed with my remarks.

The SPEAKER. The Chair reviews his decision in reference to the motion made by the gentleman from Michigan, and it is upon this ground: If the motion to reconsider is made when a different subject is before the House, it is entered and remains until that subject is disposed of, and then takes precedence over other business, except the motion to adjourn. Therefore, in the opinion of the Chair, and according to the practice, as the book states, the motion of the gentleman from Michigan cannot interfere with the motion immediately before the House.

Mr. STUART. Then I am entitled to the floor when this motion is disposed of.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman will then be entitled to the floor.

Mr. HOUSTON. I understand that the pending motion now is to lay the appeal upon the table.

The SPEAKER. That is the question now before the House.

Mr. STANLY. As this motion is important, I demand the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

The SPEAKER. The Chair will again state the question, so that there may be no misunderstanding, in reference to this business. The gentleman from Indiana [Mr. GORMAN] presented a report from the Committee on Printing, embracing a proposition to change the existing law upon that subject, stating at the same time, which is not doubted by any one, that memorials concerning the matter contained in the bill, have been referred to that committee, and it is upon that matter that the committee report. That being the case, the Chair unhesitatingly decides that the report is in order. From that decision the gentleman from North Carolina [Mr. STANLY] takes an appeal, upon the ground that the committee cannot act upon such matter—cannot change the law, but has been constituted simply for the purpose of having that law regularly executed. The Chair thinks that is a fair statement of the gentleman's point of order.

Mr. STANLY. The committee have no authority, under the rules of this House, to alter the law.

Mr. BURT. Do I understand the Chair to say, that the committee report a bill to change the existing law?

The SPEAKER. That is the nature of the report.

Mr. BURT. And they ask authority to make that report after the expiration of the morning hour?

The SPEAKER. Yes, and propositions to change the law have been referred to the committee by the House. That is the ground upon which the Chair bases his decision.

Mr. HAVEN. Will the Chair allow me to inquire, that it may be stated, whether the report embraces any of the subjects which have been given in charge to the Committee on Printing by the law, or whether it is confined solely to the subjects which were referred to in those memorials?

The SPEAKER. The Chair is very free to answer that the law of the two Houses creating the committee, does not confer the power upon that committee to change the law, but it was competent for the House to refer any matter they chose. The House is to be the judge of that.

The question was then taken upon laying the appeal upon the table, and it was decided in the affirmative—yeas 108, nays 60; as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Aiken, Averett, Babcock, Thomas H. Bayly, Bocoek, Bragg, Albert G. Brown, Buell, Burt, Busby, Joseph Cable, Caldwell, Thompson Campbell, Caskie, Churchwell, Cobb, Curtis, Daniel, John G. Davis, Dawson, Dean, Dimmick, Disney, Doty, Duham, Edgerton, Edmundson, Faulkner, Fitch, Florence, Freeman, Thomas J. D. Fuller, Gamble, Gaylord, Giddings, Gilmore, Gorman, Green, Hamilton, Hammond, Isham G. Harris, Sampson W. Harris, Hart, Hendricks, Heno, Hibbard, Holladay, Houston, Ingersoll, Ives, Jackson, Jenkins, Andrew Johnson, James Johnson, John Johnson, Robert W. Johnson, Daniel T. Jones, George W. Jones, J. Glancy Jones, Preston King, Kurtz, Letclier, Lockhart, Mann, Mason, McCorkle, McLanahan, McMullin, McNair, McQueen, Millson, Morrison, Murphy, Murray, Nahers, Olds, Andrew Parker, Peaslee, Penn, Phelps, Powell, Price, Rantoul, Riddle, Robbins, Robie, Robinson, Ross, Savage, Schoolcraft, Searcy, David L. Seymour, Origen S. Seymour, Skelton, Smart, Smith, Snow, Frederick P. Stanton, Richard H. Stanton, Abraham P. Stephens, Stone, St. Martin, Stuart, Sweetser, Townsend, Wallace, Wilcox, and Wildrick—108.

NAYS—Messrs. Allison, Barrere, Bell, Bibbhaus, John H. Boyd, Briggs, Brooks, George H. Brown, Burrows, E. Carrington Cabell, Carter, Chapman, Chastain, Culom, George T. Davis, Dockery, Duncan, Durkee, Evans, Fowler, Goodenow, Goodrich, Grey, Harper, Haws, Haven, Horsford, John W. Howe, Thomas M. Howe, Thos. Y. How, Hunter, Landry, Humphrey Marshall, Martin, Miller, Miner, Molony, Henry D. Moore, John Moore, Morehead, Samuel W. Parker, Perkins, Porter, Reed, Sackett, Schermerhorn, Stanly, Benjamin Stanton, Thaddeus Stevens, Strother, Sutherland, Taylor, Walbridge, Walsh, Ward, Washburn, Watkins, Welch, Alexander White, and Yates—60.

So the appeal was laid upon the table, and the decision of the Chair was sustained as the judgment of the House.

Mr. GORMAN moved that the bill and report be postponed until to-morrow, and that they be printed.

The motion was agreed to.

[A message was here received from the Senate, by the hands of ASBURY DICKINS, Esq., its Secretary, informing the House that that body had passed the following bills and resolutions, and asking the concurrence of the House therein:

An act to authorize the President of the United States to designate the places for the ports of entry and delivery for the collection districts of Puget's Sound and Umpqua, in the Territory of Oregon, and to fix the compensation of the collector at Astoria in said Territory;

An act to revive and continue in force for a limited time, the provisions of an act relative to suspended entries of public lands;

A resolution for the relief of the Spanish consul and other subjects of Spain, residing at New Orleans, and of subjects of Spain at Key West, by indemnity for losses occasioned in the year 1851; and

A joint resolution to supply the Washington City Juvenile Guards with arms.]

Mr. STUART called up a motion made by him in January last to reconsider the vote by which the House referred to the Committee on Roads and Canals the bill making appropriation for the improvement of the navigation of the Illinois river. He addressed the House an hour in favor of the Government making appropriations for the improvement of harbors and rivers, within the range of the Constitution; that is, on those waters where the Federal Government has jurisdiction, or into which foreign commerce has access. [His remarks are published in the Appendix.]

Mr. HOUSTON. The question now before the House is the motion for reconsideration, submitted by the gentleman from Michigan.

Mr. STUART. I do not now insist that a vote be taken on that motion.

Mr. HOUSTON. I move to lay the motion to reconsider on the table. We have it up, and let it be now disposed of.

The question was taken, and the motion to reconsider was laid upon the table.

CLOSE OF DEBATE ON THE INDIAN BILL.

Mr. HOUSTON. I call up the resolution submitted by me on yesterday, for the termination of debate in committee on the Indian appropriation bill. That bill has been discussed for two or three weeks. I modify the resolution, so that it will read that debate shall close five minutes after the Committee of the Whole shall again resume the consideration of the bill.

Mr. JOHNSON, of Arkansas. The chairman of the Committee of Ways and Means has just stated that this bill has been under discussion for several weeks, but it is well known there has been no debate as yet upon the merits of it.

Mr. HOUSTON. That has not been my fault. Mr. JONES, of Tennessee. The previous question has not been called, and with the gentleman's consent, I move the debate be terminated upon the bill in one hour after the committee shall have again resumed its consideration. I hope no one will interfere, but let the chairman of the Committee on Indian Affairs have the floor for that hour, that the Committee on Indian Affairs may be heard.

Mr. HOUSTON. I am willing to agree to that.

Mr. JOHNSON. I object to that amendment being made now; and I will state my reasons for the objection. As the chairman of the Committee on Indian Affairs, I can state to the House that there are questions which must arise upon that appropriation bill which will demand debate; and those questions cannot be discussed under the five minutes rule.

Mr. HOUSTON. With the gentleman's consent, I will modify my resolution, so that it will read that debate on the Indian appropriation bill be terminated one hour after the committee shall again resume its consideration. I do not want an hour to speak. It is my great desire to progress with the business of the country.

Mr. JOHNSON. I must appeal to the House. That is not satisfactory.

Mr. HOUSTON. I object to further debate, unless it is declared to be in order.

The SPEAKER. Discussion is out of order.

Mr. JOHNSON. I will not debate the question, but we must be heard, if possible, upon this subject. I move that debate be closed within four hours after the committee shall again resume the consideration of the bill. There are two speeches which will have to be made upon the subject. Upon my motion I demand the previous question.

The call for the previous question was seconded; and the main question was then ordered to be put.

Mr. CONGER. I move to lay the resolution upon the table.

Mr. JONES, of Tennessee. I call for the yeas and nays upon that motion.

The yeas and nays were refused—there being, upon a division, yeas 10, nays 123.

The question was then taken on the motion to lay the resolution upon the table, and it was not agreed to.

Mr. JOHNSON's amendment was then agreed to, and the resolution as amended was adopted.

Mr. HOUSTON moved that the rules be suspended, and that the House resolve itself into the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union; which motion was agreed to.

The House accordingly resolved itself into the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union, (Mr. JONES, of Tennessee, in the chair.)

On motion by Mr. HOUSTON, the Indian appropriation bill was taken up for consideration.

Mr. FITCH. Mr. Chairman, certain matters have been referred to the Indian Committee, of which I am a member, and the only opportunity we will have to report upon them, or any fact connected with them, will be during the pendency of this general Indian appropriation bill. I desire, therefore, now to call the attention of the committee to one of these matters, which can only be discussed under the hour rule, as there are so many collaterals connected with it, as to preclude the possibility of throwing that light upon it during the five minutes debate which the subject admits, and justice demands. I will be as brief as possible, my only object being to convince the members of this committee of the correctness of the views which I myself entertain in relation to the matter.

It is not a pleasant task for me to advocate what is ordinarily called a claim, and yet such is the character of what I am about to move as an amendment in the Indian appropriation bill, and about to discuss. It is a claim, however, not of an individual character, but one presented by a nation, or part of a nation, of Indians. It has already been discussed at some length by the chairman of the committee, [Mr. JOHNSON, of Arkansas,] but unsuccessfully, as the order which had previously been adopted by the House stopped debate, and cut him off from most of his explanation. I send the amendment to the Clerk's desk, and desire it read.

The amendment was then read, as follows:

For liquidated balance found due the Creek Indians for losses sustained during the last war with Great Britain by that portion of the tribe that was friendly to and cooperated with the United States in accordance with the promise of the Government, $110,417 90; to be paid by the United States agent for the Creek Indians to those individuals now living, and the legal representatives of those deceased, who are entitled to receive the same per capita.

At the risk of some repetition I shall briefly allude to the origin of the claim which the amendment proposes to pay. As you know, Mr. Chairman, it originated in the so-called Red-stick war, which was a part and parcel of the war of 1812 and 1813. In that war the great body of the Creek Indians took part against us. They were allies of the English, and enemies to us. A portion of them, however, remained faithful to their peace stipulation with the American people, and fought in our ranks, making our enemies, though their own countrymen, their enemies. They thereby subjected themselves to depredations upon the part of the hostile Creeks, who esteemed them not only enemies, but, as our allies, traitors to their own people, and manifested their anger by destroying their villages, their crops, and their stock. At the close of that war, General Pinckney being in command in that quarter, was directed to treat with the hostile Creeks, and certain instructions were sent to him by which it was supposed he would be governed. Those instructions were dated the 17th of March, 1814. They were to procure—

"1st. An indemnification for the expenses incurred by the United States in prosecuting the war by such cession or cessions of land as may be deemed an equivalent for said expenses.

"2d. A stipulation on their part that they will cease all intercourse with any Spanish post, garrison, town, &c.

"3d. An acknowledgment of a right in the United States to open roads through their country, to navigate waters and streams within the same," &c.

These instructions, as already remarked, were dated the 17th of March, 1814. Three days thereafter, on the 20th of March, the Secretary of War seems to have reconsidered them, and wrote to General Pinckney "that the proposed treaty with the Creeks should take a form altogether military, and be in the nature of a capitulation, in which 'case the whole authority of making and concluding the terms will rest with you exclusively. In this transaction, should it take place, Colonel Hawkins, as agent, may be usefully employed.'" General Pinckney, then, had plenipotentiary powers—the terms were to be such as he might prescribe—such as his judgment could approve, irrespective of any previous instructions from the Department. General Pinckney, with these ample powers conferred upon him, and having associated with him Colonel Hawkins, proceeded to make known to the hostile Creeks, through those who had been friendly, the terms upon which a "capitulation" or treaty could be made. He promised to the friendly Indians, furthermore, that they should be indemnified for their loss of stock, and for the injuries they had sustained by the depredations committed upon them by their hostile brethren, and that in taking land from the hostiles to indemnify Government for the expenses of the war, the territorial rights of the friendly Indians should be respected. In conformity with these principles and promises, the commencement of this stipulation was had; but before its completion General Jackson superseded General Pinckney. He (General Jackson) was instructed on the 24th of May to carry out the arrangement which General Pinckney had commenced. General Jackson consequently perfected this capitulation, but not upon the terms of the promise which had been made, or the principles which had been promulgated by General Pinckney, so far as the friendly Creeks were concerned.

In the letter of May 24th, 1814, of the Secretary of War to General Jackson, reference is made to the instructions which had been sent to General Pinckney. The instructions of 17th March, were doubtless those alluded to, and not the subsequent letter of the 20th, putting the treaty upon the basis of capitulation, and giving General Pinckney plenipotentiary powers; and therefore General Jackson supposed he had no authority under these instructions to liquidate the claims of the friendly Creeks for depredations. He accordingly, so far from making a provision for these claims out of the lands which he obtained by the treaty from the hostile Creeks, refused to take them any further into consideration than to make known to the President the wish of the friendly Creeks, that they should be investigated and paid, in accordance with General Pinckney's promise. In making the treaty, General Jackson did not confine himself to merely obtaining from the hostile Creeks a certain amount of land to indemnify us for the expenses of the war, but, governed altogether in the act by political considerations, he took likewise eight million acres of land belonging to the friendly Creeks. He did this for the purpose of insuring the observance, by the Indians, of the second item of the instructions to General Pinckney—the one requiring the Indians to abstain from "all intercourse with any Spanish post, garrison, or town." The Spanish authorities were then in possession of Florida; and the eight million acres taken from the friendly Indians intervened between the remainder of the Indian possessions and that Territory, cutting the Indians off from access to it. He thus did it for good reasons—reasons, indeed, which, when explained to the friendly Creeks, they acquiesced in, although they protested against the disregard of their claim.

Mr. JOHNSON, of Arkansas. Will the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. FITCH] allow me to interrupt him a moment? He has fallen into an error, that the Indians acquiesced in this arrangement. They always protested against it, and you will find their protest in the American Archives. They did not acquiesce in it; and it was a most outrageous transaction, by which we took eight million acres of land from these friendly Creeks, the allies of the United States, who fought with us and for us against their own tribe of Indians, as indemnity for the war. It is as gross an outrage as was ever committed.

Mr. FITCH. I have the Archives to which the gentleman alludes. I do not understand from them that the friendly Indians willingly consented to the surrender of their land, but they acquiesced in it as a necessity from which they saw no apparent escape. The reason was explained to them; and they submitted, with a protest against the non-payment of their claim, and a protest furthermore against the capitulation which compelled them to the surrender of their territory. The Indians unwillingly assented to the treaty, and only signed it upon General Jackson's promise to forward the President General Pinckney's promise that their claims should be paid out of the proceeds of this land, or otherwise. These promises, in their estimation, constituted a part of the treaty. They drew up a statement relative to their claims, dated the 9th of August, 1814, a day or two after the treaty was completed, and insisted upon its being forwarded with the treaty.

We learn by a letter from Colonel Hawkins to the War Department, dated August 1st, 1815, (American Archives,) that the Speaker (Indian) said:

"Before he signed any papers with him, [General Jackson,] as he would not admit their claims in the treaty, he should make and sign a paper expressive of them, and who were the masters of the land."

Accordingly, on the 9th August, (1814,) this paper was drawn up and signed, and "the Speaker urged it should be sent on with the treaty, which they were about to sign, to which he annexed the letters of the 23d and 25th April, between General Pinckney and Colonel Hawkins."

These letters contained the promises to the friendly Indians of remuneration for the depredations committed by the hostiles—the promises we are now endeavoring to have redeemed.

Colonel Hawkins further says: "The document of the 9th is what, in fact, the chiefs call 'their part of the treaty.'"

That statement, according to their ideas, constituted a part of the treaty as binding upon the Government as any other part of it. The claims alluded to in it are those on which payment is now asked. It will be remembered that two distinct promises were made by General Pinckney to the friendly Indians—first, that their claims should be paid; second, their territorial rights should be respected. I have shown the hitherto non-redemption of the first promise, and that the second was violated for political reasons. I have shown that the friendly Indians remonstrated against this refusal of General Jackson to recognize their claim, and against his taking, by the capitulation, eight million acres of their land—thus blending them with the hostile Indians, and treating all as a conquered people; that at their request General Jackson permitted them to draw up a statement of the 9th of August, 1814, relative to their claims, and of their right to the land, declaring, among other things already quoted, that they relied “on the justice of the United States to cause justice to be done to them,” and that he not only permitted them to draw it up, but promised to forward it to the President of the United States, which promise he fulfilled.

The obligation imposed upon the United States by General Pinckney's promises to the Indians was so apparent, that the treaty or capitulation having been ratified on the 16th of February, 1815, soon afterwards, on the 12th of July following, the Secretary of War wrote to Colonel Hawkins, asking the nature and extent of the indemnity which these friendly Indians expected, how far justice and policy would dictate its payment, and how it should be paid—whether in land, goods, or in money. On the 18th of August, 1815, Hawkins answered, that justice demanded the adjudication and payment of the claims; that the promises of General Pinckney should be redeemed; that the claims should be paid in money to the individual claimants. As to the amount of the indemnity, he could not report, because the vouchers were not in his possession—part of them being in the hands of General Jackson's secretary, and the remainder being in the possession of the assistant agent at Coweta.

One objection now urged to the payment of the claims is, that, although Colonel Hawkins said, in his letter of the 18th of August, that he could not state the amount of the claims, he yet ventures the opinion that “at the time of drawing the lines for the treaty”—the capitulation at which the land was taken—the Indians would probably have been satisfied with $60,000. It has been asserted that the $60,000 was intended as an estimated amount sufficient to cover the entire claim of individuals for destruction of their property. The interpretation put, by the Indian Bureau, upon that sentence of Colonel Hawkins's letter embracing the opinion relative to the $60,000 is, that the amount ($60,000) was designed by him as an estimate of what the Indians would have taken for their territorial rights, and had no relation to individual claims. It is perfectly immaterial, however, whether he meant the one or the other, for it was but an opinion—made, it would appear, without any consultation with the Indians, and, as he himself said, without the facts of the case before him. It was not even an estimate—for an estimate presupposes some data upon which it is based—and he expressly stated he had none such; that none of the vouchers were in his possession. He was instructed to ascertain the amount of the claims which would be embraced under the principles and promises published by General Pinckney. He proceeded to do this, and on the 1st of April, 1816, made a report “on the claims of the friendly Indians for losses sustained by them in their civil war, agreeably to the terms of peace offered by Major General Pinckney, 23d April, 1814, and the preliminaries of the treaty of Fort Jackson, of August following.” Up to that time he found due $78,360 75, out of claims presented to the amount of $108,415 12½, but he stated in that report, that he could only arrive at an approximation to the amount of these claims, because the hunters were absent. Now all who know anything of Indians, are aware that hunters and warriors are synonymous, and are the leading men of the nation—those alone who know aught relative to the affairs of the nation. In the absence, then, of the hunters, it was utterly impossible for Colonel Hawkins to arrive at anything like a close approximation to the amount of the claims. He reported, however, that, in his judgment, $100,000 would cover the whole.

In March, 1817, soon after that report was made, Congress appropriated $85,000, and that amount was forwarded. Before, however, it could be paid, or the investigation into the amount of the claims completed, Hawkins died, and was succeeded by D. B. Mitchell. Mitchell was appointed on the 20th of March, 1817, and the Secretary of War instructed him that the final distribution was not to be made at that time, because the whole amount of claims was not then ascertained. Here was an express recognition, on the part of the Secretary of War, that the $85,000 was only designed to cover the claims in part, and was not esteemed sufficient to cover the whole. Mitchell, consequently, felt himself instructed to withhold the money until the entire amount of claims was known. He accordingly did so, and proceeded to complete the investigation which Hawkins had commenced. During that investigation, claims to the amount of upwards of $300,000 were presented. The chiefs, with the aid of Mitchell, reduced the amount to $195,000. Toward this, the $85,000 was paid, pro rata—about three fifths of the entire amount being thus left unpaid. That leaves the amount now asked for—$110,000. This amount the Executive branch of the Government has acknowledged due, and it is now asked of this committee and of this Congress.

Hawkins's first estimate, that $60,000 would have satisfied the Indians at the time of the drawing of the lines, is, as I have already stated, brought up as an objection to this claim. It is said that that $60,000 was intended to cover the whole amount, and that, therefore, the $85,000 ought to have been sufficient. It is further objected that the Committee of Ways and Means, in 1824, made a report adverse to the claim; and that their report should be conclusive. It appears they had only before them Hawkins's first estimate—$60,000—and knew nothing of his subsequent estimate of $100,000. They therefore had not all the necessary facts before them upon which to base a conclusive report. Whether the $60,000 was intended to cover the whole of the claims, territorial and all, of the friendly Indians, or not, is, as I have before stated, perfectly immaterial to the issue here. That was not an estimate, but a mere opinion, without data or vouchers to sustain it. Upon subsequent and partial inquiry, there was made an estimate of $100,000, and still later, after rigid inquiry, the whole amount was found to be $195,000. The direction to withhold the payment of $85,000 until the claims were all in was, in itself, a recognition, upon the part of the authorities here, that $85,000 could not satisfy the entire claims justly due to the Indians.

It is sometimes said, that this claim was in part provided for by the treaty of 1826, by which we engaged to pay $100,000 to certain Creek Indians, a part of which sum we have paid very recently. But that $100,000 had no relation whatever to these claims. It grew out of a previous treaty which this Government made in 1825 with McIntosh and a few of the Indians friendly to him—a treaty which, it was subsequently charged, was brought about by improper means, and which created so much dissatisfaction among the Indians generally, that McIntosh and many of his friends were soon killed—victims to the fury of their brethren who supposed themselves outraged by the treaty. So obnoxious was that treaty, that in 1826 another was made to annul the previous one; and by the latter, the Government agreed to pay $100,000 as indemnity for injuries sustained by McIntosh's friends from the hostility of the other Indians in consequence of their dissatisfaction with the treaty of 1825.

Again, it is said that this claim has rested a long time—since 1817—and no mention has been made of it in Congress subsequent to 1824, until within a very recent period, and therefore it is argued the claim must have been considered as having been paid, or as being unjust. Neither of those positions holds good. There is proof here of an indisputable character, that the Indians were never satisfied with the payment of the $85,000, and that it was never considered a payment in full. If they did not present their claim to Congress, they were constantly urging it on the Department. Mr. Calhoun says, on March 10th, 1824:

“Since the payment of the $85,000 above-mentioned, repeated applications have been made by the Creek Indians for further demands, but the Department declined acting on them as there was no appropriation at its disposal that could be so applied.”

The Indians have constantly, year after year, urged their claim on the Department, but the Department has had no money with which to pay it, hence they now ask that an appropriation be made for that purpose. It is true that for a certain time the Creek nation of Indians, as those familiar with their history well know, were almost disbanded and disorganized in consequence of their own intestine troubles, and they had more than enough to do to settle those troubles, without insisting on the payment of a claim due only to a portion of the nation. A large portion of the Creeks are those who were hostile to us during the war of 1812 and 1813, or the descendants of hostiles, and consequently they have no interest whatever in urging the claims; on the contrary, have doubtless felt worse than indifferent to their payment, because of their ancient hostility to those who were to be benefited by the payment.

I should have been pleased to have gone more elaborately into this case, but my object has been from the commencement, not to dwell too much upon collaterals, but to present the strong points. I have endeavored to answer, as far as a limited time would permit, certain objections which have been urged, and may be urged again, to the payment of the claim. It has been said that the adverse report of 1824 ought to be binding and conclusive, because of the character of the gentlemen composing the then Committee of Ways and Means, from which that report emanated. That, sir, would be paying too much deference to the opinions of individuals, even if they had at that time all the light in relation to the case before them, which we have now. But that was not the case, because we are told by the Indian Bureau that they had not Hawkins's second estimate before them, and consequently they did not act with a full knowledge of all the facts of the case. And, sir, there are good reasons, independent of Pinckney's promises, why the claim should be paid. Those promises, I take it, every gentleman will say, are obligatory upon us. They are promises from which we cannot with honor escape. Gentlemen may sneer at the idea of such a thing as honor in dealings between us and the weak remnants of a tribe, who were at one time powerful enough to compel us, from motives of policy, if from no other, to do them justice. But the same principles which govern us in our intercourse with the most powerful nations in the world, should equally be our rule of action in dealing with the red men, even though it be only a feeble band. We promised these people certain considerations for their services, and for the damages they have sustained as our allies, and those promises we have not redeemed in full. Shall we seek to escape their redemption because of the inability of the tribe now to compel us to their fulfillment? or shall we rather keep faith with those who were friendly to us in the time of our need?

Now circumstances are reversed—we do not need their services, but they are dependent upon us; but does this deprive them of their right to demand justice from us? Is this a reason requiring them to abandon all expectation of the fulfillment of our promises to them? I said there were reasons independent of Pinckney's promises for the payment of this claim. One of the strongest is found in the fact, that at the time of the capitulation, which was designed to be a capitulation of hostile Creeks only, the friendly Creeks were merged with the hostiles—were made a party to the surrender, and thus treated as enemies, after having fought with us, not against us—after having been our allies instead of our enemies. We made them a party to the surrender, and took from them eight million acres of land, in addition to the fifteen millions we took from the hostiles. We had, it is true, a good political reason for doing so. We were governed in the act by policy, not by strict justice; but having benefited by the policy, shall we now refuse to pay a just debt to those who were injured by it, thus paying for one injury by the infliction of another? Reverse the case. If policy thus denied upon the part of others justice to us, how long would it be submitted to? These eight million acres of land from the friendly Indians, and the fifteen millions from the hostile ones, have since been in part sold by the United States for a sum far exceeding the cost of that Creek war.

General Pinckney was told to insist upon a sufficient quantity of land to cover the expenses of the war; and included in those expenses should be, of course, the claims which he subsequently recognized on the part of the friendly Creeks for indemnity. I repeat, a sufficient quantity of those lands has already been sold to far more than compensate for the expenses of that war, including these claims. What good reason, then, is there why the claims should not be paid? We have the money in our Treasury—the proceeds of the lands—and shall we keep it there and thus speculate at the expense of justice, and of our promise to those who befriended us in the hour of our need, and suffered because of that friendship? We have not only refused to pay them out of the proceeds of the domain taken from the hostile Indians as we promised, but we have taken their own lands.

We had a political purpose to accomplish, and we had political reasons for our action. But let us not now adopt the dollar-and-cent policy of refusing to pay a debt because the creditor is too feeble to enforce its payment, and because, having the money in the Treasury, we can appropriate it to another use. Such policy, if avowed, would degrade us, as it ought to, in the estimation of every man in the civilized world.

I recollect, Mr. Chairman, when this matter was previously under discussion, and my friend, the chairman of the Committee on Indian Affairs, [Mr. JOHNSON,] was speaking on it—I recollect, I say, a little opposition from yourself, (Mr. JONES, of Tennessee, in the chair,) opposition usual, and usually expected of you; because, I believe, whatever other charges, if any, can be brought against you, partially for any bill which contemplates appropriations of money out of the Treasury, for any purpose whatever, is not among them. I do not wish to be understood as desiring to take advantage of your now occupancy of the chair for the purpose of making any allusions to you, under the supposition that you cannot answer them. If you desire to answer, I trust you will call another gentleman to the chair, and obtain the floor for that purpose. Every facility in my power, even to yielding a portion of my own time, shall be granted you for that purpose. I will now read a portion of your language upon the occasion of the previous debate (25th March ult.) upon this subject. I shall do it, as you will find, Mr. Chairman, for the purpose of calling your attention to a promise which you then made. In view of that promise, I candidly expect you, Mr. Chairman, as an honorable man—and such we know you to be—to hereafter be one of the warmest advocates of this amendment; for you promised, under certain circumstances and upon certain conditions, to support it cheerfully. Those conditions have been complied with, as can be easily demonstrated to the House. Your language upon the occasion referred to, is as follows:

"If the Committee on Indian Affairs, or the Committee on Claims, or any other committee of this House, will take up this case, investigate and ascertain what particular Indians, who were friendly to the United States, are entitled to the specific sums of money which make up this aggregate sum of $110,000, and report such a bill here providing for the payment of the particular Indians who sustained losses, or, in case of their death, to their heirs, I will vote most cordially and cheerfully to pay this money to them. Let us know who are the Indians, and who are the heirs. I think we should not only be just, but we should, upon all occasions, be liberal to the Indians in this country. I say, if you will ascertain who are the particular Indian chiefs and warriors of the friendly party entitled, I will vote for a bill to pay them. But, until I know who they are, I cannot vote this money. I know that the gentleman from Arkansas (Mr. JOHNSON) would not, nor would any member of this committee, ask for the payment of this money if it were going to the Creek nation as a nation. If it is due at all, it is due to particular individuals; and when it can be ascertained and a specific appropriation made to them, then I will give it my support."

Now I intend, Mr. Chairman, to hold you to this promise. We have taken this matter up, we have investigated it, and ascertained to what particular Indians, or their heirs, this money is payable. Here is the list, [holding it up,] each individual's name, and the amount he was entitled to. Many of these individuals are yet living, and where they are not, their heirs are very easily traced, and this money will be paid to them; and where there are no heirs, the money will remain in the Treasury. If I have not met every objection which can be urged to the amendment, I hope some gentleman will let the fact be known; or if any gentleman desires to state and debate an objection, I will yield him a portion of my time for that purpose, expressing at the same time an entire conviction of my ability to hereafter successfully refute his objection.

Mr. MEADE. I wish to send up an amendment to the amendment already offered to the bill.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair must state that he does not understand the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. FITCH] to offer an amendment, but to give notice of one he will offer when the right time arrives.

Mr. FITCH. That is all.

The CHAIRMAN. The bill will have to be read through by clauses and paragraphs, and then the amendment will be in order.

Mr. MEADE. I then give notice that I will at the proper time offer as an amendment to the amendment the one which I send to the Chair. I desire the Clerk to read it.

The amendment was then read, as follows:

Provided, That before the said sum, or any portion thereof, be paid, the said tribe or nation of Indians shall give a release of all demands arising out of said war, and the treaty consequent thereon.

Mr. MEADE. My object, sir, in offering that amendment is to conclude, upon the part of the Indians, any further demands upon the Government. Probably, sir, I might, in strict justice, admit that these Indians did have an equitable claim upon this Government for the eight million acres of territory which were taken from them under this treaty. However, it would be a stale demand, and one which I wish to have relinquished. As has been stated by the gentleman from Indiana, [Mr. FITCH,] when we made a treaty with the hostile Creeks, we agreed beforehand with the friendly Creeks that we would provide for their indemnity, they having lost large sums in houses, furniture, horses, and cattle. When General Jackson took possession of that army, previously under command of General Pinckney, he assumed to himself, in virtue of the ample instructions which had been given to his predecessor, to prescribe the terms of that treaty; and unfortunately for those friendly Indians, it became necessary, from the necessities of State alone, to deprive them of large strips of territory running down to the Florida line, the object being, as stated by General Jackson at the time, to cut off communication between the Indians living on the west side of the Chatahochee river, and the warlike Seminoles who lived in the Territory of Florida. That was done for the future security of our citizens. While its injustice abstractly was admitted—while the friendly Creek Indians were aware that great injustice was done them in depriving them of their territory, yet they yielded to the interest of the United States, relying hereafter upon the justice of the American Government to grant them an indemnity.

After that treaty was made, Mr. Chairman, orders were issued to our Indian agent, Mr. Hawkins, to ascertain the loss which the Indians had suffered in their lands, and in their horses and cattle; and after a partial examination, Mr. Hawkins reported to the Government that he would estimate their losses at somewhere about $100,000. But before he had completed his investigations, Mr. Hawkins died, which subsequently led to the appointment of Colonel Mitchell, who completed the investigation. It is in the report of Colonel Mitchell, made in the year 1817, that this sum of $110,417 is stated as the amount due to these Indians, for depredations committed by these hostile Creeks.

Well now, Mr. Chairman, I find that that does not embrace the eight million of acres of land which we took from them, and which now constitute a portion of the State of Georgia, and from the sale of which, I understand, we have already received some $8,590,000.

Now, Mr. Chairman, this nation of Indians has dwindled down to a comparatively small number; but yet some persons may take it into their heads hereafter to stimulate those Indians to come forward and demand payment for these lands, and it is for that reason that I offer the proviso, which requires that the nation, before this $110,417 shall be paid them, do grant a release of all demands that may have originated in that war.

Mr. FOWLER. I am deeply interested in the gentleman's statement. Will the gentleman inform me how much they have already received?

Mr. MEADE. They have received about $85,000 or $90,000. I do not know the exact amount.

Mr. FOWLER. Of the $110,000?

Mr. MEADE. No. Of the $200,000 and odd. I will state to the gentleman that this $110,000 is the balance left, after giving them credit for $85,000 appropriated before the balance was ascertained, Congress believing, at the time, Mr. Hawkins to be right in his estimate of the amount of money due them for these depredations. This is the balance.

Mr. FOWLER. How much, if anything, have they received on account of that eight million acres of land?

Mr. MEADE. They have received nothing on account of that eight million acres of land, as I understand. Now, in view of that fact, Mr. Chairman, I am not inclined particularly to scrutinize every item stated in this balance of $110,000, knowing full well, whether it be more or less than their sufferings amounted to, the fact that we have taken eight million acres of land from them, from which we have realized, probably, as many millions of dollars. I will not go into an exact account, with a view to ascertain the real balance due to them for these depredations.

Mr. JOHNSON, of Arkansas. I am informed by a gentleman that, while I was outside of the bar, the gentleman introduced a proposition to put a barrier to their presenting any other claim these Indians may have against the Government—providing, if this be given, that they are never to demand anything else from the Government.

Mr. MEADE. My proposition is, simply, that before this money is paid to these Indians, the nation shall release all demands growing out of that war, and the treaty consequent upon that war.

Mr. JOHNSON. You are speaking of the eight million acres of land. The taking of that was one of the consequences growing out of that war.

Mr. MEADE. It may be so contended.

Mr. JOHNSON. The proviso is, then, to cut off these Indians or their heirs from the reclamation of those eight millions of acres?

Mr. MEADE. Yes, sir.

Mr. JOHNSON. The gentlemen then stated that if it were not adopted, the gentleman from Arkansas might come in and attempt to obtain for these Indians the reclamation of these eight million acres of land.

Mr. MEADE. I did not say so.

Mr. JOHNSON. I am then incorrectly informed. I will state to the gentleman that I do not oppose his amendment, which precludes these Indians from ever coming back again. I will not oppose it if these Indians want to take the $110,000. If they are willing to take it by way of compromise for every other right they may have, I will vote for the amendment. I am willing that it shall be passed. But it will be a proud task for any man to stand upon the floor of the House of Representatives and compound the debts of the Government of the United States against a creditor powerless, and who is under your feet! But I will vote with the gentleman! Is that the way the American House of Representatives is to legislate with reference to an ignorant, helpless, down-trodden people? This is the measure proposed. I will not do otherwise than vote for the gentleman's amendment, and let these Creek Indians take the $110,000, and let them feel, when they have taken it, that the Government which took from them while they were its allies, and after they had been bravely contending for our cause eight million acres of land—this great and good Government—their great Father is the one which reaches out its hand to pay a just debt of $110,000, saying: "I will give you that which I own to bedue you, but you must acknowledge beforehand, that in robbing you of eight million acres of land, I have robbed you most righteously." Is that it? That is the philosophy of this House.

Mr. MEADE. I did not yield the floor to the gentleman to make a long speech. I offered that amendment for the purpose of settling this account with the Indians now and forever. The Indians have preferred their claim for $110,000. I want them to bring forward at this time every claim they may have against the Government to preclude legislation hereafter upon the subject. And I now give the gentleman from Arkansas notice, that if these Indians have any further claims against this Government, and he desires to befriend them, let him bring them forward now. I am opposed hereafter to having these claims reopened. They have slept upon their rights, if they have any, in relation to these lands, from 1814 down to the present time, and I do not wish these old transactions ripped up again. If they have anything to claim in consequence of the taking of these eight million acres of land, I say let them bring forward that claim now, and I will consider it. But I have no idea these Indians shall hereafter, when they are almost extinct, bring forward claims for millions of dollars against this Government, after they have slept for forty or fifty years.

Mr. FOWLER. If the gentleman will allow another inquiry. If I understand the gentleman from Virginia, he admits they have an equitable claim for the eight million acres of land, and that they are entitled to $110,000 for losses.

Mr. MEADE. I say this, Mr. Chairman: that they might hereafter bring forward a claim against us for this eight million acres of land. I have not sufficiently investigated the subject to say whether it would be an equitable claim or not; I only know that they had a title to the land which was taken from them by this treaty; but there have been many other treaties made with these Indians, and there have been other pecuniary considerations passing between the Government and them. I am not sufficiently conversant with the facts to inform the gentleman whether such a claim be equitable or not.

Mr. FITCH. I now claim the floor under the understanding made with the gentleman.

Mr. McMULLIN. I move, with the gentleman's consent, that the committee rise.

Mr. TAYLOR. I would suggest to the gentleman to modify his motion so that it will be in the power of the committee to take a recess till seven o'clock. I think these speeches of an hour each in length should be heard in the evening and business would be facilitated. We will get through a month sooner by adopting that plan.

Mr. FITCH. If all the members present were convinced, they would not constitute a quorum of the committee.

Mr. TAYLOR. We can have a general understanding no vote shall be taken.

Mr. HOUSTON. We had last week, at the evening session, a better audience than we had in the morning.

Mr. TAYLOR. Gentlemen need not come here if they do not want to.

Mr. FITCH. I cannot explain my other amendment in five minutes, and will therefore yield altogether my right to the floor.

Mr. JOHNSON, of Arkansas. I do not want to speak to-night. I am willing that the debate shall be closed after the conclusion of my speech, but I would ask the indulgence of the committee to submit my remarks in the morning.

Mr. TAYLOR. I wish to suggest to my friend from Arkansas that there are many gentlemen who desire to speak. It is pleasant to speak during the evenings, as we have proven. I should have great pleasure in listening to the gentleman to-morrow, but some other one can occupy the floor this evening. We have but a month to sit here, and it is utterly impossible to accomplish the public business unless we debate during the evenings.

Mr. JOHNSON. Then to-morrow morning there would be no certainty I should be entitled to the floor.

Mr. TAYLOR. There would be an understanding that the gentleman should be entitled to the floor in the morning.

The question was then taken on the motion submitted by Mr. McMULLIN, and it was agreed to.

The committee accordingly rose, and the Speaker having resumed the chair, the chairman reported that the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union had had the state of the Union generally under consideration, and particularly House bill No. 43, "making appropriations for the Indian department for the year ending 30th of June, 1853," and had come to no conclusion thereon.

IMPROVEMENT OF THE SAVANNAH RIVER.

Mr. JACKSON. I ask the unanimous consent of the House to take up Senate bill No. 96, "to provide for the removal of obstructions in the river Savannah and for the improvement of the same," for the purpose of reference. It is a bill in which my constituents are deeply interested.

There was no objection, and the bill was taken up, read a first and second time by its title, and referred to the Committee on Commerce.

DEBATE ON THE INDIAN BILL.

Mr. HOUSTON. The gentleman from Arkansas has stated his willingness to have the debate closed on the Indian appropriation bill as soon as he shall have concluded his remarks. I presume no one else desires to discuss it. The Senate have now introduced a joint resolution proposing to amend the joint rules of the two Houses that appropriation bills from us shall not be received within ten days from the time fixed for adjournment. It is absolutely important we should send them something. I move debate upon the Indian appropriation bill be terminated one hour after the committee shall again resume its consideration.

Objection was made.

Mr. JONES, of Tennessee. I move to reconsider the vote by which the resolution was adopted.

EULOGIES ON MR. CLAY.

Mr. PRICE. I ask the unanimous consent of the House to submit the following resolution:

Resolved, That twenty thousand copies of the obituary speeches and proceedings, upon the death of Henry Clay, in the Senate and this House, be printed, under the direction of the Committee on Printing, for the House.

There was no objection.

The question was then taken, and the resolution was unanimously adopted.

Mr. FOWLER moved the House adjourn; which motion was agreed to.

And the House adjourned till to-morrow, at eleven o'clock, a. m.

PETITIONS, &c.

The following petitions and memorial were presented under the rule, and referred to the appropriate committees:

By Mr. BROWN, of Mississippi: The petition of A. E. Lewis and other citizens of Louisiana, Mississippi, and Alabama, praying an appropriation to remove obstructions at the mouth of the East Pascagoula river.

By Mr. CHANDLER: The memorial of William Beschke, asking from Congress assistance to complete a steamboat with a new mode of propulsion; also, patronage for a ship gun and other valuable inventions.

By Mr. GILMORE: The petition of citizens of Indiana county, Pennsylvania, for a post route from Indiana, Pennsylvania, to Smicksburg in Indiana county, Pennsylvania.

IN SENATE.

THURSDAY, July 15, 1852.

Prayer by the Chaplain, Rev. C. M. BUTLER.

Mr. BRIGHT presented the credentials of the Hon. DAVID MERIWETHER, appointed a Senator by the Governor of Kentucky in place of the Hon. HENRY CLAY, deceased, which were read, as follows:

COMMONWEALTH OF KENTUCKY, scd

Henry Clay, Esquire, who was duly chosen Senator for this Commonwealth, in pursuance of the Constitution of the United States of America, having resigned during the last session of the Legislature of the Commonwealth, to take effect on the first Monday of September next, and having died before the period that his resignation takes effect—I, Lazarus W. Powell, being Governor or Chief Magistrate of the Commonwealth, have, therefore, thought fit, by virtue of the said Constitution, to appoint DAVID MERIWETHER, Esquire, to be and act as a Senator for the Commonwealth until the time the resignation of the said Henry Clay takes effect.

Given under my hand and seal of the Commonwealth this 6th day of July, 1852.

L. W. POWELL.

By the Governor:

J. P. METCALFE, Secretary of State.

The oath prescribed by law having been administered to Mr. MERIWETHER, he took his seat in the Senate.

Mr. BRIGHT. The letter of appointment just read, and which conferred upon you authority to administer the oath just taken by the honorable Senator from Kentucky, must have struck Senators who paid attention to its reading; as different in phraseology from letters or certificates of appointments usually given in such cases.

That paper limits the term of service of the appointee to the first Monday of September next, that being the time at which the resignation of the then Senator (since deceased) was to take effect.

My object in rising is not to ask action at this time upon the credentials of the pro tempore appointee, but to say that I regard the limitation contained in the credentials of the honorable Senator as standing for naught, and that though he may not himself set up claim to the seat he occupies, after the time mentioned in the paper just read, yet he has certain constitutional rights, his constituency and every State in the Union have certain constitutional rights arising out of, and to be affected by the mode and manner this question is determined, which will require him to serve until such time as those delegated by the Constitution of the United States shall act in choosing his successor. I have made these suggestions to prevent any misconception of the facts, and to place my esteemed friend, the honorable Senator from Kentucky, in a proper position before the body if the question should ever come up again. The honorable Senator himself, I am authorized to say, has personally no feeling in the matter other than that which arises from a desire to serve his constituents faithfully, and fulfill the obligations of the laws and Constitution under which he acts.

Mr. DOUGLAS. I would suggest the propriety of referring these credentials to the Committee on the Judiciary. I entertain great doubts as to the power of the Governor to appoint a Senator, and limit the period to a shorter time than that prescribed by the Constitution of the United States. The Constitution declares that if a vacancy occurs during the recess of the Legislature, the Governor may make a temporary appointment, and the commission shall extend to the next meeting of the Legislature; which shall then fill such vacancy. I entertain great doubt as to the power of the Governor, in his commission, to make a limitation, not only unauthorized by the Constitution, but in direct violation of its express terms. As to what the effect of such a limitation would be upon this commission, I am not prepared to state. I think it may as well go to the Judiciary Committee for investigation.

Mr. BUTLER. I have no doubt that this question is a very important one; but I should dislike to anticipate events, and act for something which may never arrive. I am one of those who do not think that the mere paper is anything but the evidence of the title. The real title of the Senator who has just taken his seat is according to the Constitution, and what may be conferred upon him by the Commonwealth of Kentucky. I do not hold that the Governor of the State, by any language he can use, can limit the tenure of office under the Constitution of the United States. But I will say to my friend from Illinois that it is possible that this issue may never arise; and if it does, and Mr. Dixon should come here and claim the seat, the honorable Senator may be perfectly quiet, because it will be the duty of this body at that time to decide upon the validity of his election.

Mr. DOUGLAS. I have made no motion, but simply threw out the suggestion.

Mr. BRIGHT. I think, with the Senator from South Carolina, that the contingency may never arise, and therefore it would be premature now to make a reference to the paper presented. If it does arise, it will then be time enough to raise the issue. That matter was considered before the paper was presented. I hope the Senator from Illinois will not press his suggestion.

Mr. GWIN. I differ entirely from the Senator from Indiana. I think this paper ought to be referred to the Judiciary Committee. If it is not in accordance with the requirements of the Constitution, it ought to be so declared. It is no appointment at all, if the Governor has put an improper limitation upon it. Certainly the Senator who has just taken a seat in this body cannot hold his seat longer than the period specified in the commission; which is until the time when Mr. Dixon's commission is to take effect. I do not intend to prejudge the question; but I am clearly of the opinion that the wording of the executive appointment is wrong. It is the only paper of the kind that has ever been presented in this body. A vacancy was created by resignation to take effect at a future day, followed by an election to fill the vacancy from the date specified. In the mean time the Senator who resigned, to take effect at a future day, dies before that day arrives; and the vacancy of that seat in this body is by death, and not resignation, and should be filled accordingly. I think it cannot be filled in the form of the commission that has just been read. It should have had no reference to Mr. Dixon's election. The question ought to be examined by the Committee on the Judiciary before we pass away from it.

Mr. COOPER. Mr. President, I think there can be no doubt in relation to this question. I think the suggestions made by the honorable Senator from South Carolina, commend themselves to the favorable judgment of the Senate. The Senator from California is certainly wrong when he says, there is no commission conferred upon the Senator from Kentucky, by the paper which has been read. If there be an improper limit, in contravention of the Constitution, that limitation is void, and is mere surplusage, which does not affect the Senator's right to the seat. But I think, as it is a question that may never arise, it is better that it should be passed over until the occasion presents itself.

The PRESIDENT. There is no motion before the Senate.

The conversation therefore dropped.

PETITIONS, ETC.

Mr. RUSK. I formerly presented a petition from mail contractors for extra allowance. This subject was presented to the House of Representatives in 1844, where it was acted upon. During this session of Congress, the petition, with accompanying papers, was presented here, and referred to the Committee on the Post Office and Post Roads. In the examination of these papers, I found that the matter had been before Congress, and been acted upon; therefore it became necessary to obtain the papers which were presented with the petition originally. These were in the office of the Clerk of the House of Representatives. I applied for them, and he said that he could not permit them to leave his office, without an order of the House. I therefore procured the order withdrawing them, for the purpose of presenting them to the Senate; which I now do, and move that they be referred to the Committee on the Post Office and Post Roads.

They were so referred.

Mr. SUMNER presented a petition of citizens of Franklin county, Massachusetts, praying that the homestead bill may become a law; which was referred to the Committee on Public Lands.

Mr. SOULE presented a resolution of the United States Agricultural Society, praying to be incorporated; which was referred to the Committee on Agriculture.

Also, resolutions of the National Convention for the promotion of Agriculture, asking the aid of Congress in promoting the interests of that branch of industry; which were referred to the Committee on Agriculture.

Mr. COOPER. I have been requested to present the memorial of William Beschke, a native of Prussia, and a naturalized citizen of the United States, praying Congress to examine an invention which he denominates a "breach-loading steady ship-gun," and also a model propeller. I will merely state that I know the gentleman. He is a man of education and scientific attainments. His gun has been examined by a number of gentlemen, and has been pronounced a very extraordinary invention. This much I thought but just to the memorialist to state before moving to refer the memorial to the Committee on Naval Affairs, which I now do.

It was so referred.

Mr. MORTON presented the petition of George J. Tehnbauer, praying additional compensation for taking the Seventh Census in Florida; which was referred to the Committee on Claims.

Mr. GWIN presented a petition of citizens of Nevada, California, praying the establishment of a branch Mint in that State; which was ordered to be laid on the table.

REPORT FROM A STANDING COMMITTEE.

Mr. WALKER, from the Committee on Revolutionary Claims, to which was referred the memorial of Anna De Neufville, submitted a report, accompanied by a joint resolution for the relief of the heir of John De Neufville and son; which was read and passed to the second reading.

The report was ordered to be printed.

NOAH HANSON.

Mr. HAMLIN submitted the following resolution for consideration:

Resolved, That the Secretary of the Senate be, and he is hereby, directed to pay out of the contingent fund of the Senate, to Mrs. W. Maria Hanson, as administratrix of the estate of Noah Hanson, law messenger of the Senate, the usual per diem compensation for his services from March 27, 1851, to June 1, 1851, and from October 1, to November 1, 1851, the time of his decease, and also to pay the funeral expenses of said Hanson, as heretofore paid in similar cases.

DERBY'S REPORT.

Mr. GWIN submitted the following resolution for consideration:

Resolved, That one thousand additional copies of the report of the Secretary of War of the 15th of June, communicating, in compliance with a resolution of the Senate, a reconnaissance of the Gulf of California, and the Colorado river, by Lieutenant Derby, be printed for the use of the Senate.

BILL INTRODUCED.

Mr. DAWSON, by unanimous consent, asked and obtained leave to introduce a bill for the relief of certain Mexicans living in territory acquired by the treaty of Guadalupe Hidalgo; which was read a first and second time by its title, and referred to the Committee on the Judiciary.

BILLS PASSED.

The following engrossed bills were severally read a third time and passed:

An act allowing exchanges of school lands, and authorizing selections for deficiencies in certain cases; and

An act to provide for the survey of the public lands in California, the granting of donation privileges therein, and for other purposes.

ADJOURNMENT OF CONGRESS.

Mr. HUNTER. Some time since a resolution from the House, in relation to the adjournment of Congress, was, upon my motion, ordered to lie upon the table. I desire now to move to take it up for consideration.

Mr. SHIELDS. I would ask the honorable Senator from Virginia if he wishes to fix the day of adjournment until we know something about the appropriation bills?

Mr. HUNTER. I had intended to state, that it was my purpose, if the resolution should be taken up, to move to amend it by fixing the 30th of August, which I think is the earliest day upon which we can adjourn. It will be for the Senate, however, to determine what day it will fix. My own opinion is, that, by the 30th day of August, we ought to be able to get through with the business of the session. If the Senate should take up the resolution, it is my purpose to offer the amendment I have indicated. I should not be willing to vote to fix an earlier day, and I fear we cannot get through the necessary business if we fix an earlier day.

The motion to take up the resolution was agreed to, and the Senate proceeded to consider it. It is as follows:

Resolved, (with the concurrence of the Senate,) That the President of the Senate, and the Speaker of the House of Representatives, close the present session of Congress by an adjournment of their respective Houses on Monday, the 16th day of August next, at the hour of twelve o'clock, meridian.

Mr. HUNTER. I move to amend the resolution by striking out "sixteenth," and inserting "thirtieth," so as to fix the day of adjournment for the 30th of August.

Mr. SHIELDS. I am as anxious as the honorable Senator from Virginia to adjourn at an early day; but, I confess, we have been treated in such a way by the House for two sessions past, that I am very unwilling to close the door, by adopting such a resolution, before we receive the general appropriation bills. The last session we sat here, we had a certain number of hours in which to accomplish our work, and we had to hurry through the most important bills which came before Congress. We all recollect the manner in which that matter was conducted, and the scenes which were transacted in this Chamber. I think it is the duty of the House to send us the appropriation bills in due time; and when those bills come we will concur with them in adjourning as promptly as possible. But unless we do that; unless we make that understood, my impression is that those appropriation bills will be kept back as they have been heretofore, and we will be compelled to accept them as they come from the House, without examining them, or to reject them in toto. I am anxious for an early adjournment; but I should dislike very much to be placed in the position in which we have been placed for the two sessions past.

Mr. GWIN. I shall vote against fixing any day of adjournment until the amendment to the rules, suggested by the Senator from New Hampshire, [Mr. NORRIS,] is adopted. I am utterly opposed to fixing a day of adjournment, unless we have, ten days prior to that period, all the appropriation bills before us. I hope there will be no day fixed until that amendment to the rules is made. If we place ourselves in the power of the House, they may send us the whole of these appropriation bills two or three days before the adjournment, and we shall be forced to pass them without examination. I am opposed to fixing any day until the amendment of the rules, proposed by the Senator from New Hampshire, is adopted.

Mr. DOUGLAS. If it be in order, I would move a resolution that the Secretary of the Senate be instructed to notify the House of Representatives, that the Senate will be ready to adjourn in ten days after we receive the appropriation bills from the House. As things now stand, it is held forth to the country that we are responsible for protracting this session of Congress. I wish it to be understood that the Senate are ready to adjourn, at any time, as soon as we can receive the appropriation bills and have time to act upon them. I suppose ten days would be sufficient, and would be the shortest time within which we could act upon them, if we should be ready to enter upon their consideration the moment they are received. I think it is due to the country, I think it is due to the other House, that they should know why it is that we are waiting and not fixing a day of adjournment. We are waiting simply for the House to send us those bills; and if the House can understand officially that that is the reason why the Senate is waiting, it will probably hasten the reception of the bills, and will, at any rate, let both the House and the country know the reason for the delay.

The PRESIDENT. A proposition of the nature suggested by the Senator from Illinois, will not be in order.

Mr. ADAMS. I shall vote against the amendment proposed by the Senator from Virginia, with the hope that this body will concur in the resolution passed by the House, which has been on our table for the last month. It is suggested by the Senator from Illinois, [Mr. SHIELDS,] that the appropriation bills may be sent here at so late a period, that this body will not have an opportunity to act upon them; and the last session has been referred to as an instance of that. I would ask that Senator, or any other Senator, whether, within the last twenty years, he has ever known any session of Congress, or of any other deliberative body, where the mass of business was not thrown on the last days of the session? It is so every session; and shall we better the matter by postponing the day of adjournment until the 30th of August? I think not. I think that if we determine to adjourn on the 16th of August, the House will send to the Senate the appropriation bills as soon as possible. At all events, it seems to me the Senate should concur in the resolution of the House, and then do the best we can. We have already consumed a great deal of time; and I think it is due to the Senate, it is due to the country, it is due to the character of the Congress of the United States, that we should adjourn very early. In my humble opinion, we shall make more character, and do the country more good by an early adjournment, than by any legislation.

Mr. HAMLIN. I am willing to vote for the shortest time for adjournment that any Senator will name; I am willing to vote for the resolution of the House, which is now under consideration, if we can first have a vote of the House upon the resolution which has been submitted by the Senator from New Hampshire, [Mr. NORRIS,] But until we can have that, I am not disposed to vote for any particular day of adjournment. There is a responsibility which rests upon this body in relation to the annual appropriation bills. When those bills are sent to us at the last week of the session, we assume that responsibility without being able to perfect those bills. We are made responsible for acts for which we should not be held responsible.

Mr. BUTLER. Reject them.

Mr. HAMLIN. The Senator from South Carolina says, "reject them." Now, the Senator from South Carolina knows very well, that, however obnoxious, however objectionable, or however wrong may be some of the provisions contained in an annual appropriation bill, it would be utter folly to attempt to reject it. If we, therefore, proclaim to the House, that we shall be ready to adjourn at any period of time within ten days after they shall forward to us the appropriation bills, it seems to me that we discharge our whole duty.

I understood the suggestion made by the Senator from Illinois [Mr. DOUGLAS] to be a distinct motion. I suppose the amendment of the Senator from Virginia will be first in order; but after the question shall be taken upon his motion to amend, I suppose it will be in order to move to amend the resolution by striking out the whole of it, and passing in its place a resolution that the Senate will be ready to adjourn within ten days after the appropriation bills shall be sent to it from the House; or let the resolution lie upon the table until the Senator from New Hampshire shall have the opportunity of passing his amendment to the joint rules, and send it to the House, and let them concur in it. I will then vote to adjourn on the 16th of August, or at any time after they shall give us ten days to pass upon the appropriation bills; and, in my judgment, that is a very limited time.

Mr. HUNTER. Mr. President, there are two classes of objections to the amendment which I have proposed. The Senator from Illinois [Mr. SHIELDS] objects that it is unsafe to fix any day for adjournment at all until we get the appropriation bills, and in that he is sustained by the Senator from Maine. The Senator from Mississippi, and some others, think we ought to adopt the resolution as it came from the House, and fix the time of adjournment for the 16th of August. I am inclined to think that it would not be wise to wait until the appropriation bills are sent from the House, but that it would be more politic to fix some day, by which the business of the country could be transacted, if the two Houses were disposed to do so, not only because it is proper in itself, but because it is usual, and operates as a sort of notice between the two Houses that the session is to terminate at that time, and they apply themselves more closely to business after the day of adjournment is fixed. Such has been our experience heretofore.

I doubt, if we were to fix no day, whether the appropriation bills would be here by the end of August. I think it probable that the House would still continue to delay, and that we might have that series of debates in which Congress has been engaged for some time past.

Neither do I think it would be altogether courteous or proper to send to the House such a resolution as my friend from Illinois [Mr. DOUGLAS] proposes to send. He proposes to send our Secretary down to the House to say that "within ten days after you send us the appropriation bills we will be ready to adjourn." It would be, in effect, saying, "nothing prevents us from adjourning but your neglect to discharge your appropriate functions and duties."

Mr. GWIN. It is true.

Mr. HUNTER. If it be true, it would scarcely be courteous in us to say this to the other House. It seems to me that it would be improper. I believe that if the appropriation bills were here, we could perhaps get through with them in ten days, but it would be very hard work. I think that would be hardly time enough to allow. Besides, what would be the meaning of the phrase? Should we wait for ten days after all the appropriation bills get here, or ten days after the first one? They have already sent us two appropriation bills—very small ones it is true—pension bills, which have been acted on. If it means that we shall be ready to adjourn ten days after the last appropriation bill shall be sent to us, it might be more time than would be necessary for the consideration of any one bill. But I think it is objectionable on the ground that it would be considered discourteous, and would engage us in disputes with the other House, which I wish to avoid.

On the other hand, it is my opinion, from what I can learn, and I have endeavored to ascertain—for I am anxious to fix as early a day as the Senator from Mississippi or any other gentleman—that we cannot get through with the necessary business of the country by the 16th of August, even if the House and the Senate were both to work as long and as much as could reasonably be expected of them. We not only have all the main appropriation bills to act upon, except the two small pension bills to which I have referred, but we have a vast mass of other business upon the Calendar which ought to be attended to. I am told that the House has done very little in regard to private claims. It will probably be insisted upon that it shall devote some two or three days to the Private Calendar, before it adjourns; and it is right and proper that it should do something for the relief of private claimants. We all know that if we were to work diligently from now until the 30th of August, it would be as much as we could do to dispatch properly the business connected with the appropriation bills, and certain other bills relating to the business of the country, some of which we have sent down to the House, and some of which are yet to be considered—bills of great importance. I do not think, therefore, that it would be safe to fix any day earlier than the 30th of August, and yet I think we ought to fix on the first day we can, with safety, to operate by way of notice to the House and to the country that we intend to get through, if possible, by that day; and I think it would be an inducement to the House themselves to do business more rapidly.

Mr. BUTLER. I made a remark just now which, perhaps, I might as well explain. I intimated that it would be proper in some cases to reject the appropriation bills. I say so again. If the House give us notice that they will adjourn on the 16th of August, and they fail to send us the appropriation bills within such time as they themselves have indicated, I say, for one, on the responsibility of a Senator, that I would not take their bills blindly; but I would be willing to reject the bad ones, and leave the responsibility with them. I want no controversy between the two Houses; and when the intimation is thrown out that the House has not transacted business with dispatch, I think we might as well look to some delays in this body, occasioned by such discussions as took place with regard to the Collins line.

Mr. HALE. Mr. President, I have no professions to make of my desire to go home, or of my willingness to adjourn. I will let that matter take care of itself; but I want to call the attention of the Senate to the fact, that two years ago we agreed, I do not know exactly when, to adjourn on the 30th of September. On the 24th of September, six days before that, we had an appropriation bill sent to us from the House, making an appropriation of some $10,000,000 for the naval service of the United States. That was committed to our appropriate committee; and, Sunday intervening, on the 28th of September, when we had to adjourn on the 30th, we had, for the first time, under consideration that bill making appropriations to the amount of $10,000,000. I had given some attention to the subject, and I asked to have that bill read through once, and I remember that half a dozen or a dozen Senators got around me immediately, begging, for God's sake, that I would not be so factious, but that I would withdraw the request to have read through once a bill that was to appropriate about as much money as it used to cost that "extravagant" administration of John Quincy Adams to get through the year with. But I believe the bill was read through once, and on that day it was passed. It was remarked by a Senator from North Carolina, [Mr. BADGER,] that it was within his knowledge that Senators then voted against their convictions, because, they said, there was no time to consider amendments. He mentioned a fact which is within the recollection of many Senators who now hear me, that an honorable Senator from Kentucky, now deceased, was in his place, and voted with me on an amendment, merely because, he said, there was not time to consider it; and his vote was given against his judgment because there was no time.

Now, I am not willing to put myself in that position. I will not vote for any day, 30th or 40th, that may be named, until I am sure the business of the Senate is in such a position that I may acquit myself of the responsibility which belongs to me—and I conceive that I have some—as an individual Senator, of exercising my deliberative judgment upon the appropriation bills which may be sent here.

I remember, too, one very important bill, a bill making appropriations for all the light-houses of the United States—a matter of very great importance to commerce—and the question was how fast our clerks could run from here to the House, and from the House to the President's, to get that light house bill signed. I believe it was estimated that if our clerks could run from here to the House, and from there back to the President's room, and then here again in five minutes, it might be passed. Five minutes was all the time we had under the position in which we voluntarily put ourselves, for the consideration of a bill making appropriations for all the light-houses in the United States. Now, sir, I am willing to take the responsibility and the odium, if any odium comes with it, of absolutely refusing to fix any day for adjournment until we can be satisfied that we shall be in a situation in which we may discharge the responsibilities which belong to us, by deliberately considering the propositions made to us to appropriate the money of the people.

Mr. BORLAND. I am as anxious as any one to adjourn, and I think the Senator from Mississippi gave some good reasons why we should adjourn at an early day. There was one other which he might have added, which I confess has a good deal of influence with me, in desiring to adjourn at an early day; that is, that it would greatly promote the comfort of Senators and members of the other House, as well as the character of Congress. But, sir, my constituents are too much interested in important measures which are now pending before Congress, to permit me to vote for an adjournment at a day so early that it would almost inevitably prevent the passage of these bills by refusing them time. I would adjourn next week if the business which we have before us could be acted upon by that time. I do not believe that can be the case. I do not believe it can be acted upon by the 16th of August. I doubt whether many important measures can be acted upon by the 30th of August. But as that time seems to have met the views of Senators, and there seems to be some good reason why we might get through with the important business by that time, I shall vote for the amendment of the Senator from Virginia.

But, Mr. President, I think there is one consideration—and it seems to be the main one brought forward here against an early adjournment—which has very little foundation in fact. It is the importance of passing the appropriation bills. In view of what has been the action of this Government within the last year especially—I speak of the Executive Government—I do in all conscience, believe that it is a matter of comparatively little importance whether we pass the appropriation bills or not in advance for the public service. The Senator from Virginia, [Mr. HUNTER,] as chairman of the Committee on Finance, is ready this morning to report the deficiency bill, which yesterday came back from the House; which bill proves clearly and conclusively, that whether we pass the appropriation bills or not, or whether we put items in them or not of a particular character, the Executive finds no difficulty in carrying on the Government. If it be lawful, if it be right for that Department of the Government to contract obligations, incur expenses, and use the public funds in the administration of the Government without an appropriation by law, then all this anxiety and solicitude which Senators manifest on the subject of the appropriation bills has, in my opinion, very little to do with the merits of the question. Suppose we pass an appropriation bill, suppose, in our discretion, we appropriate only half as much as the Executive Department of the Government said would be necessary, does that make any difference as to the amount? Suppose we leave out three, five, ten, or twenty millions from the fifty or sixty millions per annum which I suppose we shall have to use for the expenses of the Government under this Administration, will that lessen the expenses of the Government? If we may judge from the past, it will serve but as a stimulant to expend more. I do not know but if we were to leave it to the discretion of the Executive altogether, that we should gain something for the public interest; for when, last year, we refused an appropriation asked for by the Executive, that Department, in disregard of our refusal, went on and not only expended what we refused, but made the amount a little larger, if I am capable of making the calculation.

Mr. SEWARD. I shall vote for the amendment proposed by the Senator from Virginia, because I am satisfied that it is the duty of the Senate to cooperate with the House in bringing this session to a close within a reasonable time. I have never known a legislative body to adjourn in any other way, except by a prorogation power elsewhere, or by resolution similar to this. I have never known any deliberative body that adjourned itself in any other way than by a resolution introduced in one House, passed, and sent to the other to meet its approbation, fixing a day in advance, at which time it was supposed, upon consultation, that both would probably get through the business before them. I can see very well that we shall not be prepared to adjourn on the day named by the House of Representatives, but if we extend the time a fortnight, and give them notice now, if they act as they have always acted, and as all legislative bodies with which I have had any acquaintance have acted, they will then address themselves to the business that devolves upon them. The amendment of the Senator from Virginia strikes me as being reasonable and practicable, and I am sure we shall never adjourn in any other way but by the passage of a resolution.

Mr. MILLER. I have been a member of this body about ten years, and at the end of every long session of Congress during that time, we have had the same difficulty in fixing the time of adjournment. If gentlemen will turn their attention to the debates which took place whenever a resolution of this kind came from the House, they will find that what has been said to-day is nothing more than a repetition of what has been said before—the difficulty of getting through the business at the time fixed by the House; and yet experience has shown that we never commence really to work up the business of the nation until the House designates the time of adjournment. When the period is once fixed, we go to work knowing the time we have and the business likely to come before us, and prepare ourselves to adjourn at the time fixed by the two Houses. With regard to the general appropriation bills, I think there are more difficulties suggested here than actually exist. The principal and most important matters contained in those bills are national matters. We all understand generally what they ought to be; and it is not necessary for the body to wait until the House sends them to us for the purpose of calling our attention to them. All these matters are thought of by honorable Senators. They know generally the nature of the appropriation bills, and are prepared to act upon them when they come. The respective committees of the Senate have already considered, I have no doubt, many of the important matters contained in them. When they have come here, the difficulty has not been with regard to the important matters contained in them, for want of a proper investigation, but on account of some factious opposition frequently made to certain appropriations. Now, that opposition will be made, no matter how far distant you may fix the day. If you fix as the day the 1st of October, you will find the same difficulty when the time arrives. I also understand that the other House is now prepared, and intend to take up immediately the appropriation bills. They have already changed their hour of meeting from twelve to eleven o'clock, and I have no doubt that the appropriation bills will be taken up and acted upon by that body on or about the 1st of August. I think we might get through the business at the time fixed by the House, but for fear there may be some difficulty in that, I am willing to vote for the amendment of the Senator from Virginia.

Mr. DAWSON. I do not intend to make a speech upon the subject, but merely to state the reasons why I shall vote for the original resolution. It is said by every Senator that we are anxious to adjourn, and such I believe to be the feeling of all. It is stated by the Senator from Illinois, that we can adjourn within ten days after the reception of the appropriation bills; and that if we do not adjourn the fault will be with the House of Representatives. The House of Representatives have announced to us by resolution, that they will be ready to adjourn on the 16th of August. Are they not the best judges of their own power and capacity to discharge the duty incumbent on them? And are we going to give an excuse for the extension of this session of Congress, by adding fifteen or sixteen days to the session, thereby changing the onus before the public from the House to the Senate? My own judgment is, that the House of Representatives will send us the whole of these bills, at least by the 4th or 5th of next month—especially as they have said so; and that we can take up the whole of the measures and carry them through, and be prepared to adjourn at the time designated. What is to prevent us? Is it not known to every Senator who has been here during the sessions limited by the Constitution to ninety days, that no business is transacted prior to the 1st day of January, ensuing our meeting; and that scarcely ever is an appropriation bill reported to the House of Representatives before the 1st of February? And yet we always adjourn on the 4th of March, as required by the Constitution. What, now, is the object of this limitation? To place upon us the same necessity in the long session, which we have prolonged for nine months, as the Constitution places upon us for a short session. We shall then act more and talk less, and debate no measure that it is not desirable to pass. I therefore shall vote against the amendment of the Senator from Virginia; and I say to him, in doing so, that I have great confidence in his judgment; but he ought not to seek to be the judge of the House of Representatives; he ought not to take it upon himself to say that the House of Representatives will not do what they have proposed to do. They have said that they will be ready to adjourn on the 16th of August. Let us pass the resolution. If there should be any failure, by our concurring in it, and we should be driven to the inevitable necessity of passing another resolution extending the time of the adjournment, the fault will not be ours, but will be that of the House of Representatives.

Mr. HUNTER. I desire to state a fact, which is made necessary by the remarks of the Senator from Georgia. I am not assuming to be the judge of the other House. I have consulted with some of the experienced members of the Committee of Ways and Means, and from what they tell me, it will be unsafe to adjourn before the 30th of August.

Mr. DAWSON. The Senator will pardon me for saying that we have their declaration in the resolution. It is their public act before the country. By that we are to be judged; not by the private conversation of some of their members.

Mr. SHIELDS. I desire to make a statement. I think it may relieve us from embarrassment. Perhaps we had better keep the resolution in our own power. Let it lie on the table; and let us adapt our action upon it to the action of the House. I should dislike to send it back. I would rather have the original resolution in our power, and await some further action of the House on the business before them.

Mr. GWIN. No member of the Senate is more anxious for an early adjournment than I am; for unless we adjourn early, it will be impossible for the Senators and Representatives from California to go home before the next session; but I shall not vote for any day of adjournment until we get the appropriation bills from the House of Representatives. I had some little experience on that subject during the last Congress. The Senator from New Hampshire [Mr. HALE] has alluded to what took place during the last long session of Congress. The light-house bill passed here without even being read. He might have named that; and the bill at the last session was passed also without being read; and it contained provisions which make a perfect mass of nonsense, so far as portions of my State are concerned. I think this experience, which we have had so recently, should induce us to withhold our assent from any adjournment until we have an opportunity of examining such important bills. I am therefore entirely opposed to fixing a day of adjournment now. I think it is a matter of necessity that we should have some assurance of receiving the appropriation bills from the House in a reasonable time, before we come to a determination upon an adjournment. They have not taken bills from the Speaker's table which we passed months ago. Talk about the progress of business made by that House! They have made no progress. We cannot judge of the future by the past; or, if we can, there will be no adjournment at all. We should not put it out of our power to examine the appropriation bills when they send them to us. I hope, therefore, there will be no action here on this subject until we have some evidence that we shall have time to examine those bills, or, at least, until the passage of the amendment to the rules proposed by the Senator from New Hampshire, [Mr. NORRIS.] I hope that amendment may be agreed to; and, in the mean time, I move to lay the resolution on the table.

Mr. ADAMS asked for the yeas and nays on the motion, and they were ordered; and being taken resulted—yeas 12, nays 34; as follow:

YEAS—Messrs. Davis, Dodge of Iowa, Douglas, Geyer,

Gwin, Hale, Hamlin, Norris, Rusk, Shields, Sumner, and Walker—12.

NAYS—Messrs. Adams, Atchison, Bayard, Bell, Borland, Bright, Brodhead, Brooke, Butler, Charlton, Chase, Clarke, Cooper, Dawson, De Saussure, Dodge of Wisconsin, Felch, Foot, Hunter, James, King, Mallory, Mason, Meriwether, Miller, Pratt, Sebastian, Seward, Smith, Soule, Spruance, Toucey, Upham, and Wade—34.

So the motion was not agreed to.

Mr. RUSK. I move to postpone the further consideration of the subject until to-morrow. If we go on with it now we shall inevitably consume the whole day in debating it. The chairman of the Committee on Military Affairs yesterday gave notice that he would to-day call up a most important bill, which was reported from that committee—one that is extremely important to the country, as it is to the State I represent, for we are constantly being murdered by the Indians there; and I hope it will be taken up and considered.

Several Senators. We can vote on the resolution now.

Mr. RUSK. I withdraw the motion, if we can come to a vote.

Mr. ADAMS. I ask for the yeas and nays on the amendment of the Senator from Virginia.

The yeas and nays were ordered; and being taken resulted—yeas 22, nays 22; as follow:

YEAS—Messrs. Atchison, Bell, Borland, Bright, Brodhead, Brooke, Butler, Charlton, Dodge of Iowa, Felch, Foot, Hunter, James, Mason, Miller, Sebastian, Seward, Smith, Spruance, Sumner, Upham, and Wade—22.

NAYS—Messrs. Adams, Bayard, Chase, Clarke, Cooper, Davis, Dawson, De Saussure, Dodge of Wisconsin, Geyer, Gwin, Hale, Hamlin, King, Mallory, Norris, Pratt, Rusk, Shields, Soule, Toucey, and Walker—22.

So the amendment was rejected.

Mr. MERIWETHER, when his name was called, said: I ask to be excused from voting. The question is one on which I do not feel prepared to vote, not being apprised of the state of the business before Congress.

The PRESIDENT. If such is the pleasure of the Senate the gentleman will be excused.

Mr. SHIELDS. If it be in order now, I will move to lay the resolution on the table. My reason for it is, that I think we are going to get into some difficulty. I really apprehend, though I am anxious to adjourn on the day designated by the House, that the business is not in such a way as to enable us to do so. I am anxious to adjourn; but I should prefer to keep this resolution in our own power for the present. I suggest to the Senator from Virginia, whether it will at all retard the business, to keep it a week longer in our power? I am as anxious to adjourn as he is; but there are so many important bills to be acted upon, that I think if we adjourn on the 16th, from the way the House transacts business, we shall disappoint the country. If it be competent, I will move to lay the resolution on the table, for the purpose of taking it up again at a proper time, as soon as we ascertain the state of things in the House. I do not feel prepared to vote for it now as it stands.

Several Senators. Move to postpone it.

Mr. SHIELDS. I will change my motion, and move to postpone the further consideration of the resolution until this day week. By that time I think the House will have taken some action, which will enable us to act more intelligently.

Mr. DAVIS. I hope that motion will prevail. It is hardly worth while for me to go into the reasons; but I really should be glad to know whether we can accomplish the business which is indispensably necessary before we fix upon the day of adjournment. I think we have been put to great inconvenience, and done injustice to ourselves and to the country, by the hurried manner in which we have heretofore been obliged, at the close of the session, to vote upon important bills. All the important bills of the session are in the rear at this moment—more in the rear than at any session which has occurred. I should be glad to experiment a little before the resolution is disposed of, to see what progress we can make. Whenever we can see day-light in regard to an adjournment, the earlier the better; but I should be loth to go away without discharging our obligations to the country, by passing the necessary appropriation and other bills. By passing the resolution, we may throw the opportunity of discharging our duty out of our hands. We came very near it, at the session before the last. We were driven within three or four hours of the last moments of the session, to pass the most important business we had. I do not want to be put in that position again.

Mr. PRATT. I am satisfied that, but for the motion of the honorable Senator from Virginia, [Mr. HUNTER,] by which this resolution was laid upon the table when sent here from the House, we should have been prepared to adjourn upon the day indicated by the House. I am further satisfied, that if it continues to lie on the table, we shall be in the same position at the end of one month, or two months, that we are to-day. It is, therefore, essential, in my opinion, that we should act upon the resolution fixing upon some day at which the session of Congress shall be brought to a close. I believe that if we fix upon the 16th of August, the day mentioned by the House, the House will of course, in justice to the country at large, go to work upon those measures alone which are essential to be passed, and they will be in as good a position to do justice to the country as they will be by any postponement which we may make. We shall have at last to rely in a great degree upon the examination made by the committees of this body, to which these measures will be referred. It would be impossible for every Senator to discuss the details and particulars of them. We must rely in a great degree upon the judgment of the committees, and I, for one, am prepared now to vote for the resolution of the House. At any rate, we ought to act definitively upon the subject, and I therefore hope the motion to postpone will not prevail.

Mr. SOULE. It strikes me that the apprehensions entertained with reference to an early adjournment are unfounded. It would seem to be the opinion of some that the postponement of this resolution will give us some security that the business of the House will be brought up in time, and that the Senate will be allowed to act advisedly upon the measures which will come before it. Such seems certainly to be the object sought after by those who oppose the adjournment on the 16th of August. But will they realize what they mean to effect by voting against the resolution? In my judgment they will not. The experience of the past affords a presumption to the contrary. Now we have the House committed by the very step which it has thought proper to take—committed not only to the Senate but to the country—committed how? To the effect that it will in due time send to this body those measures which it cannot be expected we would be willing to pass without due consideration. Is not that the obvious bearing and effect of the resolution? Clearly it is.

And what are we going to do by postponing the resolution? Precisely the contrary of what we expect to realize. We are going to exonerate the House from the obligation which it has voluntarily and by its own act assumed, and incur it ourselves. I, for one, am unwilling to do so. I feel bound to presume that the House is as much aware of its responsibility as we can be of ours. I feel bound to presume that it will set itself to work, so as to avoid the consequences of that responsibility; but should my presumption in that respect be unfounded—if I were wrong in what I take pleasure to expect from the disposition of the House, then I am not at a loss as to the course I shall pursue. Whenever time shall be wanting for me to consider deliberately of measures committed to my judgment, I shall decline acting at all, and let the responsibility rest where it may. But, sir, I do not apprehend these extremities. The House will act—the more readily and promptly on account of the very position in which the resolution has placed its members. I shall, therefore, be for concurring at once in the resolution, as being the only means for bringing the business of this session to a close.

Mr. SHIELDS. I do not mean to protract the debate. I take no pleasure in throwing the responsibility on or onus on the House. The only question, I consider, is this: Shall we be able to transact the important business of the session in the time stated? The inquiries I have made in relation to the business in the House satisfy me that we shall not. Not one important measure has passed Congress this session. The table of the House is loaded with important bills from the Senate. And does any man suppose that they, and the appropriation bills, can pass within the time fixed in the resolution? I think not. I shall therefore persist in my motion to postpone the resolution for a week, and then, after having made inquiries, if I think we can adjourn on the 16th, I will unite with other gentlemen in endeavoring to do so. But if it be detrimental to the public business we ought not to adjourn, no matter where the responsibility falls.

Mr. BRIGHT. I concur in the opinion expressed by the Senator from Maryland, [Mr. PRATT,] that had the Senate taken up the resolution of the House when it was first brought here and concurred in it, we could have been ready at the time specified to adjourn; but having failed to do so, we have as usual since that time been very industriously engaged in doing very little. Moreover, events have occurred since that time which lost to both the Houses five or six days. The vote taken but a few moments ago, shows that there are but forty-four Senators present. Six are absent by order of the Senate. In these circumstances, I think it would be very proper to agree to the motion made by the Senator from Illinois, to defer the consideration of the resolution for one week. If then we find that we shall be able to get through by the middle of next month, we ought to agree to the resolution. But I have my doubts upon that point, and I am unwilling to see the remnant of the session—the little which is left—employed in hasty legislation, as has been the case more or less for the last five or six sessions. Gentlemen prepare their business, and are unable to get it up at an early part of the session—hence, at the close, it is put through either shapeless or not at all. I was in hopes that the close of this session would be distinguished somewhat for its attention to and care of, not only public, but private business. There is an immense amount of private business undisposed of, which is now in its incipient stage. If the amendment moved by the Senator from Virginia had been agreed to, namely: to adjourn on the 30th of August, I think we could have wound up the business by that time. I was in hopes that that would have been agreed to by the Senate, but I shall now vote with the Senator from Illinois, to postpone the resolution.

Mr. PRATT asked for the yeas and nays upon the motion to postpone; and they were ordered.

Mr. RUSK. If the honorable Senator will change his motion to postpone till Monday next, I will vote for it. I think we can act upon it as well on Monday as in a week from this time.

Mr. SHIELDS. I would make the modification most cheerfully, only my object is to make some inquiries as to the condition of business in the House—to ascertain how it stands, and how we stand. I would change it, if I could obtain that information by that time.

The PRESIDENT. It can only be modified by unanimous consent, the yeas and nays having been ordered.

Mr. HALE. I object.

The question being taken by yeas and nays, resulted—yeas 27, nays 19; as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Atchison, Bell, Borland, Bright, Brodhead, Brooke, Charleston, Davis, De Saussure, Dodge of Wisconsin, Dodge of Iowa, Felch, Foot, Geyer, Gwin, Hale, Hamlin, James, Jones of Iowa, Mallory, Mason, Meriwether, Norris, Sebastian, Shields, Sumner, and Upham—27.

NAYS—Messrs. Adams, Bayard, Butler, Chase, Clarke, Cooper, Dawson, Hunter, King, Miller, Pratt, Rusk, Seward, Smith, Soule, Spruance, Toucey, Wade, and Walker—19.

So the further consideration of the resolution was postponed till Thursday next.

RECONSIDERATION.

Mr. NORRIS. I move to reconsider the vote by which the amendment of the Senator from Virginia to the resolution which has just been postponed was rejected. The motion, I suppose, can be entered on the Journal.

The PRESIDENT. That will not be necessary. The resolution has been postponed; and the motion can be made when it comes up again.

Mr. NORRIS. I suppose the motion must be made either to-day or to-morrow.

The PRESIDENT. The Chair will state that no object can be effected by making the motion now, unless the Senate take up the resolution again by reconsidering the motion postponing it. When it comes up again, this day week, the motion can be made to insert either the 30th, or any other day in place of the 16th.

Mr. NORRIS. But I suppose the motion to reconsider must be made to-day.

The PRESIDENT. The Senator does not exactly understand the Chair. The reconsidering of the vote which rejected the striking out of the 16th and inserting the 30th would have no effect on the resolution whatever. The resolution has been postponed until Thursday next.

Mr. NORRIS. The Chair does not seem to understand me. I have given notice, that when the resolution comes up, I will move a reconsideration of the vote rejecting the amendment of the Senator from Virginia.

The PRESIDENT. That will not be necessary. When the resolution comes up again, the Senator can move to strike out "16th," and insert any other day.

Mr. HUNTER. Will it be in order to move it when the resolution comes up again, the Senate having decided against it?

The PRESIDENT. The Senate having decided against it to-day will not prevent their deciding it again. The motion to reconsider, however, can be entered upon the journal.

AMENDMENT OF THE RULES.

On motion by Mr. NORRIS, the Senate proceeded to consider the following resolution, submitted by him for consideration yesterday:

Resolved, That (the House of Representatives concurring) the sixteenth joint rule of the two Houses be amended by adding the following thereto: "And all general appropriation bills shall be sent at least ten days previous to the day fixed for the adjournment of Congress."

Mr. SHIELDS. I would suggest to the Senator to amend the resolution by inserting after the word "sent," the words "to the Senate." It is too general as it stands.

Mr. NORRIS. That was the original form in which the resolution was drawn up; but I do not think there can be anything unconstitutional in the Senate originating appropriation bills.

Mr. GWIN. I hope the Senator from New Hampshire will not alter his resolution. I hope it will remain as it is. I have no doubt of the power of the Senate to originate appropriation bills. An appropriation bill is not one for the raising of revenue. We have certainly the power of originating appropriation bills, which are different from bills for raising revenue. I therefore hope the resolution will remain as it is.

The resolution was adopted; and, as amended, the sixteenth joint rule will read thus, if the House of Representatives shall concur:

"No bill that shall have passed one House, shall be sent for concurrence to the other on either of the last three days of the session; and all general appropriation bills shall be sent at least ten days previous to the day fixed for the adjournment of Congress."

DEFICIENCY BILL.

Mr. HUNTER, from the Committee on Finance, to which was referred the bill from the House of Representatives, to supply deficiencies in the appropriations for the service of the fiscal year ending June 30, 1852, with the amendments thereto, submitted the following report:

They recommend that the Senate should agree to the amendment of the House, to strike out all after the word "cents," in line 7, of the twelfth amendment of the Senate, except the following provisions:

For presents and provisions for Indians visiting superintendent on official business, $1,000.

For traveling expenses of the superintendent and the necessary attendants, $2,500.

That it should disagree to the amendment of the House to the fourteenth amendment of the Senate.

That it should agree to the amendments of the House to the twenty-fifth amendment of the Senate, with the following amendments:

Strike out "$43,700," and insert "$16,000," in line 6, of the House amendment, following line 71 of the Senate amendment, and add after line 18, in the said House amendment, as follows:

"For per diem compensation and mileage of Senators, members of the House of Representatives, and Delegates, $50,000."

That it should insist on the eighteenth amendment, and concur in all the other amendments of the House to the Senate amendments.

The twelfth amendment to which the report refers, was as follows:

"1. Page 7, after line 142, insert:

"2. For expenses of establishing the superintendency of Indian Affairs in California, authorized by the act of 3d of March, 1852, viz:

"1. For salary of superintendent, $1,318 08.

"2. For salary of clerk, $824 17.

"3. For rent of office for superintendent, $1,000.

"4. For stationery, fuel, lights, &c., for office of superintendent, $275.

"5. For messenger expenses, &c., $400.

"6. For labor, miscellaneous items, and contingent expenses of the superintendency, $275.

"7. For presents and provisions for Indians visiting superintendent on official business, $1,000.

"8. For traveling expenses of the superintendent and the necessary attendants, $2,500.

"9. For furniture for superintendent's office, $300.

"10. For iron safe for superintendent's office, $1,000.

"11. For United States flags, for distribution among the tribes, $500."

The House struck out every item but the first, and the Finance Committee of the Senate recommended a concurrence in the House amendment, except as to the seventh and eighth items.

The fourteenth amendment of the Senate was to strike out these words:

"For compensation to three special agents and four interpreters for the Indian tribes of Texas, and for the purchase of presents, and to negotiate with said Indians, under instructions from the Commissioner of Indian Affairs, for their removal from that State to some designated unoccupied territory of the United States, $25,000."

"And insert in lieu thereof the following, viz:

"For the purchase of presents, and to negotiate under instructions from the Secretary of the Interior, with the Indians in Texas, who have intruded themselves into that State from the territories of the United States, for their removal from that State, $25,000."

The House struck out the words which we have placed in italics, so that as amended the amendment reads thus:

"For the purchase of presents, and to negotiate, under instructions from the Secretary of the Interior, with the Indians in Texas, for their removal from that State, $25,000."

The Senate Committee on Finance recommended a disagreement with this amendment.

The twenty-fifth amendment of the Senate added the following item:

"For the completion of the custom-house at Mobile, $100,000."

This the House of Representatives amended by adding the following:

"For the completion of the custom-house at Louisville, Kentucky, the additional sum of $43,700.

"For the completion of the custom-house at Cincinnati, $50,000.

"For the completion of a custom-house and other public offices connected therewith, at Pittsburgh, $35,000.

"For the completion of the fire proof building in the city of St. Louis, Missouri, for a custom-house and independent treasury building, and other offices of the United States, $37,000.

"For the completion of a custom-house at Norfolk, Virginia, $50,000."

The Senate Committee on Finance propose to reduce the appropriation for the Louisville custom-house from $43,700 to $16,000; and to add to the House amendment—

"For per diem, compensation, and mileage of Senators, members of the House of Representatives, and Delegates, $50,000."

The committee recommend that the Senate insist on its eighteenth amendment, to which the House disagreed. It is to insert at the end of the clause in page 13, appropriating $1,500 for the payment of Messrs. Babcock, Wilkinson, and Holcombe, for revising the laws of the Legislative Assembly of Minnesota, the following:

"Provided, That hereafter no expenses incurred by a Territorial Legislature shall be paid out of the Treasury of the United States, unless previously sanctioned by law."

In all the other amendments the Senate committee recommend a concurrence.

Mr. HUNTER. I ask that the bill may be taken up at this time, for the purpose of considering that report.

The PRESIDENT. It requires unanimous consent.

No objection was made.

Mr. HUNTER. If the Senate choose, the question can be taken on the report in gross or separately on the amendments. I understand the Senator from Texas wishes to make a separate question on the amendment in relation to the Texas Indians. The Committee on Finance have concurred in all the amendments made by the House to the bill, with three or four exceptions. The first was this: The House struck out all that portion of the amendment which related to the superintendency of Indian affairs in California, with the exception of the salary of the superintendent. The Committee on Finance recommend to concur in that, with the exception of two items—one being for presents to the Indians, and the other for the traveling expenses of the superintendent, who is to be sent there for the purpose of seeing the Indians. The next amendment, in relation to which there was a difference of opinion, was that for the custom-house at Louisville. The House added to the amendment of the Senate certain estimates made by the Department since it was offered. The Department recommended that in those cases in which it was provided last year, in the appropriation bills, that $75,000 should be devoted to the purchase of the site and completion of the building, Congress should appropriate $75,000 for the building, independent of the site. The House adhered to that recommendation, with one exception. They allowed to Louisville $47,000, instead of the price of the site, which was $16,000. The Committee on Finance have recommended that that amendment be so amended as to conform it to the usage in relation to the other custom-houses, and to the estimate of the Department. That is the second case in which we differ.

The third is the amendment introduced here in relation to the appropriation for the removal of Indians who may have intruded into the territory of Texas. The House struck out the words "who may have intruded themselves into that State from the territories of the United States," so as to make it read, "for their removal from that State." The committee do not agree to that, but recommend that we should insist on our original amendment, making the appropriation for the removal of Indians who may have intruded into Texas.

The fourth, in which we disagree from the House, is in the amendment in relation to territorial expenses. We provided, in that amendment, that appropriations should not be made hereafter for the expenses of any Territory which were entered into without the sanction of law. That was rejected by the House because a law was passed in 1842 to that effect. But it is thought proper to insist on it, inasmuch as the law has been departed from, to give notice that it will be hereafter adhered to.

There is also an additional amendment which it is necessary to put in. There was a deficiency in the fund for the pay and mileage of Senators. The Secretary of the Senate sent down an estimate to the Committee on Ways and Means which was rejected in the House. The Committee on Finance have added that because it will be necessary. The original estimate reached only to the 17th of August. The Speaker of the House has drawn enough to serve that body until that period, and there is a deficiency in what is left for the Senate. It is a deficiency created in great part, it is true, by the extra session of the Senate, but still it is necessary to provide for it. The Committee on Finance have therefore recommended an amendment by which it is provided for. I believe these are the only cases in which we have differed from the House. We have recommended the concurrence in all the other of their amendments.

The PRESIDENT. If such is the pleasure of the Senate, the question will be on concurring in the report of the Committee on Finance.

Mr. RUSK. I hope that the question in relation to the Texas Indians may be excepted. I concur willingly in the whole report, with that exception. I move that that portion of the report be excepted.

The PRESIDENT. Then the question will be on agreeing with the whole of the report, excepting that portion which relates to this particular amendment.

The question was accordingly taken in concurring in the report, excepting the amendment above referred to, and it was concurred in.

The PRESIDENT. The question will now be on concurring in that amendment.

Mr. RUSK. I trust that the Secretary will read the amendment made by the Senate, and also that made by the House of Representatives.

The amendments were read as follow:

The Senate's amendment was:

"For the purchase of presents, and to negotiate, under instructions from the Secretary of the Interior, with the Indians in Texas, who have intruded themselves into that State from the territories of the United States, for their removal from that State, $25,000."

And the amendment of the House of Representatives was to strike out the following words:

"Who have intruded themselves into that State from the territories of the United States."

Mr. RUSK. I hope the House amendment will be agreed to. The appropriation amounts to the small sum of $25,000, for the purpose of removing the intruding Indians from Texas. The Senator from Virginia [Mr. HUNTER] seems to imagine that in the language of the House of Representatives there is conveyed an instruction to the President to remove all the Indians. There is no such instruction. The restriction I should have resisted at the moment it was made, as an unnecessary precaution, because it not only implies a suspicion that Texas requires something improper in this negotiation, but that you cannot, on this, as on all other occasions, trust to the Executive Government the necessary powers for carrying it on. The idea, to my mind, is utterly preposterous. Whatever negotiations are made with regard to the removal of these Indians, would be the subject-matter of treaty, and must, therefore, necessarily come before the Senate. Nobody requires that such a proposition as the Senator from Virginia has alluded to should be inserted in this bill, and therefore the restriction recommended by the Committee on Finance is unnecessary, and would only impede the negotiation that would take place with the Indians, because the first step would be to hunt them up, to find them, to ascertain by legal proof, such as would satisfy the Senator from Virginia, who were the Indians that went over from the territory of the United States and settled in Texas. I should be glad to have him there as witness, and associate counsel, for the purpose of proving their identity. He would find it rather a difficult matter.

The appropriation, as made by the House of Representatives, places the matter in the discretion of the Executive of the United States, where such discretion properly rests, and where it has been placed heretofore. I think it would be preposterous for Congress to attempt to give particular instructions with regard to these Indians. I cannot see any of the difficulties apprehended by the Senator from Virginia, at all; for no liability rests on the President to remove all the Indians from Texas, according to the wording of the amendment by the House.

Mr. HUNTER. The amendment of the Senate reads as follows:

"For the purchase of presents, and to negotiate, under instructions from the Secretary of the Interior, with the Indians in Texas who have intruded themselves into that State from the territories of the United States, for their removal from that State, $25,000."

Now, the Senator from Texas says it is only designed to have it apply to Indians who intruded themselves into the territory. If that is the only design, why not express that idea in terms? because I think he will see, if he examines the amendment which the House have sent here, that there is danger of its receiving a very different construction. He asks who is to ascertain what Indians have intruded into the territory of Texas? It was the Senator himself who said that the Indians had intruded, and he is lawyer enough to know that the burden of proving who they are rests on him. We have an agent there, and we will appropriate the money to remove those who are proved to have intruded. But take it the other way, and suppose we expunge these words from the amendment, and how does it stand? Here is a very small sum appropriated, but it is nevertheless the entering wedge, which implies that the United States is under some sort of obligation to remove the Texan Indians from Texas. Where shall we remove them? Where is the territory which we have for the purpose of removing them? They belong to Texas, and the United States have not assumed the obligations to remove them and provide a place for them elsewhere. If the Senator from Texas thinks the United States are under any obligation to remove them, the question should come up in another shape; for it is a large question, and requires much consideration.

The Senator has complained that our Indians have intruded upon Texas and committed depredations there. I am willing to make appropriations for the purpose of securing the people of Texas, so far as the Government can do it, from such intrusions; beyond that I am not willing to go. I do not think we are bound to do it, nor can we have the means to do it, unless we make some further provision for that purpose. Whenever we do that, it will take a much larger sum of money than $25,000.

But the Senator says that this removal is to be a matter of discretion with the President of the United States. The President of the United States, however, will be compelled to exercise his discretion within the provisions of the law; and if by law we acknowledge the obligation, and assume the business of removing the Indians from Texas, what discretion will the President have? When we have a law on that subject he will be bound to execute it. I am unwilling, at present, to assume that we are under any such obligations. When the question comes up fairly I am ready to consider it. I wish to reserve my opinion until that time, as I do not wish to prejudge it. I therefore desire to have the words put in which were put in by the Senate, for the purpose of excluding the idea that we are under obligation to remove them.

Mr. RUSK. I do not think that a solitary appropriation has ever passed this body, extending the hand of this Government to afford protection against Indian depredations in Texas, without undergoing the strictest and most searching investigation—depredations not committed by the Indians belonging to Texas, but by Indians who, by the policy of this Government, and in the teeth of their solemn treaties, have been forced upon them. I assert the fact, that this Government has violated the obligations of its treaty, and has forced upon Texas, from the frontier of the territory lately purchased from that State, a tribe of Indians the most dangerous, and from which the people of Texas suffer more than from all other tribes together. The Government not only did this, but it furnished to them $10,000 a year, furnished in arms and ammunition, which they used upon our defenseless women and children; and now, when the pitiful sum of $25,000 is asked to be placed at the discretion of the Executive officers of this Government, for the purpose of removing these Indians from Texas, metaphysical arguments are brought forward to show that it would be incurring an obligation on the part of the United States to remove all the Indians from Texas. We ask for an appropriation of $25,000 for the accomplishment of this desirable end—the removal of those Indians which have been forced upon us by the policy of the United States Government.

And, sir, the honorable Senator from Virginia chooses to say that the Indians belong to Texas! Sir, they belong as much to the United States as to Texas, even the Indians in regard to whom he entertains so much alarm lest the Government should be compelled to remove the whole of them—I mean the Camanches. More of their home, if they have any home at all, is in the territory acquired by the United States from Texas. Their principal range is in the territory; and the Senator from Virginia, it seems to me by his course of reasoning, is not only desirous of driving these Camanches, and Caddoes, and Cherokees, and Shawnee Indians into our territory, but he is unwilling to assume the responsibility of keeping out these Camanches. It seems to me that his objection to the amendment of the House of Representatives involves a suspicion which the words of that amendment will not bear, and for which they do not appear to me to furnish the slightest foundation.

Mr. HUNTER. The Senator from Texas has introduced two or three issues, which, it seems to me, do not arise out of this amendment. The first is the treatment of the State of Texas by the United States Government. I was not aware before, sir, that the Government of the United States had dealt hardly or unkindly with that State; but if that question should ever come up, and if the Senator is determined to maintain that opinion, I hope he will do it on some other occasion—that it may be discussed in connection with some other bill; for I have no doubt that if he enters into that inquiry, he will find that he has not quite so much cause of complaint as he thinks he has. He says I am unwilling to relieve the State of Texas from the pressure of the Indians, whom we have forced upon them. Why does he say so? I say I am willing to adopt an amendment providing for the withdrawal from Texas of all the Indians over whom the United States has control, and for whom they are responsible. I did not say that the United States might not at some future day to provide a place of refuge for the Indians in Texas. All I said was that I was not willing to prejudge that question, and to give such a shape to the amendment as would cause us to assume that obligation; for I am not convinced that it is an obligation resting upon the United States, to provide for the removal of these Indians. He has said, what I admit to be true enough, and what would be provided for in the amendment if it retained its original shape—namely, that we are bound to save them from the intrusion of those Indians which belong to the territories of the United States. But, sir, I apprehend that we would find it an embarrassing question, if we were to attach to the United States the sole responsibility of managing all the Indians in Texas. They may, indeed, undertake it at some period or other; but, as I before remarked, that is a question upon which I do not now wish to pass judgment—one on which it is not now necessary to pass judgment. The principal evil of which he complains is the intrusion of the United States Indians upon Texas. For that evil I am willing to provide a remedy. This amendment, as it was passed by the Senate, provides that remedy, but I am unwilling to go further.

Sir, the Senator from Texas objected that metaphysical arguments have been used against the claims of Texas. If the claim of Texas is restricted to what is asserted in the amendment, I have used no argument against it. I have admitted a willingness to provide for it. Neither have I argued that other question; but I apprehend, whenever it does come up, let the Senator take which side he may, he will use metaphysical arguments, if he argues the question at all.

Mr. RUSK. The Senator from Virginia charges me with having raised this question, when he has raised it himself, by saying that the amendment of the House assumes the right of the Government of the United States to remove all the Indians from Texas. The Senator himself raises the question, and then objects to my answering him. Now, I say that, if this amendment pass, as proposed by the House, no such obligation as the Senator speaks of is incurred, not in the slightest degree. The amendment now appropriates a certain sum for the removal of the Indians—nothing more.

I will state my position again: Texas ceded to the United States a large quantity of territory, over which these Camanches roam twice as much as over the State of Texas. Suppose that, in the expenditure of this money, the President of the United States should see fit to say to these Camanches—and such a policy has been recommended by the officers who have had counsel with them—suppose that the Government should say, "We will locate you here, and will furnish you with the implements of husbandry, and will furnish you with provisions;" suppose that were done by the Government, in the territory belonging to the Camanches, still that territory belongs to the United States, and the Senator would, in fact, preclude the attempt from being made to induce the Camanches to quit their robbing and murdering habits. However, I do not expect that to take place, nor to see such a treaty made. The Senator, in his place here, will not allow anything bearing such a construction to pass; and, in his desire to avoid any responsibility on the subject, frames the appropriation in such a way as to preclude any idea of obligation resting on the United States to provide for the security of the frontier. Now, I ask him—and he is a better lawyer than I am—to show how this amendment imposes the slightest obligation on the part of the United States. Words are generally used in incurring an obligation, and I ask him to read, and plainly construe, this amendment, and show me where there are three words which imply the slightest obligation on the part of the United States to remove all the Indians.

There is an obligation on the part of the United States which the Government has not been very ready to discharge; that is, the defense of the frontier; but I do not mean to enter into a discussion on that point now. The Senator says that I shall have some little difficulty in showing that these Indians entered Texas from the territory of the United States! Sir, I should find none. I court that issue at any time. I stood by, myself, and was a witness of the intrusion. I stood by, and saw the arms and ammunition, taken from these Indians. If that was not dealing hardly with Texas, I do not understand the English language. If furnishing these savages with arms and ammunition for the slaughter of women and children is not dealing hardly, I do not know what could be so termed.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on concurring in the amendment made by the House of Representatives to the amendment of the Senate.

Mr. HUNTER. The Committee on Finance recommend that the Senate do disagree to that amendment.

The amendment was not agreed to.
The PRESIDING OFFICER. That disposes of all the amendments made to the bill.

PROTECTION OF THE TERRITORIES.

Mr. SHIELDS. If there is no other business now before the Senate, I move to postpone all prior orders, for the purpose of taking up House bill No. 259. It is "An act to provide for the protection of the Territories of New Mexico and Oregon, and the States of Texas and California," which has been reported back from the Committee on Military Affairs, with an amendment.

The motion was agreed to, and the Senate proceeded to the consideration of the bill as in Committee of the Whole.

The bill, as it came from the House, provides that the President be authorized to cause arms to be distributed among such portions of the inhabitants of New Mexico and Oregon, and the States of Texas and California, as he may deem advisable, and under such regulations and precautions as may be considered necessary to insure the preservation of said arms, and the application thereof to the defense of the said Territories; and that so much of the two hundred thousand dollars annually appropriated by the act of 23d of April, 1808, for arming the whole body of the militia of the United States, as may be necessary, shall be used for that purpose, anything in said act to the contrary notwithstanding; and that the President be authorized, whenever he may deem it necessary for the protection of said Territories, or either of them, to call out all, or any portion of the militia thereof, or to accept the services of one or more volunteer companies which may be raised therein; and that the volunteers and militia so called into service shall be entitled to the same ordinary monthly pay and allowances as were provided by law for volunteers while in the service of the United States under the act entitled "An act providing for the prosecution of the existing war between the United States and the Republic of Mexico," approved May 13th, 1846.

The committee proposed to amend the bill by adding thereto the following sections:

Sec. 3. And be it further enacted, That the President of the United States is hereby authorized to accept the services of as many companies of mounted Texan rangers as he in his judgment may deem necessary for the protection of the Texan frontier: Provided, That the whole force thus raised and employed in Texas, shall in no case exceed the number of five hundred men.

Sec. 4. And be it further enacted, That each of the said companies of rangers shall consist of one captain, one first, one second, and one third lieutenant, five sergeants, five corporals, and one hundred privates, who shall engage to serve the Government for one year, at least, from the date of their muster into the service of the United States, unless otherwise ordered and directed by the President.

Sec. 5. And be it further enacted, That the said mounted rangers shall provide their own horses, clothing, and equipments, with the exception of arms and ammunition, which arms and ammunition are to be supplied by the Government; but if any member of any of said companies shall fail, during his term of service, to provide himself as above mentioned, the United States may furnish him with the same, and retain the amount out of his pay.

Sec. 6. And be it further enacted, That the commissioned officers shall receive the same pay and emoluments as officers of the same grade in the Army of the United States, and the officers shall be allowed forage for their horses, and be entitled to the same rations as those of the same grade respectively in the Army of the United States; and the sergeants shall be allowed $28 per month, the corporals $25 per month, and the privates $22 50 per month respectively, and shall be entitled to the same rations and the same forage for their horses, which are now allowed to dragoons in the regular service of the United States.

Sec. 7. And be it further enacted, That the officers, non-commissioned officers, and privates, raised pursuant to this act, shall be entitled to the like compensation in case of disability by wounds or otherwise, incurred in the service, as has heretofore been allowed to officers, non-commissioned officers, and privates, in the military establishment of the United States, but shall in no case be entitled to compensation for the loss of horses or private property, and shall be subject to the rules and articles of war, and such regulations as have been or shall be established according to law for the government of the Army of the United States.

Sec. 8. And be it further enacted, That when the President shall deem it necessary to employ any portion of said force for the protection of the Texan frontier, he shall cause the Governor of Texas to be notified of his intention, designating the number of companies that will be required, and the place or places of muster: and such company or companies as the Governor may select for said service, not exceeding the number designated by the President, and who shall present themselves regularly organized and equipped, in accordance with the requirements of this act, shall be mustered into the service of the United States, and shall continue in such service, subject to the rules and regulations aforesaid, for the term of one year, unless otherwise ordered and directed by the President.

Sec. 9. And be it further enacted, That the President is also authorized to call upon the Governor of California for any number of companies which he may deem necessary for the protection of the frontier of said State, not exceeding five in all, to be in all respects mounted, organized, and equipped, to consist of the same number of officers, non-commissioned officers, and privates, to receive the same pay and emoluments, to serve under the same limitations for the same term, and to be subject in all respects to the same rules and regulations as already provided by this act in the case of the Texan rangers.

The PRESIDING OFFICER, (Mr. NORRIS in the chair.) The question will then be on agreeing to the amendment proposed by the committee.

Mr. SHIELDS. I am informed that the reading of the report of the Committee on Military Affairs will greatly facilitate the passage of this bill. I wish the report may be read.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Let the report be read.

It was read accordingly; from which it appears that the state of affairs on the Rio Grande frontier is of the most deplorable character. Pillage, robbery, and murder are of such frequent occurrence as to render life and property altogether insecure; and unless immediate steps be taken to arrest the evil, there is reason to apprehend that it will end in an atrocious and vindictive border warfare in that region of our country.

The committee, without deeming it material to inquire into the causes which have produced these outrages, or to specify particulars, declare that it is a matter of public notoriety, that the present condition of the Texan frontier is such as to require the immediate attention of the Government. The mixed character of the population on the Rio Grande frontier, differing in habits, manners, and language, naturally leads to dissensions, and as the American settlements on the Rio Grande are sparse and defenseless, adequate protection cannot be furnished by the civil authorities, aided by a small and insufficient force along such a vast extent of country. Protection can only be afforded by a strong force of mounted riflemen, such as was used in a similar case by the Republic of Texas.

An equal necessity seems to exist for the employment of a similar force in California. A large portion of the population of this State, from the nature and variety of their pursuits, are scattered over the frontier and exposed to Indian hostilities. It is not to be expected that a small regular military force could furnish adequate protection throughout the whole extent of the California frontier; and besides, experience shows that the temptation to desertion is so great, that the regular military force cannot be relied on for adequate frontier protection in that State. Mounted rangers seem to be best calculated for such irregular and anomalous border service, until such time as a change in the condition of things in these States may render a small regular force sufficient for their protection.

The measure here recommended will enable the President to call out this force as circumstances may render it necessary; and if, upon full trial, it be found efficient, he will be able to withdraw, at his discretion, a large portion of the regular force from California and Texas, and concentrate the same in New Mexico and Utah, and on the great lines of travel between the Mississippi valley and Pacific coast.

This disposition of the military force of the country will afford additional, and it is to be hoped adequate, protection to the inhabitants of these Territories, and to emigrants crossing the continent; and will, besides, contribute to diminish the enormous expense of maintaining a multitude of small military posts—policed rather than garrisoned by military detachments, wholly insufficient to overawe the Indians or to protect the inhabitants.

With a view, therefore, to preserve peace with a neighboring Republic, to prevent a lawless border warfare, and to afford such protection to our frontier settlers as their present defenseless situation so urgently requires, the committee reported back the bill, with an amendment designed to accomplish these desirable objects.

The amendment was agreed to, and the bill was reported to the Senate.

Mr. GWIN. The compensation which is allowed to the men I think is entirely too small. It is only $22 50 per month; and it is well known that, so far as my State is concerned, we cannot secure the services of mounted rangers with their own horses at that rate of compensation. We give to common soldiers there $15 a month. These men are to be out in the bush; they are to find their own horses and equipments, and it will be impossible to execute this law, unless you increase the compensation. I therefore move that the compensation be at least fifty per cent. above that proposed in the bill.

Mr. SHIELDS. I hope the Senator from California will not persist in urging this amendment.

Mr. GWIN. I have prepared an amendment, which I now offer. It is to insert in the eighth line of the ninth section, after the word "emoluments," the words "with an addition of fifty per cent. for two years and." The section, as thus amended, will then read:

Sec. 9. And be it further enacted, That the President is also authorized to call upon the Governor of California for any number of companies which he may deem necessary for the protection of the frontier of said State, not exceeding five in all, to be in all respects mounted, organized, and equipped, to consist of the same number of officers, non-commissioned officers, and privates, to receive the same pay and emoluments, with an addition of fifty per cent. for two years, and to serve under the same limitations for the same term, and to be subject in all respects to the same rules and regulations, as already provided by this act in the case of the Texan rangers.

Mr. SHIELDS. By the terms of the bill these men are to be employed but one year. If the force be found sufficient, and if it answer the purpose, the President can continue it pe-hap for two years. Consequently the amendment is objectionable on that ground. But there is another consideration. The same principle applies to all the troops serving in California. I presume the allowance made to the troops in California is wholly inadequate; but there has been no legislation giving additional pay to any of the regular troops. The legislation that took place on that subject has expired, and I think it would be unfair to give this additional pay to this force and not to the regular troops also serving in the same country and under the same circumstances. And I may as well state here as at any time, that we considered this force, which is to consist of about five hundred men, to be the cheapest, as well as the best kind of force that can be employed on that frontier; and that although the monthly pay is much greater than that of the regular troops—the latter receiving only eight dollars per month, and these twenty-two and a half dollars per month—yet as they will furnish their own horses and clothing, and as they will present themselves organized and ready for reception into service, we find them much cheaper than any regular forces raised in any portion of the country and transported to the frontier. I could go into the items and give every item of expense, but I presume it is unnecessary. The chief expense arises in the first place in the recruiting; next, in the contracts in relation to horses and equipage, in contracts for clothing, in transportation from the East to the West, and in the casualties accompanying that transportation; for the loss by casualties attending the transportation of horses, in most cases, amounts to twenty-five per cent. I find this is the most effective and at the same time the cheapest force that can be employed on the frontier.

Now I suppose that no man who has watched the state of things on the Rio Grande, does not see the necessity of some additional protection, not only to our own people, but that species of protection which, by our treaty stipulations, we are bound to give to the Mexican people on the soil which we have acquired. If this force does not accomplish it, I cannot, for my life, devise any scheme by which it can be done; for I take it for granted that the character of the men who present themselves, thus armed and equipped at their own expense, will be far superior to that of men recruited about the recruiting stations. I am also satisfied that the men who reside in, and are acquainted with the country, with the Indians, and the Mexicans, if they are the right sort of men, will be much more efficient, and a more valuable force for the protection of the frontier, than any men sent from the East.

I will say nothing as to the necessity for such protection. I presume that the Senate admits that; but I will say that on the Rio Grande, from its mouth to the Paso del Norte, we are on the eve of one of the most nefarious border wars that any country ever engaged in; it will be distinguished by murder and robbery in every degree. It is too frequently the case, and, in saying this, I feel that Senators who are acquainted with that country will bear me witness, that the guilty there escape the punishment of their crimes, and the innocent suffer. For instance, a murder is committed on the American side of the river, and the guilty parties escape to the mountains, perhaps to the woods; the next day the party that sets out in pursuit of the murderers, find it impossible to arrest them, but wreak their vengeance on the innocent. That is the state of things now on the Rio Grande. I wish I could impress on the people there the necessity of keeping sacred faith with the Mexicans; every consideration of duty, of policy, and of magnanimity, should make them do so.

I take it for granted that if five hundred well-selected, intelligent men were raised and embodied in Texas, that we shall hear nothing more of filibustering and Caravajalling. I think that if such a force had existed Caravajal would never have shown his face on the American side of the Rio Grande.

Now, as I remarked, from the calculations I have made, it seems that this force will cost $531,821 a year; a regular force of mounted men, enlisted regularly, at the same pay as regular troops, and sent there, would cost the Government $752,735 the first year, and for the second, and each subsequent year, would cost $437,035. As I have already stated, the expense is incurred here, not on the frontier; in your contracts, in the transportation of men and horses from the East, from Maine and Massachusetts, to California; whereas this bill provides the means for obtaining the men, together with their horses and clothing, on the spot. The men provide their own horses and their own clothing, consequently the only expense to the Government, is for the forage for the horses, and for the pay and rations of the men.

Now, with regard to the amendment offered by the Senator from California, [Mr. GWIN,] my impression is, that there is a necessity for an increase of pay in the whole of that State; but the increase should be equal; it should apply to the regulars, as well as to the volunteers, and the Committee on Military Affairs has that matter under consideration, and intend to bring in a general bill on the subject. I think, therefore, it would not be advisable to introduce the subject into the present bill.

Mr. GWIN. As the chairman of the Committee on Military Affairs has stated that the committee intend to report a general bill giving increased compensation to the army and officers in the State of California, that will answer the purpose of my amendment. The increased compensation which I propose should be in operation for two years. My proposition was to increase it fifty per cent. within that period. I am quite of opinion that the compensation should be increased, and on the assurance which has just been given to the Senate by the chairman of the Committee on Military Affairs I will withdraw my amendment.

Mr. SHIELDS. As the bill came from the House it only provided for the Territories of New Mexico and Oregon. It said nothing in regard to Utah. I presume that that was done on the assumption that the Mormons were able to protect themselves; but on mature consideration it seems to me to be better that we should legislate equally as to all, and that the Territory of Utah should be included with the Territories of New Mexico and Oregon. I will state that by this bill the President of the United States has the power either to call out the troops in these Territories or not, as the necessities of the case may appear to require. If there be no necessity to call them out, of course he will not do so. And if there should unfortunately be such a necessity, then he can call them out in proportion to such necessity.

In relation to the remark of the honorable Senator from California, that if these troops that are thus to be raised in Texas and California should not accomplish the object for which they are designed, I trust the President will disband them at once—and particularly in Texas. If the troops thus raised do not prevent these outrages on the Rio Grande, and if it is found that after they are raised these outrages continue, and that the Americans go to the other side of the Rio Grande and aid Mexicans to violate the laws of Mexico, I should be quite willing, for one, to call upon the President to disband them at once. I trust, however, to the honor and the character of the men; and I trust something to the State of Texas, too, for she has more interest than any other portion of the country in putting down the paltry and insignificant warfare that is going on, and which is as disgraceful to our country as it is injurious to the country on the other side. But while I say that, I must also say for our own side, that there is now on the Mexican side a large body of Mexican troops—if troops they can be called, which receive no pay—for the Government of Mexico is too poor to pay them—and they may be considered as half soldiers and half brigands—these men are necessary to protect our people against that class.

Mr. RUSK. The troops provided for by this bill, which I think is about the best that could have been provided, have been called for by the President of the United States. The Mexicans have on the opposite side several thousand troops at Matamoros. Our own forces during the time of the filibustering affair were not more than about twenty. We have a custom-house in which are deposited large stores of goods, and, I believe, there is not a single soldier at the place. In another part of the country, where the Camanches cross for the purpose of committing depredations, I think there have been two broken companies. At Paso del Norte there was a station, at which there were some hundred soldiers. The commander of that portion of them used to be attached to the ninth military division including New Mexico. The commander removed the soldiers from that station, and they have no soldiers there now at all.

In regard to the apprehension which might be entertained from these troops entering into any collision with Mexico, I think there need be none at all. I am very sure that if there had been two hundred Texan rangers upon that frontier during the time of Caravajal's operations there, none of it would have been heard of. Previous to the time that Caravajal commenced his hostilities, the citizens of Texas, scattered up and down the towns on the Rio Grande, were enjoying a trade of some two or three millions of dollars annually, a profitable trade with Mexico; and that trade, by the operations of Caravajal, a man totally destitute of character, has been entirely broken up. If the citizens of Texas had been in sufficient numbers there, they would have stopped his operations; and I have no doubt that if two hundred soldiers had been there, none of those depredations would have been committed. The presence of two hundred Texan rangers would mend the manners of the Mexicans speedily; for they have some occasion to entertain considerable respect for that class of troops, with whom they have heretofore had some little acquaintance. They would effectually preserve peace on that frontier.

The amendments made to the bill, as in Committee of the Whole, were concurred in by the Senate.

Mr. SHIELDS. The bill in its present form provides only for the distribution of arms among the people of the States of Texas, and California, and the Territories of New Mexico and Oregon. I move to amend it by inserting "Utah" after "New Mexico," so that it will read: "That the President of the United States be, and he is hereby, authorized to cause arms to be distributed among such portions of the inhabitants of New Mexico, Utah, Oregon," &c.

The amendment was agreed to.

The amendments were ordered to be engrossed, and the bill to be read a third time.

MEXICAN BOUNDARY COMMISSION.

Mr. CLARKE. Mr. President, the resolution introduced by the honorable Senator from California, [Mr. WELLER,] for the appointment of a select committee to investigate the charges preferred against the Commissioner upon the Mexican boundary was the made special order for to-day. The honorable Senator from California himself designated to-day; but he is not here, and I should be very unwilling to proceed with the discussion in his absence. There is some evidence now being prepared in regard to the subject which is not yet fully completed; I therefore move that the resolution be taken up in order, that its further consideration may be postponed until Wednesday next.

The motion was agreed to; and the Senate accordingly resumed the consideration of the resolution.

Mr. CLARKE. I move to postpone the further consideration of the resolution until Wednesday next, and make it the special order for that day.

Mr. DOUGLAS. I must object to making this resolution the special order for Wednesday, as such a proposition was strenuously resisted in regard to a bill which I have been urging, and which stands postponed to the day previous to that named by the honorable Senator.

Mr. CLARKE. I do not insist upon that part of the motion with regard to making the resolution the special order; but simply move that its further consideration be postponed till Wednesday next.

The motion was agreed.

EXECUTIVE SESSION.

On motion by Mr. CLARKE, the Senate proceeded to the consideration of Executive business; and after some time spent therein, the doors were reopened, and

The Senate adjourned.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

THURSDAY, July 15, 1852.

The House met at eleven o'clock, a. m. Prayer by the Rev. C. M. BUTLER.

The Journal of yesterday was read and approved.

The SPEAKER. The business first in order is House bill No. 271, "granting the right of way and a portion of the public lands to the States of Florida and Alabama for the construction of certain railroads in said State."

Mr. SIBLEY. I ask the unanimous consent of the House to submit a resolution.

There being no objection, the resolution was then read, as follows:

Resolved, That the Committee on Public Lands be instructed to inquire into the expediency of establishing one or more additional land offices in Minnesota, and providing for the appointment of a surveyor general for said Territory, and that said committee report by bill or otherwise.

The question was then taken, and the resolution was adopted.

Mr. MACE. On yesterday, when the Collins line appropriation was up, and my name was called, I stated that I would not vote because I had paired off with Mr. BENNETT, of New York. I was opposed to the appropriation. The matter was omitted by the Reporters.

The SPEAKER. The question is upon committing the bill to the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union.

Mr. CABELL, of Florida. That motion was made with a view of preventing the bill from going upon the Speaker's table. The bill has been frequently under consideration, and I do not propose now to make a long speech in favor of it. I will merely call the attention of the House to the fact that this bill, which is now under consideration, was the first bill of the kind ever introduced into Congress. As far back as 1836, a bill of this kind was reported to this House, and passed the Senate, and has continued to pass the Senate from year to year.

Other States have availed themselves of the suggestion or plan proposed by the Pensacola Railroad Company to induce the General Government to aid in the construction of railroads passing through the public lands by a grant of the alternate sections of land on either side, and two States have been more fortunate than the State of Florida in inducing the Committee on Public Lands to report their bills in advance of others, which have passed both Houses of Congress and become laws. Signal benefits have thus been conferred on the States of Illinois and Missouri, in the Northwest. We now ask a similar act of justice and liberality for my section of the Union, the extreme Southeast. The bill under consideration provides for a road from the town of Pensacola, in Florida, to Montgomery, in Alabama, about one hundred and fifty miles in length. If gentlemen will refer to the documents upon the subject, they will find that this very road has been recommended from time to time by the War Department as absolutely essential to the protection of the town of Pensacola. There is between that town and the populous parts of Alabama, and other sections of the country, a wilderness of some sixty or seventy miles, which separates that place from the rest of mankind. It has been deemed by the Department, as you will see by referring to the reports of the engineers, that in order to give security to the public works at Pensacola, which have already cost the Government millions of dollars, it is absolutely essential that some means of transportation be afforded for the troops and munitions of war essential to the protection of such important national interests. There is, at present, no means of getting to Pensacola except by sea. It is mentioned in one of these reports that during the difficulties on the Canada frontier some years ago, the British Government transferred their naval station from Halifax to Bermuda, some two hundred and eighty miles from Charleston. They are, as you know, already in possession of the Island of Jamaica, and we can imagine what will be the situation of this country and the condition of the inestimably valuable commerce passing around the capes of Florida, if we have not some strong point upon the Gulf of Mexico which is accessible to our troops and munitions of war.

It has been very properly and wisely said by a committee of a former Congress, to whom this subject was referred, that "without an easy, rapid, and safe railway communication to the interior, 'all their money, and all the national considerations which dictated the purchase of Florida' with a view of obtaining Pensacola for a naval 'depôt, will result in so much benefit conferred on 'any great naval Power with which we may hereafter happen to be at war.'" In this connection I ask the attention of the House to a few extracts from the reports of Colonel Totten, Chief of the Engineer Department:

In his report to the Secretary of War, dated November 2, 1843, he says:

"The fortifications of this harbor, at the present moment, so far as the works themselves are concerned, constitute a formidable and efficient array of strength; and, within two or three years, the entire system of local defense will be complete, excepting only such auxiliary means as may, without danger, be left to be executed when about to be needed."

"But there are other considerations connected with the security of this great harbor, which are independent of mere defenses, whether naval or military; such, I mean, as relate to a safe and easy communication with the sources of supply and relief. These are of more than common interest here, because any enemy that should be able to test the arrangements for defense would, in doing so, completely cut off all the existing channels of communication. This isolated position of Pensacola, in reference to any productive or populous region, is its peculiar disadvantage; which has all along been kept in view by those connected with the defensive preparations, and by them has been repeatedly presented to the notice of the Government."

"There was a time when private enterprise seemed about to connect this mere harbor of refuge into one of the great entrepôts of western commerce, by opening a direct and speedy communication with the interior; but, since the failure or postponement of that hope, the extent to which the General Government may, in such a case, interfere to carry out enterprises having such an object, would seem to have become a very important question."

In his report dated November 30, 1844, Colonel Totten uses the following language:

"Pensacola harbor, Florida.—I beg leave to refer to previous reports from this office for strong expressions of opinion as to the value of this harbor to the nation, and the importance to the large public interest already established therein, of opening direct communication with the interior. The works of defense, in charge of this department, have been improved to the extent admissible with the funds at command, and are now in progress of such improvement. Some further aid will be needed, as stated in the following reports on the particular works."

Colonel Totten, in his report dated November 1, 1845, uses the following emphatic expressions in regard to the necessity of a communication to the interior from Pensacola:

"Now that the defenses of this harbor are in a condition of efficiency, inviting the resort thither for shelter, in time of war, of vessels of every description, and warranting any extension which it may be desirable to give to arrangements for their repair, reëquipping, and refreshment, it appears to be quite important to look to the means of getting access to the productive and populous interior districts. The sterility of the region contiguous to Pensacola is the only defect which its harbor has as a naval station or a point of rendezvous; but this defect may be a very serious one in certain moments, and invites, therefore, the particular attention of the Government. It is presumed, that if no opportunity be afforded for the National Government to act directly in the matter, any private enterprises, tending to remove this difficulty, will be eagerly patronized."

In his report dated 10th November, 1846, he again calls attention to this subject, and says:

"I have so often, in my annual reports, invited the attention of the Government to the importance of this harbor for national purposes, and to the need of opening a communication with the rich country of the North, and shall, therefore, on these subjects, now restrict myself to referring back to these communications."

There are many other reasons which I could give in favor of this road, but I am satisfied if I go into a long discussion of the subject, it will be utterly impossible to get a vote to-day. Enough has been said to show the national importance of this road, and the interest which the Federal Government has in its construction. I will merely add, that another great advantage to the country from the construction of this road is, that it will form a continuous line of railway communication from the extreme eastern section of the Union to the Gulf of Mexico, thereby affording increased facilities to the Government for the transportation of the mails, and a speedy and direct communication between the Atlantic cities and those on the Gulf of Mexico. At present the great line of railroads to the Southwest terminates at Montgomery. This road will complete the connection.

In this same bill there is a provision made for a road across the peninsula of Florida, from some point upon the Atlantic, on or near the St. Mary's river, to some point on the Pacific coast, to be designated by the State of Florida. The importance of this road as a national work must be obvious to all. The question has claimed the consideration of this Government for a series of years, as to whether a ship-canal could be constructed across the peninsula of Florida. That project has been held by many scientific men not to be a feasible one. At all events, its feasibility is so doubtful, that I have no idea that this Government could now be induced to undertake it. The railroad which we now propose will be, in some sort, a substitute for the project of the ship-canal, and so far from interfering with the latter project, will be in aid of it, by diverting travel and commerce, and thus attracting public attention to the importance of this communication across the peninsula to avoid the dangerous navigation around Cape Florida. The proposed road passes through a district of country "so poor that it will not yield black-eye peas," and will never be worth five cents an acre unless this road is constructed. This fact every man knows who has ever been in that section of the country; for it is a sandy, pine, barren country throughout nearly its entire length. We propose, by this bill, to give the State the alternate sections of land on either side of this road, which, though utterly worthless in themselves, will acquire great value from the facilities the road will afford for the transportation to market of lumber, pitch, tar, and turpentine, the only products of the land, and which it is now utterly impossible to make available. The increased value given to similar lands, similarly situated in the State of North Carolina, by the construction of the Wilmington road, enables us to form some estimate of the advantage to the Government, as a great land proprietor, in a pecuniary point of view, by the passage of this bill and the completion of this road. The alternate sections reserved to the Government at present are worth nothing. Their value will probably be enhanced to the increased estimate, $2 50 per acre, put upon them by this bill. Whatever may be true of alternate sections of land through which the other railroads in the Northwest may pass, it is certainly true in this case, that the lands in these alternate sections are utterly worthless without the construction of this road. I do not know that it is necessary for me to say more upon this subject now, except that the Legislature of the State of Florida has authorized a subscription, on the part of the State, of $1,000,000 towards the construction of this road. I withdraw the motion to recommit, and move to put the bill upon its passage, and upon that motion I demand the previous question.

The SPEAKER. The Chair understands that the gentleman did not submit the motion to recommit.

Mr. CABELL, of Florida. I think I made the motion.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman made the motion to recommit to the Committee on Public Lands. The gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. JONES] moved to recommit it to the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union. That is the question.

Mr. CABELL. Those motions were separately reconsidered, if the Speaker will recollect, until we came back to this distinct vote. I had the floor upon the last motion, which was to recommit the bill. All those other motions had been reconsidered. That is my recollection. Was there such a motion as to recommit the bill to the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union?

The SPEAKER. The motion to recommit it to the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union is now pending.

Mr. CABELL. Will the Speaker be so kind as to tell me who made that motion?

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. JONES] made the motion, and he followed it up by a motion to lie upon the table, which was voted down, and the question recurred upon the motion to commit, which is now the question before the House.

Mr. CABELL. What will be the effect of the previous question? Will it cut off the motion to put the bill upon its passage?

The SPEAKER. It will bring the House to a vote first upon the motion to commit.

Mr. CABELL. And what will be the next motion?

The SPEAKER. Upon the passage of the bill.

Mr. CABELL. I shall move the previous question.

Mr. SEYMOUR. I wish to inquire if this road is embraced among the roads provided for in the land bill which has passed this House?

Mr. CABELL. There is a clause in that bill to this effect: that the lands granted to railroad companies shall be deducted from the land appropriated to the individual States. There are two millions of acres appropriated in that bill to the State of Florida. We desire now merely to give direction to that grant, and have it deducted from the two millions. I call the previous question.

Mr. HOUSTON. I wish to ask the gentleman from Florida whether that bill does not itself direct the application of land for that road?

Mr. CABELL. No, sir.

Mr. MILLSON. The House is thin, and with a view of giving time to absent members to have an opportunity of voting, I move that there be a call of the House.

Mr. LOCKHART demanded the yeas and nays; which were ordered.

The question was then taken upon Mr. MILLSON's motion, and there were—yeas 35, nays 108. So the House refused to order a call.

The SPEAKER. The question is upon recommitting the Florida land bill to the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union. If that motion should fail, it will bring the House to vote first upon the amendment, and then upon the engrossment of the bill.

The previous question was seconded, and the main question ordered.

The SPEAKER. The question recurs upon committing the bill to the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union, and having it printed.

Mr. HARRIS, of Tennessee. I move to lay the bill upon the table, and upon that proposition I demand the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

The question was then taken, and there were—yeas 75, nays 84; as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Aiken, Allison, Averett, Bibb, Bingham, Bock, Buell, Busby, Joseph Cable, Lewis D. Campbell, Carter, Caskie, Chapman, Chastain, Curtis, George T. Davis, Dean, Dimmick, Edgerton, Edmundson, Fowler, Thomas J. D. Fuller, Gamble, Gaylord, Giddings, Green, Grow, Hamilton, Hammond, Isham G. Harris, Hart, Hibbard, Holladay, Hunter, Ingersoll, Andrew Johnson, Daniel T. Jones, George W. Jones, J. Glancy Jones, Preston King, Kuhns, Kurtz, Letcher, Mann, Martin, Mason, McLanahan, McMullin, McQueen, Meade, Millson, Morrison, Murphy, Murray, Newton, Andrew Parker, Peaslee, Perkins, Powell, Reed, Robbins, Robie, Russell, Savage, David L. Seymour, Origen S. Seymour, Skelton, Smart, Richard H. Stanton, Sweetser, Thurston, Townshend, Tuck, Wildrick, and Woodward—75.

NAYS—Messrs. W. Allen, Bell, Bissell, J. H. Boyd, Briggs, Brenton, Briggs, Brooks, A. G. Brown, E. Carrington Cabell, Caldwell, Thompson Campbell, Chandler, Churchwell, Clingman, Cobb, Conger, John G. Stephens, St. Martin, Strother, Stuart, Taylor, Venable, Walsh, Ward, Watkins, Welch, Wilcox, Williams, and Yates—81.

The SPEAKER. The question is upon referring the bill to the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union.

SEVENTH CENSUS.

Mr. McLANAHAN. I move a reconsideration of the vote taken yesterday, by which the bill and reports of the Judiciary Committee on the subject of the apportionment of the Seventh Census of the United States, were referred to the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union. My object is to have them printed, and in a few days after they shall have been printed to call them up for consideration.

Mr. STUART. I rise to a question of order—that this motion cannot be made within the morning hour.

The SPEAKER. The Chair thinks that it is in order for the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. McLANAHAN] to have his motion entered at any time, but it would not be in order to consider his motion at this time. That is the distinction which the Chair makes. The motion will be entered upon the Journal.

FLORIDA LAND BILL.

The question then recurred upon referring the Florida land bill to the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union.

Mr. HAMILTON demanded the yeas and nays; which were ordered.

The question was then taken, and there were—yeas 77, nays 77; as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Aiken, Allison, Ashe, Averett, Beale, Bibb, Bingham, Bock, J. H. Boyd, Buell, Burt, Caskie, Chapman, Chastain, Curtis, Dean, Dimmick, Edgerton, Edmundson, Floyd, Fowler, Gamble, Giddings, Grow, Hamilton, I. G. Harris, Hascall, Hibbard, Holladay, Houston, Thomas M. Howe, Thomas Y. How, Hunter, Ingersoll, Ives, Jackson, Andrew Johnson, Daniel T. Jones, George W. Jones, J. Glancy Jones, Preston King, Kuhns, Kurtz, Letcher, Mann, Martin, Mason, McLanahan, McMullin, McNair, McQueen, Meade, Millson, Morehead, Morrison, Murphy, Murray, Newton, Andrew Parker, Peaslee, Perkins, Powell, Reed, Robbins, Robie, Russell, Savage, David L. Seymour, Origen S. Seymour, Skelton, Smart, Townshend, Tuck, Venable, Washburn, Welch, Wildrick, and Woodward—77.

NAYS—Messrs. Willis Allen, Bell, Bissell, Bragg, Brenton, Briggs, Brooks, Albert G. Brown, E. Carrington Cabell, Joseph Cable, Caldwell, Lewis D. Campbell, Thompson Campbell, Carter, Chandler, Clingman, Cobb, Conger, George T. Davis, John G. Davis, Disney, Dockery, Doty, Dunham, Evans, Fitch, Freeman, Gentry, Gorman, Green, Harper, Sampson W. Harris, Haws, Hendricks, Henn, Horsford, John W. Howe, James Johnson, John Johnson, Robert W. Johnson, Landry, Lockhart, Mace, Humphrey Marshall, Miller, Miner, Molony, Henry D. Moore, John Moore, Nabers, Olds, Orr, Samuel W. Parker, Penn, Phelps, Porter, Price, Richardson, Sackett, Schermerhorn, Scurry, Smith, Stanley, Benjamin Stanton, Frederick P. Stanton, Richard H. Stanton, Abraham P. Stephens, Alexander H. Stephens, St. Martin, Strother, Stuart, Taylor, Walsh, Ward, Watkins, Wilcox, Williams, and Yates—77.

PUBLIC PRINTING.

Mr. GORMAN. Has the morning hour expired?

The SPEAKER. The morning hour has expired.

Mr. GORMAN. Is not the next business before the House the bill in relation to the public printing?

The SPEAKER. The report from the Committee on Public Printing is the first business in order.

Mr. GORMAN. I ask for the reading of the bill.

Mr. HOUSTON. This bill has just been laid upon our tables, and I wish to know of the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. GORMAN] whether he will not allow me to make a motion to postpone its consideration until to-morrow? It is impossible that members can have examined it since it came to our desks this morning. Then, sir, I have another reason why I wish to postpone. I have great anxiety to get through, if possible, with the Indian appropriation bill to-day. There is nothing before the Senate. They will get through the deficiency bill to-day; and my object is to send them that bill, that they may be at work upon it.

Mr. GORMAN. I would accommodate the gentleman certainly, or any one else in the House, if this were a new question; but the public printing has been subject to discussion so long, and the merits and demerits of every proposition have been discussed so long, that it is not like a new question. We have talked about it until it is perfectly familiar to the ear and the recollection of everybody. The rates and charges have been before the House since the first report of the committee upon the subject of public printing. The rates and charges originally reported to the House are the same as those in this bill; and there can be no kind of question raised that has not been raised, and no question discussed that has

THE CONGRESSIONAL GLOBE.

PUBLISHED AT WASHINGTON, BY JOHN C. RIVES.—TERMS $3 FOR THIS SESSION.

32D CONGRESS, 1ST SESSION.

SATURDAY, JULY 17, 1852.

NEW SERIES....No. 113.

not been discussed—and consequently I cannot consent that it shall go over from day to day.

The Clerk then read the bill reported by the Committee on Printing, as follows:

Be it enacted, &c., That the joint resolution entitled "Joint resolution directing the manner of procuring the printing for the two Houses of Congress," approved August 3, 1846, be, and the same is hereby, repealed.

Sec. 2. Be it further enacted, That, from and after the passage of this act, there shall be elected a public printer by each House of Congress, to do the public printing for the Congress for which he or they may be chosen.

Sec. 3. Be it further enacted, That the following shall be the prices to be paid for such printing as may from time to time be ordered by Congress:

FOR THE FIRST CLASS,

Consisting of the bills and joint resolutions of both Houses.
For composition, per page, fifty cents.

For the press-work, paper, folding, and stitching, per page—

For five hundred and eighty copies, seventy-five cents; and at the same rate for any greater number not exceeding one thousand copies.

FOR THE SECOND CLASS,

Consisting of reports of committees of both Houses, with indexes:

For the composition per page, octavo—

For small pica plain, one dollar.

For small pica rule, one dollar and twenty-five cents.

For brevier plain, one dollar and fifty cents.

For brevier rule, one dollar and seventy-five cents.

For the composition of tables larger than octavo—

Per thousand ems, seventy cents.

For the press-work, paper, folding, and stitching of the octavo size, per page—

For twelve hundred and fifty copies, ninety-five cents, and at the same rate for any greater number not exceeding fifteen hundred copies.

For the press-work, paper, folding, and stitching of each table larger than octavo—

For twelve hundred and fifty copies, three dollars and fifty cents; and at the same rate for any greater number not exceeding fifteen hundred copies.

For deduction on account of folding and stitching not required in the copies reserved for binding, per page, for one hundred copies—

For the octavo size, one quarter of a cent.

For each table larger than octavo, one quarter of a cent.

Additional charge for the trimming, folding, stitching, or inserting of each map, chart, diagram, or plate, of any size or shape, in the copies not reserved for binding—

For one hundred copies, ten cents.

FOR THE THIRD CLASS,

Consisting of the journals of both Houses, with indexes:

For the composition per page, octavo—

For small pica plain, one dollar.

For small pica rule, one dollar and twenty-five cents.

For brevier plain, one dollar and fifty cents.

For brevier rule, one dollar and seventy-five cents.

For the press-work, paper, folding, and stitching, per page, octavo—

For twelve hundred and fifty copies, ninety cents, and at the same rate for any greater number not exceeding fifteen hundred and fifty copies.

For deduction on account of folding and stitching not required in the copies reserved for binding, per page, for one hundred copies—

For the octavo size, one quarter of a cent.

FOR THE FOURTH CLASS,

Consisting of the Executive documents of each House, embracing messages from the President, reports from the several Executive departments, offices, and bureaus, and the documents and statements communicated therewith, with indexes:

For the composition per page, octavo—

For small pica plain, one dollar.

For small pica rule, one dollar and twenty-five cents.

For brevier plain, one dollar and fifty cents.

For brevier rule, one dollar and seventy-five cents.

For the composition of tables larger than octavo—

Per one thousand ems, seventy cents.

For the press-work, paper, folding, and stitching of the octavo size, per page—

For twelve hundred and fifty copies, ninety-five cents; and at the same rate for any greater number not exceeding fifteen hundred copies.

For the press-work, paper, folding, and stitching of each table larger than octavo—

For twelve hundred and fifty copies, three dollars and fifty cents; and at the same rate for any greater number not exceeding fifteen hundred copies.

For deduction on account of folding and stitching not required in the copies reserved for binding, per page, for one hundred copies—

For the octavo size, one quarter of a cent.

For each table larger than octavo, one quarter of a cent.

Additional charge for the trimming, folding, stitching, or inserting of each map, chart, diagram, or plate, of any size or shape, in the copies not reserved for binding—

For one hundred copies, ten cents.

FOR THE FIFTH CLASS,

Consisting of every other description of printing not included in the preceding classes for each House, with indexes, and divided as follows, viz:

Part A of the Fifth Class,

Consisting of resolutions and other documents from State Legislatures, memorials, petitions, and all other papers or documents not included in parts B and C of this class:

For the composition per page, octavo—

For small pica plain, one dollar.

For small pica rule, one dollar and twenty-five cents.

For brevier plain, one dollar and fifty cents.

For brevier rule, one dollar and seventy-five cents.

For the composition of tables larger than octavo—

Per one thousand ems, seventy cents.

For the press-work, paper, folding, and stitching of the octavo size, per page—

For twelve hundred and fifty copies, ninety-five cents; and at the same rate for any greater number not exceeding fifteen hundred copies.

For the press-work, paper, folding, and stitching of each table larger than octavo—

For twelve hundred and fifty copies, three dollars and fifty cents; and at the same rate for any greater number not exceeding fifteen hundred copies.

For deduction on account of folding and stitching to be omitted in the copies reserved for binding, per page for one hundred copies—

For the octavo size, one quarter of a cent.

For each table larger than octavo, one quarter of a cent.

Additional charge for the trimming, folding, stitching, or inserting of each map, chart, diagram, or plate of any size or shape, in the copies not reserved for binding—

For one hundred copies, ten cents.

Part B of the Fifth Class,

Consisting of treaties, messages, reports, and other papers and documents ordered to be printed in confidence for the use of the Senate:

For the composition per page, octavo—

For small pica plain, one dollar.

For small pica rule, one dollar and twenty-five cents.

For brevier plain, one dollar and fifty cents.

For brevier rule, one dollar and seventy-five cents.

For the composition of tables larger than octavo—

Per one thousand ems, seventy cents.

For the press-work, paper, folding, and stitching, of the octavo size, per page—

For sixty-five copies, twenty cents; and at the same rate for any greater number not exceeding one hundred copies.

For the press-work, paper, folding, and stitching for each table larger than octavo—

For sixty-five copies, two dollars; and at the same rate for any greater number not exceeding one hundred copies.

Part C of the Fifth Class,

Consisting of tabular statements of the orders of the day, lists of yeas and nays, circular letters, and all other printing of a miscellaneous character, not specified in either of the preceding classes, or in parts A and B of this class:

For composition, in whatever type, size, or form that may be required—

Per thousand ems for plain work, fifty cents.

Per one thousand ems for rule and figure work, fifty cents.

For the press-work, paper, folding, and stitching one hundred copies, per page—

For royal octavo or any size smaller, twenty cents.

For quarto post, one dollar.

For folio cap, one dollar.

For any size larger than folio cap, one dollar.

The paper to be used under this part C to be such as may be directed by the Secretary of the Senate and Clerk of the House of Representatives, respectively.

Percentage deduction for additional copies of either class.

For deduction on the prices above stated for the press-work, paper, folding, and stitching, for furnishing additional copies of matter included in either of the aforesaid classes, the additional copies to be printed on the same paper, with the same ink, and in the same style, as the usual numbers, viz:

For deduction for any number of copies—

Exceeding fifteen hundred, and not exceeding five thousand, none.

Exceeding five thousand, and not exceeding ten thousand, two per centum.

Exceeding ten thousand, and not exceeding twenty thousand, three per centum.

Exceeding twenty thousand, five per centum.

Sec. 4. Be it further enacted, That the Clerk of the House of Representatives and Secretary of the Senate shall purchase of the lowest and best bidder all the paper to be used for the public printing, said paper to be of a fine and smooth texture, weighing at least fifty pounds to the ream, not calender; the price or cost of said paper to be deducted from the prices for printing herebefore fixed.

Sec. 5. Be it further enacted, That a committee, consisting of three members of the Senate and three members of the House of Representatives, shall be appointed by the Speaker of the House and President of the Senate, which shall constitute a Committee on Printing, which shall have power to adopt such measures as may be deemed necessary to remedy any neglect or delay in the execution of the public printing, and to make a pro rata reduction in the compensation if the work shall not be done in a neat, durable, and workmanlike manner, or to refuse the work altogether if not so executed as aforesaid. The committee shall audit and pass upon all accounts for public printing; but no bill shall be acted upon for work not actually delivered.

Sec. 6. Be it further enacted, That all motions to print extra copies of any bill, report, or other public document, shall be referred to the committee of the members of the House in which the same may be made; and all expenses for printing shall be paid out of the contingent fund of the two Houses, in proportion to the number ordered by each, except the expense of composition, which shall be paid by the House first ordering the same to be printed.

That all acts or joint resolutions conflicting with the provisions of this act be, and the same are hereby, repealed.

Mr. GORMAN took the floor.

ERROR—FLORIDA RAILROAD BILL.

The SPEAKER. Will the gentleman from Indiana suspend for a moment?

Amid the confusion prevailing in the House, at the time, the Clerk made a mistake in the count, upon the vote to refer the Florida land bill to the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union. The vote stands, in fact, a tie. Under the rule, it is the duty of the Speaker, to vote when his vote would change the result. The Speaker votes in the affirmative, and the bill is therefore referred.

Mr. DEAN. I rise to a privileged question. I move to reconsider the vote by which the bill was referred, and to lay the motion to reconsider upon the table.

The SPEAKER. In the opinion of the Chair, the motion to reconsider must be entered, but cannot interfere with the business immediately before the House.

Mr. DEAN. Then I withdraw the motion.

THE PUBLIC PRINTING.

Mr. JENKINS. Will the chairman of the Committee on Public Printing allow me to introduce a substitute for the bill which he reported, that it may be read for the information of the House, if it is in order?

Mr. GORMAN. I am somewhat surprised to hear the gentleman from New York ask that of me, under the circumstances, but I cannot now say why. I certainly would extend to him any courtesy that I possibly could, but—

Mr. JENKINS. Allow me to say, I have no doubt the gentleman would be glad to extend to me any courtesy, and I hope therefore I may have an opportunity of offering the substitute.

Mr. CARTER. We will take care of it, if the previous question is called.

THE FLORIDA RAILROAD BILL.

Mr. STUART. I rise to a question of order. I was engaged at the moment, but I understand the Speaker to have voted upon the question of referring the Florida railroad bill. I wish to state this for the consideration of the Speaker. The vote had been announced, the Chair had decided that the motion to refer the bill to the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union was not carried, and the House had proceeded to other business.

Several Voices. There was a mistake in the vote.

The SPEAKER. The Chair acted upon the idea that it was his duty to vote, and that if any error existed in the vote it should be corrected, and that the Journal should be kept correctly.

Mr. STUART. I understand the rule to be this: In the first place, I understand that the Speaker may vote upon any question if he chooses; but according to the practice of the House, when the vote of the Speaker will change the result, he may or may not vote. It is usual, if he votes at all, to do so at the request of a member; but I submit this question that the Speaker can no more vote after the question has been decided, and the House has proceeded to other business, than any other member of the House can vote. If the House has not proceeded to the consideration of other business, and the Speaker has not before announcing the vote finally, then he can vote; but after that he has no more right to record his vote than any other member of the House.

Mr. DUNHAM. I would like to make a single suggestion. The objection of the gentleman from Michigan [Mr. STANT] comes too late, for the vote of the Speaker was received by the common consent of the House. No one objected.

The SPEAKER. The following is the rule upon the subject:

"12. In all cases of ballot by the House, the Speaker shall vote; in other cases he shall not be required to vote, unless the House be equally divided, or unless his vote, if given to the minority, will make the division equal; and in case of such equal division the question shall be lost."

Mr. STANTON, of Tennessee. I desire to inquire whether there was an error in the statement of the vote?

The SPEAKER. There was an error in the statement of the vote. The Chair thought it was his duty to state that error to the House, that it might be corrected; and he was under the impression that it was his duty, also, under the rule, to cast his vote. It will be for the House to determine what disposition it will make of the matter.

Mr. STANTON. I think the Speaker is perfectly right.

Mr. JONES, of Tennessee. Suppose the error had not been discovered until after the House adjourned to-day, the Speaker would have brought it to the consideration of the House to-morrow.

The SPEAKER. The Journal must have been corrected in the morning, at all events.

Mr. JONES. The error would have been discovered, and the Speaker would have given his vote then.

Mr. STUART. When I raised my question of order, I did not understand the fact now stated, that an error existed in the vote, which was subsequently corrected.

The SPEAKER. There was a miscount of one vote.

THE PUBLIC PRINTING AGAIN.

Mr. GORMAN. I certainly will not inflict a speech upon this House upon the printing question. I shall not attempt to debate it in any manner. I simply want to make a statement to the House, as perhaps some gentlemen did not hear the bill read distinctly. Perhaps from where I stand my voice can be heard by every member in the House, and I will briefly state what this bill is.

The first section provides that the act approved the 3d August, 1846, shall be repealed. The second section provides for the election of a public printer, and the third section establishes the prices; and I will here state, that the prices are the same as those which were reported to the House upon a former occasion. The prices are what were called Towers's estimate.

Mr. STANLY. Will the gentleman allow me to ask him a question?

Mr. GORMAN. Certainly.

Mr. STANLY. I understand that the gentleman does not propose to debate this subject, and I desire, therefore, to ask him in relation to certain matters of fact as he goes along. I understand the gentleman from Indiana to have said that the prices are nearly the same as those fixed by the committee for the performance of the work in case Hamilton's contract was pronounced null and void. I ask the gentleman from Indiana if in that contract there was not more charged because only the balance of the work had to be done?—because if the public printer had done all the work for the whole Congress, he could have done it for less, (having time to prepare himself,) than it could be done for by a person who might undertake to finish a contract which Boyd Hamilton had left unfinished?

Mr. GORMAN. I will answer the gentleman. I do not know that that entered at all into the consideration of the estimate made by Towers. I am not at all advised that it did. We did not so state to him, nor do I know what considerations induced him to fix upon these prices.

Mr. STANLY. I have been informed that that consideration did enter into the estimate. Can the gentleman inform me who fixed those prices?

Mr. GORMAN. The prices in this bill were fixed by Mr. Towers, in an estimate sent to the Printing Committee, I believe three months ago, or perhaps not more than two months ago.

Mr. STANLY. One more question. Is not the contract with Boyd Hamilton pronounced null and void, and set aside by the committee?

Mr. GORMAN. The resolution passed by the Committee on Printing declared that the contract was not void, and not forfeited, but that A. Boyd Hamilton had not complied with his contract.

Mr. STANLY. Was not another contract entered into with other persons to execute the printing?

Mr. GORMAN. A contract was entered into by the Committee on Printing with Gideon & Co. to do the printing of the Senate, and Donelson &

Armstrong (now Armstrong) to do the printing of the House.

Mr. STANLY. Now I should be glad to know what will become of these two contracts if this bill becomes a law?

Mr. GORMAN. I will state to the gentleman from North Carolina—and perhaps it is proper for me to state it—that if this law goes into effect, Messrs. Gideon and Armstrong have given me in writing power to relinquish their contracts to the Government at any time. I have that writing before me at this moment. I am not at liberty, however, to read it, and have it published in the papers, but it has been shown to some of the gentleman's friends, and I am authorized to relinquish this contract for Mr. Gideon whenever I say so. The present law will have to be repealed before I ever will say so.

Mr. SMART. I have understood—I do not know how true it is—that that writing which the gentleman has, is not very explicit, and I think it is material that we should see the writing.

Mr. GORMAN. I have it here, and if the gentleman will come and sit by me, I will show it him; but I have no authority to let it go into the papers, because it was an authority given to me by a gentleman in private life.

Mr. GIDDINGS. I want to inquire of the gentleman from Indiana if, in this arrangement, the interests of the Whig party are as well attended to as those of the Democratic party.

Mr. GORMAN. They are not attended to at all, I assure you. Neither the interests of the Whig party or any other party have been attended to. We have tried to do what we thought right, and that is about all. We expect to elect a Democrat, however, if we can, my friend.

Mr. GIDDINGS. One further inquiry. Is this bill in accordance with the direction of the Democratic caucus?

Mr. GORMAN. Well, sir, I have no kind of objection to reply to that question. The Democratic party had a caucus; the Democratic party did agree that the public printing had not been executed according to contract; they did agree that the public service was suffering from that failure; they did agree that there must be some remedy; they did agree to adopt a remedy, and they did agree that this was the best remedy. These are the matters upon which they agreed.

Mr. MASON. Let me correct the gentleman in his last remark.

Mr. GIDDINGS. I have one further question to ask the gentleman, if he will allow me, but I will yield to the gentleman from Kentucky, if he wishes it.

Mr. McMULLIN. I wish to ask the gentleman a question.

Mr. GIDDINGS. I will yield to my friend from Virginia, as I want to get at these interrogatories.

Mr. McMULLIN. I desire to know how the prices reported by the committee will compare with the prices of 1819?

Mr. GORMAN. I cannot exactly tell myself, not being a practical printer; but I understand printers to say that they are about thirty-five to thirty-nine per cent. lower than the prices of 1819.

Mr. PHILIPS. An inquiry has been made by the gentleman from Ohio, [Mr. GIDDINGS,] as to what was done in the Democratic caucus. That matter has been published, and perhaps, not agreeing in everything with what has been said by the gentleman from Indiana, [Mr. GORMAN,] though I may have misunderstood him, I have no objection myself to proclaim what was done in that caucus. It was determined that it was expedient that each House of Congress should elect a public printer. It was also declared to be expedient to regulate the price—to pay a reasonable price for composition, press-work, binding, and stitching the documents ordered to be printed for each branch of Congress. It was furthermore declared to be expedient, so as to obtain proper paper upon which the public printing was to be executed, that Congress should procure the paper for such printing, and in coming to such a result, I am satisfied that it is the same result to which every gentleman must come, when he takes into consideration the manner in which the public printing has been executed for the last three Congresses, this included.

Mr. GORMAN. I said I was not going to make a speech. The gentleman from Missouri, [Mr. PHILIPS] has detailed precisely what the Democratic caucus did agree to in a resolution offered by him. Let me state further, that it was not determined by that caucus who was to be the public printer. No nomination was made. The only thing that was agreed to by that caucus was what has been stated by the gentleman from Missouri.

This bill is not presented in obedience to that caucus. It was drawn long before that caucus was called—a month before that caucus was heard of, or thought of. It was drawn immediately after the nomination for President by the Democratic party, without consultation, except with the members of the Committee on Printing, and with the select committee appointed by this House, of which the gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. MARSHALL] is the chairman—the provisions of this bill being substantially the same as the provisions of the bill agreed upon by that committee.

There are some details in this bill in which some of our friends, and some gentlemen of the opposition, cannot altogether concur. In the conflicting opinions upon all questions of this complicated character, there will always be some difference of opinion in regard to the particular items in a bill; but the main and substantial features of this bill have been submitted to every gentleman by whom this question of printing has been considered—

Mr. CLINGMAN. Will the gentleman allow me to ask him a few questions?

Mr. GORMAN. I will, with pleasure.

Mr. CLINGMAN. I have looked over the sections of this bill, but, of course, I cannot tell what the rate of compensation is—whether it is fair or not. I will ask the gentleman how it will compare with Towers's bid, and with John C. Rives's bid?

Mr. GORMAN. I stated to the House before that this is Towers's estimate; it is substantially the same as Towers's bid, varying only in one class. I believe I am within the bounds of truth when I say that it is critically and actually the same as Towers's estimate, except in the fourth class, and that is a little higher.

Mr. CLINGMAN. Then, if I understand it, this is about the rate at which it was agreed that the printing should be let to the Union and the Republic.

Mr. GORMAN. This is the precise scale of prices at which it was agreed that it should be let to the Union and the Republic.

Mr. CARTTER. I understand that the chairman of the committee designs calling the previous question, but before he does so, I desire to make an inquiry of him in regard to the precise application of the fourth section if the bill. The fourth section provides—

"That the Clerk of the House of Representatives and the Secretary of the Senate shall purchase of the lowest and best bidder all the paper to be used for the public printing; said paper to be of a fine and smooth texture, weighing at least fifty pounds to the ream, not calender; the price or cost of said paper to be deducted from the prices of printing hereinbefore fixed."

I wish the chairman of the Committee on Printing would explain that provision. It appears to be that the amount paid for the paper shall be deducted, but no reference is made to the price or quality of the paper.

Mr. GORMAN. I will endeavor to explain it. Members upon both sides of the House will remember that these bids were made with a view to the public printer being required to find the paper; this estimate of Towers was made with that view. Gentlemen will also remember that after the discussion in this House, there seemed to be a decided impression that the Government should buy the paper, that the public printer should not speculate upon it, and that it would then be of the style, and texture, and weight that the Government desires its printing to be done upon. With that view, my friend from North Carolina [Mr. VENABLE] suggested an amendment almost in the precise words that are employed in this fourth section. After examination, I thought it proper that we should put in that provision; and it was put in. It simply provides that the price of the paper is to be deducted from the price of the composition and press-work.

Mr. STEVENS, of Pennsylvania. Will the gentleman allow me to ask him what is to be done with the contract with the present public printer? Is there any provision for that?

Mr. GORMAN. Not in this bill.

Mr. STEVENS. Well, I should like to know what is to become of him; because we cannot elect a new printer until we get rid of the old one. The law nowhere authorizes us to dismiss him, but only to hold him on his bond for any deficiency in his work. Now, we have one printer, and I want to know what is to become of him?

Mr. GORMAN. If the law is repealed, the gentleman who is now the public printer will relinquish his contract. I can say that to the gentleman.

Mr. STEVENS. I do not know but that he will. What I want to know is, if the committee undertake to say that the repeal of that law repeals the contract between this Government and the present public printer?

Mr. GORMAN. Now, I think gentlemen ought to be satisfied with asking me questions.

Mr. SMART. I would like the gentleman to inform me—

Mr. GORMAN. I cannot yield to any further questions. I hope gentlemen will try to be reconciled, and be satisfied.

Mr. STEVENS. The caucus so decided.

Mr. GORMAN. Not at all. Men's consciences are not controlled upon questions of legislation, I apprehend, by the resolution of a caucus. It is a recommendation to friends, and that is all. It is to be expected, however, that there will be a liberal consideration paid to the dignified deliberation which was bestowed upon this question by Democrats who, I hope, were devoted to the welfare of their country, as well as to the welfare of their party. It is a recommendation to their political friends of what they deem the best action to take. If any gentlemen differ with them, I hope it will be an honest difference—I expect it will be. I make these remarks simply in reply to the gentleman from Pennsylvania.

Mr. Chairman, I shall take the responsibility of offering an amendment which has been handed to me by the gentleman from North Carolina, [Mr. VENABLE.] It will be remembered by gentlemen that there was a contest here some time since as to whether this House had a right to instruct the Committee on Printing. To obviate that difficulty, and entirely do away with all further argument or contest on the subject, the gentleman from North Carolina has handed me an amendment which I think ought to be incorporated in the bill. I will read it; it is to add to the fifth section the following:

Provided, That no contract, agreement, or arrangement entered into by the committee shall be binding, or take effect, until the same shall be reported to the House of Congress to which the printing belongs, and approved by the same; and when the printing relates to the business of both Houses of Congress, then it shall be reported to both Houses of Congress, and approved by them.

Mr. FITCH. I have prepared an amendment intended to obviate the same difficulty, and if the gentleman will permit me, I will read it. The fifth section of this bill is, I believe, substantially the existing law. Is it not?

Mr. GORMAN. It is.

Mr. FITCH. My amendment more clearly defines the duties of that committee. It is to strike out the word "which" in the fifth line of the fifth section, and insert the following:

Whose duty it shall be, if there be any neglect, delay, or defect in the execution of the public printing, to report the fact, instances, and extent to the House and the Senate, and if joint instruction relative to this action be not given within three weeks from the date of their report, they shall—

Mr. GORMAN. The amendment of my colleague is substantially the same as that of the gentleman from North Carolina. The amendment of the gentleman from North Carolina covers all that ground, and consequently there is no necessity for accepting the amendment of my colleague.

The SPEAKER. The amendment of the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. Fitch] cannot be offered without the consent of his colleague.

Mr. GORMAN. I hope, sir, that after having disposed of this public printing, I shall be permitted to withdraw from this vexed question. I have never in my life had a public duty to perform in which I had so many conflicting elements to meet. I have never discharged a public duty with a more conscientious regard for the public weal and the service. In the selection of individuals to do particular jobs, I confess that my party predilections have sometimes governed me.

But I have been so much annoyed, and have been so much subjected to the suspicions of gentlemen in regard to prices and in regard to my party predilections, that I think, after I have discharged my duty, and got the public printing once fixed upon a permanent basis, I shall ask the kind indulgence of the Chair to discharge me from further service on that committee. It is a committee upon which any gentleman who discharges his duty lays himself open to the constant criticism of his kindest and best friends.

Sometimes it has been a duty which I have really performed with reluctance. It is one which at the proper time I shall ask to be discharged from.

Mr. Speaker, as I said before, this bill has been discussed; the prices have been discussed; the merits of a proposition for a printing bureau have been discussed; the election of a printer has been discussed; the buying of paper by the Government has been discussed. Now you have a proposition plainly before you to repeal the existing law, to elect a printer, to fix the prices, and to provide that the Government shall hereafter buy the paper on which the printing is done, and upon this question I now ask for the previous question.

Mr. MARSHALL, of Kentucky. I hope the gentleman will not insist on his demand for the previous question.

Mr. CAMPBELL, of Ohio. I ask the gentleman to withdraw the call for the previous question. There is one matter here which I should like to have explained.

Mr. JENKINS. I hope the gentleman will allow me to offer a substitute for the bill.

Mr. GORMAN. The gentleman from Ohio [Mr. CAMPBELL] desires to propound a question, and for that purpose I will withdraw the demand for the previous question.

Mr. CAMPBELL. I should much prefer that the gentleman would withdraw the demand for the previous question, to allow me to submit a few remarks in relation to the bill.

Mr. GORMAN. I cannot do that.

Mr. CAMPBELL. The question I desire to ask, is substantially the same as that which was propounded by my colleague, [Mr. CARTER.]

Mr. GORMAN. Then I must insist on the previous question, for I have answered that question once.

Mr. CAMPBELL. At all events I did not understand the gentleman's explanation, and I desire to call his attention to it again. I understand that the committee have reported this bill, in pursuance of the recommendation of the caucus. The object of that caucus, as stated by the gentleman from Missouri, [Mr. PHELPS,] was to allow a fair price for composition, press-work, folding and stitching—Congress to furnish the paper. Now, sir, it will be observed that when the committee—

Mr. GORMAN. I cannot allow the gentleman to make a speech, because my time will be out, and I cannot then call the previous question.

Mr. CAMPBELL. I merely wish to explain to the gentleman—

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Ohio is not in order. The gentleman from Indiana insists on his right to the floor.

Mr. CAMPBELL. The point I desire to submit is simply this—

Mr. GORMAN. I really cannot yield the floor any longer.

Mr. CAMPBELL. Well, I hope the previous question will be voted down.

Mr. JENKINS. Will the gentleman from Indiana allow my substitute to be read?

Mr. MARSHALL, of Kentucky. I desire to know if it is in order now to move to refer this bill to the Select Committee on Printing?

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from New York [Mr. JENKINS] rose, and was recognized by the Chair, and appeals to the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. GORMAN] to yield the floor to him for the purpose of having his substitute read.

Mr. JENKINS. I desire to have my substitute read; and then I will give way to the gentleman to move the previous question.

Mr. GORMAN. I cannot yield the floor, because my time will be out, and I cannot hold the floor for the purpose of moving the previous question.

The SPEAKER. In reply to the question propounded a moment ago by the gentleman from Kentucky, [Mr. MARSHALL,] the Chair would state that it is not in order to receive a motion to commit while the demand for the previous question is pending.

Mr. MARSHALL, of Kentucky. I thought that the demand for the previous question being made, but not seconded, the motion to commit took precedence. If the demand for the previous question be seconded, the motion to commit cannot be made at all.

The SPEAKER. It cannot, nor can any motion intervene between the demand for the previous question and the putting of the question for seconding that demand.

Mr. MARSHALL. I appeal to the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. GORMAN] to allow me to make a single remark upon this bill.

Mr. GORMAN. I cannot.

Mr. JOHNSON, of Arkansas. I rise to a question of order. I submit that this debate cannot be allowed after the demand for the previous question has been made. The Chair so stated.

FLORIDA RAILROAD BILL AGAIN.

Mr. STEPHENS, of Georgia. I rise to a privileged question. I have just ascertained that my name is not recorded as having voted against the motion to commit the Florida land bill. I certainly did rise in my place here, and vote in the negative.

The SPEAKER. The Chair recollects very well that the gentleman from Georgia did vote upon that motion, and that he voted in the negative. He regrets that these errors should have been committed by the Clerk; but he only wonders that such errors are not more frequently committed in this body, where there is so much confusion. The accuracy of the Clerk in these matters has usually been very great indeed. The only wonder is, that mistakes are not more frequently made. The Chair learns that the vote of the gentleman from Georgia is not recorded. He very well recollects, as before stated, that the gentleman did rise in his place after the roll had been called, and addressed the Chair, and that he voted in the negative. It is for the House to determine whether the correction shall be made or not.

Mr. CARTER. I recollect that the gentleman from Georgia voted in the negative.

There was no objection, and the vote was recorded, making a majority in the negative.

So the bill was not committed.

Mr. GENTRY. Does not the question now recur upon the bill?

The SPEAKER. It does not. The consideration of that bill is confined to the morning hour, which has expired. It will come up as the first business for the morning hour to-morrow morning.

THE PUBLIC PRINTING AGAIN.

Mr. BRENTON. I desire to ask my colleague, the chairman of the Committee on Printing, [Mr. GORMAN,] to withdraw the demand for the previous question.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman can propound no question unless the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. GORMAN] withdraws the demand for the previous question.

Mr. GORMAN. I do not withdraw the demand.

Mr. MARSHALL, of Kentucky. I demand the yeas and nays upon seconding the demand for the previous question.

The SPEAKER. It is not in order to have the yeas and nays upon seconding the demand for the previous question. The gentleman can demand them upon ordering the main question.

Mr. SMITH obtained the floor.

Mr. MARSHALL. I move to lay the bill upon the table, and upon that motion I demand the yeas and nays.

Mr. SMITH. I desire to know if I have not the floor?

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Alabama has the floor, and the gentleman from Kentucky cannot take it from him to make his motion.

Mr. SMITH. I rise to make a personal appeal to the honorable chairman of the Committee on Printing. I do it, as a friend to the principles of the bill. But it is a matter of two much importance to be voted on under the operation of the previous question. There has been but one speech made, and that in favor of the bill. The thing should be more thoroughly investigated. The discussion heretofore had upon this subject has been of a very desultory character, and no distinct opinion on any particular branch of this subject has been arrived at; especially are we undecided upon the all-important question—the price of the work. Now, sir, I appeal to the chairman of the Committee on Printing to withdraw his demand for the previous question. The honorable gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. MARSHALL] is the chairman of the Select Committee on Printing. I hope, sir, that that select committee will have an opportunity of making their report before the vote is taken on this bill. The special committee was raised to investigate this whole subject, on account of its great importance. If the House attempts to force this bill down, under the operation of the previous question, I shall vote against every portion of it, and also against the candidate which may be brought forward under it. If we have a fair chance to investigate and make it right in its features, then I will sustain it, and the nominee of the party; for printing, sir, I can never consent to make a matter of money, a political principle. This subject of printing involves a vast amount of money, and it is our duty to attend to the Treasury untrammelled by party considerations.

Mr. MARSHALL. If the demand for the previous question is withdrawn, I will not make the motion to lay the bill upon the table.

The question was then taken upon seconding the demand for the previous question, and the result was—ayes 49, noes 98.

So the demand was not seconded.

Mr. JENKINS. I now offer the following substitute for the bill, which I send to the Clerk, and ask to have read.

Mr. HOUSTON. I want to make a suggestion to the gentleman from New York.

Mr. JENKINS. I hope I do not lose the floor.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from New York is entitled to the floor, and it will be for him to say whether he will yield it to the gentleman from Alabama, [Mr. HOUSTON.]

Mr. HOUSTON. I only desired to say, that I suppose the gentleman wishes to have his bill printed, and I propose that he should make the motion to print, and let the bill go over till members can have an opportunity to examine it.

Mr. JENKINS. If the bill is printed, that will answer my purpose. I move that the further consideration of this subject be postponed till tomorrow, and that the bill with the amendments be printed.

The SPEAKER. The bill has already been printed. Does the gentleman move that the proposed amendments be printed?

Mr. JENKINS. I submit that motion.

Mr. MARSHALL, of Kentucky. I move that the bill and amendments be referred to the Select Committee on the Public Printing.

Mr. JENKINS. I believe I still have the floor.

Mr. KING, of New York. I hope my friend from New York [Mr. JENKINS] will have his amendment read, and we can then know how to dispose of it.

Mr. JENKINS. I have no objection to having the substitute read.

It was then read, in part, by the Clerk, as follows:

A bill amendatory of a joint resolution passed August 3d, 1846, entitled "A joint resolution directing the manner of procuring the printing for both Houses of Congress."

Be it enacted by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled, That there shall immediately be chosen by joint resolution of both Houses of Congress a Superintendent of Public Printing, who shall be a practical printer, and shall hold his office during the present Congress, or until another be appointed in his place; said Superintendent is hereby clothed with all the authority conferred in and by said joint resolution, upon the Secretary of the Senate and the Clerk of the House of Representatives, the President or Vice President of the Senate, the Speaker of the House of Representatives, and the authority conferred upon the Committee on Printing in and by the second section of said joint resolution; and he is hereby required to perform all the duties conferred by said joint resolution upon said officers, and each and every of them, except the duties of the Committee on Public Printing mentioned in the third section of said joint resolution.

Sec. 2. Be it further enacted, That the said Superintendent, when so appointed, shall take the oath of office prescribed in the second section of the act of the 3d of March, 1791, for clerks and other officers, and shall execute to the United States a bond, with two sufficient sureties, to be approved or by the President of the Senate and the Speaker of the House of Representatives, in the penalty of $10,000, conditioned for the faithful performance of the duties of his office. The said Superintendent shall, therefore, procure the printing necessary to be done before the close of the present session of Congress, or which may have been begun but not performed substantially according to contract, upon such terms as he may deem most advisable, and as shall best promote the public interest; and for that purpose the said Superintendent is hereby authorized to purchase the requisite paper for said printing.

Sec. 3. Be it further enacted, That the said Superintendent be, and he is hereby authorized to contract for and purchase all paper for the printing of both Houses of Congress during his continuance in office; that contracts for paper shall, at all times, be separate from contracts for printing, and the same person shall not be allowed to contract both for printing and furnishing the paper; the contracts for printing to be done, and paper to be furnished after the close of the present session of Congress, shall be let and entered into in the manner prescribed in the first section of said joint resolution, and shall embrace the paper and printing for the residue of the present Congress only.

Sec. 4. And be it further enacted, That said Superintendent be and he is hereby authorized to decide upon the performance or non-performance of all said contracts, and whether the contracts be performed in due time, and to declare the same forfeited for non-performance. The contracts to be entered into for printing shall contain a stipulation that the printing shall be done in a reasonable time; which time may be designated as occasion shall require by the said Superintendent; which conditions shall be inserted in each contract. Before declaring any contract forfeited for non-performance, the Superintendent shall immediately serve a written notice thereof upon the defaulting contractor, specifying the particulars in which such failure of performance consists, and the Superintendent shall thereupon immediately proceed to relet such contract in the manner provided in the said first section of said joint resolution as herein amended; but he shall not relet such contract to such defaulting contractor. Said Superintendent shall forthwith cause the contractor, so failing to perform his contract, and his bail to be prosecuted in the name of the United States for the damages arising from such failure.

Sec. 5. Be it further enacted, That the said Superintendent shall personally superintend the business entrusted to his charge. He shall keep the samples of paper and printing upon which the contracts are let; he shall keep an accurate account of the paper furnished and the printing done, with the contract prices thereof and all expenses pertaining to said office. He shall make a full report of his doings at the opening of each session of Congress and as often as Congress or either House shall direct; and shall be entitled to receive a salary of $2,000 a year for his services.

Sec. 6. Be it further enacted, That within thirty days before the adjournment of every Congress, both Houses shall proceed by joint resolution, to choose a Superintendent of Public Printing, who shall possess the power and be subject to the same duties herein conferred and imposed upon the said Superintendent. Said Superintendent shall be entitled to the like salary, and shall hold his office for the period of two years or until another be chosen. So much of the said joint resolution of the 3d of August, 1846, as is inconsistent herewith is hereby repealed.

The following is the joint resolution proposed to be amended by the foregoing bill:

Resolved by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled, That the Secretary of the Senate and the Clerk of the House of Representatives, be and they are hereby authorized and required, at the beginning of the final session of every Congress, to advertise, for four weeks successively, in all the newspapers published in the city of Washington, for sealed proposals for supplying the Senate and House of Representatives, respectively, of the next ensuing Congress, with the necessary printing for each; which advertisement shall describe the kind of printing and the quality of paper required, as near as may be, in the execution of the work; and said advertisement shall divide and classify the printing of the respective Houses, as follows: One of bills and resolutions; one of reports of committees; one of journals; one of Executive documents; and one for every other description of printing; each class to be a separate job, and to be provided for by separate contract. The said advertisement shall also contain a designation of the place in the said city of Washington where such sealed proposals shall be received, and the day and time of day at which said Secretary and Clerk will cease to receive any further proposals. And the Secretary and Clerk aforesaid shall provide suitable samples of the printing required, and of the paper on which the same is to be executed, to be kept at the place so designated as aforesaid at least twenty days successively before the time of receiving proposals shall expire, open to the inspection of all persons desiring to make proposals for the printing aforesaid, intelligence whereof shall be contained in said advertisement. Immediately on the expiration of the time for receiving said proposals, they shall be opened by the Secretary and Clerk aforesaid in the presence of the Vice President, or President of the Senate, and the Speaker of the House of Representatives, and of such persons making proposals as may wish to be present. And the Secretary of the Senate, under the supervision of the Vice President or President of the Senate, and the Clerk of the House of Representatives, under the supervision of the Speaker, shall, thereupon, let each class of said printing to the lowest bidder, who shall furnish satisfactory evidence of his practical skill and his ability to do the work, and who shall offer good and sufficient security for the faithful execution of the jobs and contracts undertaken by him. And thereupon the Vice President or President of the Senate and its Secretary, and the Speaker of the House and its Clerk, shall proceed to take bonds, with good and sufficient security, for the due and faithful performance of the work; and the officers aforesaid shall immediately thereafter report to their respective Houses all such lettings of printing, and the contracts relating to the same. Provided, That the said proposals shall remain sealed until the time appointed for examining the same.

Sec. 2. And be it further resolved, That a committee, consisting of three members of the Senate and three members of the House of Representatives, shall be chosen by their respective Houses, which shall constitute a Committee on Printing, which shall have power to adopt such measures as may be deemed necessary to remedy any neglect or delay on the part of the contractor to execute the work ordered by Congress, and to make a pro rata reduction in the compensation allowed, or to refuse the work altogether, should it be inferior to the standard; and in all cases, the contractor and his securities shall be responsible for any increased expenditure consequent upon the non-performance of the contract. The committee shall audit and pass upon all accounts for printing; but no bill shall be acted upon for work that is not actually executed and delivered, and which they may require to be properly authenticated.

Sec. 3. And be it further resolved, That all motions to print extra numbers of any bill, paper, or document, in either House, shall be referred to the members of the committee of that House, who shall report upon the propriety of printing, and the probable expense thereof, as early as convenient. And all expenses for printing shall be paid from the contingent fund of the two Houses, in proportion to the number of copies ordered by each, except the expense of composition, which shall be paid by the House which shall have first ordered the printing of the paper or document; and if there shall be a second composition, it shall be paid for by the House which shall authorize and direct the same; and when extra copies of any document or paper shall be ordered by both Houses, they shall be delivered to the two Houses simultaneously, in proportion to the number of copies by them respectively ordered.

Sec. 4. And be it further resolved, That all laws and parts of laws now in force, not in conformity with the provisions of this joint resolution, be and the same are hereby repealed.

Mr. HOUSTON. I hope the time of the House will not be taken up by the reading of this substitute.

Mr. JENKINS. I then move that the further reading of the bill be dispensed with, and that the proposed amendments be printed, and with the original bill, be referred to the Select Committee on Printing.

Mr. DEAN. Upon that motion I demand the yeas and nays.

Mr. JENKINS. I will modify my motion so as simply to move that the proposed amendments to the bill be printed. Then any other motion can be made by itself as to its disposition. I do not desire to incur the motion by attaching to it any other proposition.

Mr. MARSHALL, of Kentucky. I move so to modify the motion of the gentleman from New York, that the bill, with the amendments, be referred to the Select Committee on Printing, and I propose to make a remark or two upon that motion, if the gentleman from New York does not intend to take the floor.

Mr. JENKINS. Upon the motion to refer I do not design to make any remarks, for the reason that I desire to discuss the merits of the bill when I can get the floor for that purpose.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from New York has the floor, if he desires to address the House.

Mr. JENKINS. I will give way for a single explanation by the gentleman from Kentucky.

Mr. MARSHALL. I do not design, at this time, to discuss the bill. I only desire to submit a remark, to show why the bill should be referred if it is the sense of the House to refer it.

Mr. JONES, of Tennessee. I wish to make an inquiry of the chairman of the Select Committee on Printing, when they will probably be ready to report?

Mr. MARSHALL. I will answer the gentleman's inquiry frankly and at once. The special committee—if their political opinions are to enter into the matter—a majority of them, belong to the other side of the House. They will make their report just as soon as it can be done intelligibly, and with fairness, both to the people and the printer. They have nothing else to subserve except to get a bill regulating the public printing, upon a fair footing—one which shall give remunerative prices to the employees, and shall be fair to the people of the country. That is all the object they have in view.

Mr. JONES. That is all I want.

Mr. MARSHALL. They will report as soon as they can get the data upon which to make an intelligent and proper report.

Mr. STANTON, of Kentucky. Will my colleague permit me to ask him a question?

Mr. MARSHALL. Will my colleague permit me to answer one question at a time? I will state that, after having determined to pay remunerative and fair prices to the printers, in order to obtain what amount, in the estimation of the craft or trade, were fair prices, I made personal application to most of the printing establishments in this city, but I got a schedule of prices from one only. I repeated my applications to the others.

I did not conceal the fact that the committee had come to the determination that the Government should buy the paper. I have not been able, except in that one instance, to obtain a statement. We have conferred upon the propriety of sending to the other cities to ascertain from the larger establishments what was a fair rate. We only desire to reach that, and just so soon as we can learn from the best sources, what are fair prices to remunerate the public printer for the work pertaining to a printer, we will make our report. Our committee have determined that the paper shall be furnished to the printer. I do not find that the printers interested in this matter, are agreed that the Government shall take away more than the furnishing of the paper at all. In fact, I think they are all disinclined to it.

Mr. JONES. I now ask the gentleman from New York to yield me the floor for a moment. I think this committee can report in a week.

Mr. JENKINS. I decline to yield the floor further. I perceive that this question in regard to the report of a select committee is likely to embarrass my motion. My motion is to print merely, and I do not want to have that incumbered by other matters.

The SPEAKER. It is in order, however, to move to refer the bill.

Mr. KING, of New York. I desire to know whether a motion to postpone until to-morrow, which is a day certain, would not be in order, and whether that motion would be debatable?

The SPEAKER. That motion is in order, but would not be debatable. Does the gentleman from New York [Mr. JENKINS] yield the floor to his colleague? [Mr. KING.]

Mr. JENKINS. I yielded to my colleague for an inquiry.

Mr. KING. I understand, then, it is in order to make this motion to print, and that having been passed upon, that a motion to postpone the consideration of the bill until to-morrow will be in order, will preclude other motions, will not be debatable, and will in the mean time enable us to have the amendment printed, and thus have the whole subject before us to-morrow, if the House shall order the printing done. After making a single remark I will suggest to my colleague either to make the motion or permit me to do it. I am myself in favor of open competition, and of the contract system, to the lowest bidder for doing this work. I am unwilling to admit that the American Congress is unable to enforce a contract.

Mr. HOUSTON. If we are going to have a debate let us have a debate, but if we are going to postpone let us postpone. I call the gentleman to order.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman is in order. The question of printing is debatable.

Mr. HOUSTON. That is true, but he is not entitled to the floor; except to ask a question.

The SPEAKER. He has the floor by the consent of his colleague, [Mr. JENKINS.]

Mr. KING. I am in favor of the contract system, and of letting out the work to the lowest bidder. I am in favor of the proposition submitted by my colleague, [Mr. JENKINS.] I believe, if it is fairly presented to the House, it will be adopted. All I ask is a fair and full consideration of it, and a full knowledge of it upon the part of the House. I am opposed to the motion to refer, because I believe the subject of the printing of this House requires early and prompt action. We have not had our documents, and have been unable to furnish them to our constituents. We are unable to obtain those which are necessary for our own information in the matter of legislation. This business of printing, in my judgment, has been already postponed too long, and we ought to act promptly upon it. If, in the course of a day or two, the committee upon which is the gentleman from Kentucky, [Mr. MARSHALL,] could report, I would have no objection to postponing, but I do not think it ought to be postponed long. I am willing the further consideration should be postponed until to-morrow.

Mr. JENKINS. I will barely remark that I do not wish to postpone this subject at all.

Mr. FULLER, of Maine. I merely rise to respond, as a member of the special committee, to the inquiries of the gentleman from New York, [Mr. KING,] that I know of no reason why the special committee may not report in three days.

Mr. JENKINS. I do not wish to have this subject postponed for an unreasonable time. If the special committee cannot report under a week, that is too long a time, and I am opposed to postponing the subject so long. I hope this subject will be brought up for consideration at an earlier day than that, and be disposed of. My amendment is, that a practical printer be appointed by the two Houses of Congress, upon a salary; and that we surround this subject with powers sufficient to carry out the contract system in its fullest extent, and to secure with efficiency and promptitude the execution of the work, so that every member may have his documents in a reasonable time. I hope, therefore, that the motion to postpone this subject until to-morrow, and that the amendment be printed, will prevail.

Mr. HART. I desire to know if the report of a special committee takes precedence of the report of standing committee?

The SPEAKER. Ordinarily it will do so, but not under the special order of the House, which confines the morning hour to the call of committees for reports.

Mr. HART. The difficulty I suggest would be embarrassing. The special committee would not have an opportunity of reporting to this House.

The SPEAKER. Without the consent of the House, that special committee could not report until all the standing committees are called.

Mr. GORMAN. The gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. MARSHALL] has no parliamentary right to make a report until the balance of the regular committees shall have been called, if any one person of this House objects, unless they report on some Monday, when it shall be in order to move a suspension of the rules, and then it will require the usual number of two thirds to suspend the rules. Now, sir, the object must be, and cannot be any other, if I am a judge—

Mr. HOUSTON, (interrupting.) Is there a motion pending to postpone the consideration of this matter until to-morrow?

The SPEAKER. There is no motion of that sort pending. There is a motion to commit this bill and amendment to the Special Committee on Printing.

Mr. HOUSTON. I understood the gentleman from New York [Mr. JENKINS] to make that motion.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from New York withdrew the motion.

Mr. JENKINS. The Speaker labors under a mistake. I did make the proposition, and I desire it to have effect. I moved to postpone the consideration of this matter, and to have the amendment printed.

The SPEAKER. Then there is a pending motion to postpone, which is not debatable. The proposition to print, however, is.

Mr. GORMAN. If that motion was not entertained by the Chair until after I obtained the floor, it interferes with my right.

The SPEAKER. It was made before the gentleman took the floor.

Mr. GORMAN. But it was not entertained, as I understand, by the Chair.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk, however, entertained it. The Chair decides that the motion is pending, and that it takes precedence of the motion to commit.

Mr. GORMAN. Is it debatable?

The SPEAKER. It is not. A motion to print alone would be debatable.

Mr. GORMAN. I submit, as a matter of course, to the decision of the Chair.

The SPEAKER. The question will be first taken upon the motion to postpone, and then upon the pending amendment. The first proposition is not debatable, the second is.

Mr. GORMAN. I want to debate it, and say a few words. The question of printing entitles me to the floor, and entitles me to be heard, but I do not want to be out of order.

The SPEAKER. The proposition to print cannot be considered separately from the question to postpone, and the proposition to postpone is not debatable.

Mr. GORMAN. I do not want to postpone, but the question to print brings up the whole question.

Mr. FOWLER. I rise to a question of order.

The SPEAKER. The Chair decides that debate is out of order until the motion to postpone is disposed of.

Mr. FOWLER. That decides the question of order I was about to make.

The question then recurred upon the adoption of the motion to postpone until to-morrow.

Mr. BELL called for the yeas and nays; which were not ordered.

Mr. MARSHALL, of Kentucky, demanded tellers; which were not ordered.

The question was then put, and it was decided in the affirmative—ayes 75, noes 47.

The SPEAKER. The question recurs now upon the proposition to print the amendment.

Mr. HOUSTON. I demand the previous question upon that motion.

Mr. GORMAN. I want to know whether I had not the floor upon that question?

The SPEAKER. The gentleman did not seek the floor at the time when he could have occupied it.

Mr. STUART. I ask the gentleman from Alabama [Mr. HOUSTON] to withdraw his demand for the previous question; for certainly it was the understanding of those upon this part of the House, at all events, that the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. GORMAN] should have the floor upon that question.

The SPEAKER. The Chair expected that the gentleman would seek the floor, but he did not.

Mr. CLINGMAN. I beg leave respectfully to ask the Chair whether this motion to postpone, having been passed, does not necessarily carry over the whole subject, the motion to print and everything else?

The SPEAKER. It has been the practice of the House, according to the recollection of the Chair, to take a vote separately upon a motion to commit and a motion to print.

Mr. GORMAN. I certainly did not want to annoy the Speaker for the purpose of getting the floor; but I want to say to the House, upon the subject of printing, who is to print? How is it to be printed? What do you want printed?

Mr. CAMPBELL, of Ohio. I wish to interrupt the gentleman a moment.

Mr. GORMAN. I have the floor.

Mr. CAMPBELL. I then rise to a question of order.

The SPEAKER. The Chair understands the previous question has been called for.

Mr. HOUSTON. Gentlemen all around me say their understanding was, that the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. GORMAN] should have the floor. I think it is an improper time to debate this bill, on a motion to commit. I do not want to take an advantage, however, and I will therefore withdraw my demand for the previous question.

Mr. CARTER. I renew the demand for the previous question.

The previous question was seconded, and the main question was ordered to be put.

The question was then taken on the motion to print the amendment, and it was agreed to.

Mr. JONES, of Tennessee. Mr. Speaker—

Mr. JENKINS. I rise to a question of privilege. I move to reconsider the vote just taken, and to lay the motion to reconsider upon the table.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. JONES] was first recognized by the Chair.

DEBATE ON THE INDIAN BILL.

Mr. JONES. I call up my motion, made on yesterday, to reconsider the vote by which the resolution was adopted terminating debate upon the Indian appropriation bill in four hours after it shall again come under consideration in the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union.

If the resolution be reconsidered, I shall move to amend it, to close the debate one hour after the committee shall resume the consideration of the Indian appropriation bill.

Mr. GIDDINGS. I trust the gentleman will extend the time to one hour and a half. I should like to have half an hour for the purpose of discussing the merits of the bill.

Mr. JONES. When the resolution comes before the House, the gentleman can submit that amendment.

Mr. STANTON, of Ohio. I move to lay the motion to reconsider upon the table.

The question was put on the motion to lay upon the table; and, upon a division, there were—ayes 56—

Mr. STEVENS, of Pennsylvania. I demand tellers.

Mr. STANTON. I will, with the consent of the House, withdraw my motion.

Mr. STEPHENS, of Georgia. I renew it.

Tellers were demanded, and ordered; and Messrs. STEPHENS, of Georgia, and MOLONY were appointed.

The question was again put, and the motion to lay the motion to reconsider upon the table was agreed to, the tellers having reported—ayes 63, noes 54.

Mr. HOUSTON. I move that the rules be suspended, and that the House resolve itself into the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union.

Mr. CONGER. I would inquire whether it be in order to move that the House proceed to the consideration of the business upon the Speaker's table?

The SPEAKER. Not pending the motion of the gentleman from Alabama.

The question was taken, and the motion was agreed to.

The House accordingly resolved itself into the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union, (Mr. DISNEY in the chair.)

INDIAN APPROPRIATION BILL.

The CHAIRMAN. The business first in order is the consideration of House bill No. 43, making appropriations for the expenses of the Indian Department for the year ending 30th of June, 1853; upon which the gentleman from Arkansas [Mr. JOHNSON] is entitled to the floor.

Mr. JOHNSON, of Arkansas. My colleague on the Committee on Indian Affairs [Mr. FRENCH] requests from me a few minutes of my time for the purpose of stating a few facts; I therefore yield to him.

Mr. FITCH. I have made the request, Mr. Chairman, of my colleague in consequence of having lost some considerable portion of my time yesterday by yielding to another gentleman. I shall speak directly to the amendment which it is my intention, and of which I now give notice, to offer at the proper time. I alluded yesterday to the disagreeable nature of the duty sometimes imposed upon members of committees of advocating claims. If matters of this character, however, are referred to me, as a member of the committee under the ordinary rules of the House, and, after a rigid investigation, I find nothing in them upon which to hang a doubt of their justice and validity, or anything that would justify me in opposing them, I should esteem myself as forfeiting any confidence which the House and my constituents might be disposed to repose in me if I sought to create doubts and raise objections not justified by the evidence in the case.

It is true, sir, that pettifogging objections can be urged to the payment of any claim, however just; but there is nothing in the character of such objections recommending them to gentlemen in their private relations, and certainly nothing appealing in favor of a resort to them by a grave legislative body, for whose acts an entire nation is accountable. An individual weighing character and credit at nothing might refuse to pay a just debt, unless upon the condition precedent of the relinquishment to him by his creditor of another debt, perhaps equally as just; but such compounding of debts—such a principle, I apprehend, this nation and this Congress would hesitate to declare as their guide of action in their intercourse with other nations, or their own people. It is, however, the principle which, I am sorry to say, is recognized by the amendment offered by my friend from Virginia [Mr. MEADE] on yesterday to my amendment, for the benefit of the friendly Creeks. It is a principle which I hope will not be adopted. I have but little further to say with reference to the claim of the Creeks. By the treaty of 1821 we compelled them to indemnify certain citizens of Georgia for depredations committed upon those citizens by the Indians. In doing so, we exercised a right incumbent upon us; for while, as the government of the people and their servants, we are bound to protect them from injury—as guardians of the Indians, justice demands our protection to be extended over them. In the protection of our people—citizens of Georgia—we compelled the Indians to compensate individuals for damages inflicted upon them; and shall we refuse to mete the same measure of justice to others we demanded for our citizens, especially when those others look to us for protection, and when the damages for which they ask restitution were inflicted upon them because of their friendship and alliance with us?

I now desire, sir, to address myself to the amendment to which, in the first portion of my remarks, I made reference. It is an amendment relating to the Menomonee Indians of Wisconsin, and providing for additional compensation to them for certain lands that were purchased from them by the Government. The amendment reads:

"For additional compensation for the sale of their lands in the State of Wisconsin, by treaty of October 18th, 1848, $221,840, the same to be paid in such manner, with the approbation of said nation, as the President may think most advisable to their prosperity and happiness."

Mr. Chairman, I presume no gentleman of the committee desires to vote upon a proposition involving the expenditure of almost a quarter of a million of dollars, without knowing something about it. Hence, I hope to have the attention of the committee while I briefly explain that amendment. The Menomonees of Wisconsin were possessed of a large and valuable tract of land, surrounded and encroached upon by whites, which it was very desirable should be purchased by the Government for the purpose of being brought into market and cultivated. There were obstacles to a treaty, which had prevented one being made until 1848. In October, 1848—I will not be precise, though I have the date before me—a treaty was made. I desire to call the attention of members from Ohio to my subsequent remarks upon this subject, because, in pursuing its history, as detailed in the report of the Commissioner of Indian Affairs, dated April 23d, 1851, I shall necessarily be compelled to say some hard things, and allude to charges of a grave character against a gentleman of that State, and desire to avoid even the seeming of a disposition to prevent his friends here, in his absence, from making such defense of him as they may think is required. The gentleman to whom I allude is Mr. Medill. He was Commissioner of Indian Affairs in 1848, and was detailed as a special commissioner to negotiate a treaty with the Menomonees. We find by the record that, "As preliminary to the making of this treaty, the question was submitted to the Attorney General of the United States to determine the extent and quantity of the lands owned by these Indians. He gave an opinion on the 13th of September, 1848, in which he examined the several treaties previously made with the Menomonees, and the agreement between them and other tribes in relation to their boundaries."

"After this opinion of the Attorney General was given, the Secretary of War issued his instructions to the commissioner who was appointed to negotiate the treaty. These instructions were dated September 14th, 1848." These instructions told Mr. Medill, "The President is disposed to treat the Indians with kindness and liberality;" and, "if a treaty can be effected at a cost per acre of the estimated quantity of land within the limits suggested by the Attorney General, not exceeding that paid by the United States under the treaty with the Menomonees of September, 3, 1836, provide in the treaty for the purchase of all their claims to lands in Wisconsin, and stipulate for the payment of a sum not exceeding the same ratable price as in the same treaty above referred to; the quantity of land estimated to be within these limits, and to form the basis of calculation of price, is three millions twenty three thousand and eight hundred acres."

We are told by the Commissioner of Indian Affairs, (report April 23d, 1851,) that "Accompanying these instructions there was a map, prepared at the Topographical Bureau under the direction of this office, in accordance with the foregoing opinion of the Attorney General. The area marked out on the map as the Menomonee tract was estimated to contain the number of acres mentioned in the instructions, to wit, three million twenty-three thousand eight hundred acres."

We first, then, have reference to the treaty of 1836, to ascertain the price which he was authorized to pay, and we find it was a fraction more than eighteen cents an acre. With these instructions, with this knowledge that the amount of land was three millions twenty-three thousand eight hundred acres, and this map, he proceeded to Wisconsin. I desire to call the attention of the committee to another fact connected with this matter. Upon the map was laid down "a small lake that determined the course of one of the boundary lines" of the Menomonee lands. I call attention particularly to this "small lake," because it will figure again in the further history of the transaction. He convened the Indians, and asked them to sign a treaty—not ceding to the United States an "estimated quantity of land," at a certain "cost per acre"—but stating that, "The said Menomonee tribe of Indians agree to cede, and do hereby agree to cede, sell, and to relinquish to the United States all the lands in the State of Wisconsin, wherever situated." In consideration of which sweeping cession they were to receive $350,000.

We have seen that he went to Wisconsin with a knowledge that he was to treat for at least three millions twenty-three thousand eight hundred acres. We will now proceed to prove, that by his own admission, he discovered while there the possession of the Menomonees to be four million acres. In his report to the Secretary of War, dated December 12, 1848, he says:

"But I ascertained, while in the country, that there was an error in the map which was before the Attorney General, in relation to the location of a small lake that determined the course of one of the boundary lines, and which, if so corrected as to conform to the representations there made, would probably increase the number of acres which I was authorized to recognize as belonging to the Indians to about four millions."

And in his report for 1848-'49, to Congress as Commissioner of Indian Affairs, he speaks of the treaty as one by which the Menomonees "cede all their lands in Wisconsin, containing about four millions of acres."

With these instructions, and this knowledge of the amount of land he was about to purchase, let us next see what it is in proof he told the Indians. He "repeatedly told said Indians that their tract of land contained only about sixteen hundred thousand acres; that he was offering them more for the same than he was instructed by their great father to pay therefor." And that "the speeches of said Medill in said councils were filled with threats and menaces towards said Indians, by which means (in part) he was able to obtain (as he did) a signed treaty." And further, that "He told the nation he would not give them more than the $350,000 for said land, and threatened them with the authority of the United States, and its power to remove them at its pleasure, if they did not sign the said treaty."

"He threatened to degrade those of their chiefs who opposed the treaty, if they did not consent to the terms which he proposed; and declared that if they persisted in refusing to sign it, he would remove them, and appoint other chiefs who would sign it. Thus he induced some of their chiefs to sign said treaty from fear, and because they supposed that the United States would force them off their lands if they did not willingly sell and cede them."

And of the Indians, it is in proof that they "signed the treaty of October 18, 1848, under the belief that, should they refuse, the Government of the United States would violate their repeated pledges of protection, and send troops to force them to leave their homes."

And that "Osh Kosh, the head chief, said to his fellow-chiefs then in council: 'My friends, we cannot do otherwise; we are forced into it.'"

Mr. SWEETSER. I hope the gentleman will permit me to put a question to him. I desire to know upon what authority the gentleman makes this statement.

Mr. FITCH. Upon official authority from the Indian Bureau, made up in part of a record left by Mr. Medill when he left the Bureau. I quote mostly from such authority.

Mr. SWEETSER. I am not acquainted with the facts. I only ask that question.

Mr. FITCH. Desiring not to consume too much of the time of my friend from Arkansas, [Mr. JOHNSON,] I have condensed the history of this matter as much as possible; but have official authority for all the statements I have made relative to it—authority based upon Mr. Medill's record, the affidavits of fourteen witnesses, the written statement of one reverend gentleman, and of "two members of the Society of Friends." The correctness of the authority can scarcely be doubted—the credibility of the witnesses appears to be unimpeachable, and the facts as related appear to be incontrovertible, though there is a denial of the charges against Mr. Medill. This denial consists of statements, not affidavits, of five persons. To this denial I may again refer, time permitting. The testimony to sustain the facts which I have briefly mentioned and the statements I have quoted, is, in the language of the present Commissioner of Indian Affairs, "full and explicit upon all the alleged points of wrong and grievance," of which the Menomonees complain.

What is exhibited by the state of facts thus officially disclosed? Successful efforts upon the part of a Government functionary to procure by threats and fraudulent misrepresentations, from a feeble and friendly people, who have never shed the blood of an American citizen—who have never raised a tomahawk against us—a cession of what he knew to be near 2,500,000 acres of land, without any compensation!

The cession which Mr. Medill supposed to be 4,000,000 acres, was afterwards ascertained to contain 5,000,000 acres. The Indians, therefore, lost 3,500,000 acres, for which they have received no consideration. Was this treating them with the "kindness and liberality" contemplated in President Polk's instructions?

It is not to be wondered—no, it should have been expected, that the Indians would appeal from the terms of such a treaty, forced upon them in such manner. They accordingly did appeal. A deputation of their chiefs came to this city, and appealed to the President from the wrong and outrage perpetrated upon them. They asked that the treaty of the 18th of October, 1848, should be construed to cede, on their part, only 3,023,800 acres to the United States, or that a new treaty should be made. They desired something approximating to the value of their lands. The Commissioner of Indian Affairs does not deem it expedient to grant either request, for reasons which, in justice to my friend from Arkansas, [Mr. JOHNSON,] I cannot enumerate, as it would encroach too much upon his time, but which will be found in the report of the Commissioner, to which I have before alluded, of April 23, 1851. He recommends compensating them for the amount of land which Mr. Medill was expected, under his instructions, to purchase of them at the price of 1836, the price he was expected to pay. Strict justice, it appears to me, would require us to pay that price per acre for the 5,000,000 acres; but the Department having the matter under charge, and presumed to have a more full and correct understanding of it than we can, think and recommend otherwise, and the committee of which I am a member acquiesces in that recommendation.

We therefore propose, by the amendment I shall offer, to pay $221,840, that being the balance due for 3,023,800 acres at the price of 1836—18 99-100 cents per acre. With this amount the Commissioner believes the Indians will be content; and it is the least a decent regard for honor and justice will permit us to pay. Its payment is recommended not only by the Commissioner of Indian Affairs, but the recommendation is repeated by the Secretary of the Interior, with the sanction of the President, all of them having examined the matter. It therefore stands upon a footing upon which scarcely ever a claim of that extent and character was before placed; for whatever we on this side of the House may say of Mr. Fillmore's political opinions—however heterodox we may and do esteem them, and whatever political sins may result from them—we have yet to hear his personal honesty questioned. If there be any one disposed to do it, he has yet to speak, and even then candor compels me to say, that I should very probably question the veracity of the witness. The claim, then, comes before us after full investigation by these parties. Their recommendation has been submitted to the committee of which I am a member, and that committee instructed me to offer the amendment which I will offer at the proper place.

Mr. OLDS. With the consent of the gentleman from Indiana, I desire to remark, that I am not a personal friend of Colonel Medill, and should not feel called upon to notice this seeming attack upon his official conduct, were it not that he is a constituent of mine. The gentleman speaks, as he says, from the record of the Indian Bureau. I ask him to state if the same record does not show that Colonel Medill, at the time of his negotiation with the Wisconsin Indians, had no knowledge of there being a greater quantity than the 1,600,000 acres paid for by his treaty with them?

Mr. FITCH. Quite the contrary. The record shows that he had full knowledge of the ownership by the Menomonees of at least 3,023,800 acres, and that he subsequently learned on the spot where and when he was negotiating the treaty, that the amount was 4,000,000 acres.

Mr. SWEETSER. I understand the gentleman to say, in the beginning of his remarks, that the Attorney General had his attention called to the state of the Territory, and had made an estimate, with which Mr. Medill proceeded to Wisconsin, and upon which he acted. I understand the gentleman to say distinctly, that that statement disclosed the amount of vacant unsold land belonging to the Menomonees, and upon that he makes the charge upon Mr. Medill, that he could not be ignorant of the fact. Now, I wish to put the further question, whether there is disclosed in the Department, or anywhere, any conceivable motive, on the part of Mr. Medill, to deceive these Indians? If so, let it go to the country.

Mr. FITCH. I have said nothing of his motives. I know nothing of them. Motives are not what the committee referred to me to investigate. It was acts and their result. Motives can only color the act, they cannot change the result.

Mr. CHANDLER. I ask the gentleman whether he is satisfied that we have received more land than we have paid for, without regard to the fraud or mistake on the part of the commissioner?

Mr. FITCH. We have; and the committee place the application for additional compensation upon that ground. The Indians consented to the treaty, which ceded more land than they were told they possessed. They were not deceived by being so told in regard to the amount of land which they possessed. They knew it was more than was represented; but threats, and fear of losing all their land without any compensation, unless they assented to the treaty, induced them to do so. We paid them by the treaty for less than two million acres, and received 5,000,000 or more.

Mr. CHANDLER. Then, as the guardians of the Indians, and as honest men, we have nothing to do but to pay for what we actually got.

Mr. FREEMAN. I desire to ask the gentleman from Indiana one question. I understood him to say that the Indians were fully aware, at the time they signed the treaty, that they owned this additional quantity of land. By what power did Medill force these Indians to sign that treaty?

Mr. FITCH. He told the chiefs, in the first place, that if they would not sign the treaty, he would degrade them and appoint others in their stead. The chiefs knew his power and position, for these Indians are intelligent men. He likewise told them that if the tribe prevented the perfection of the treaty, he would employ military force to drive them out of the country. It was the power of threats, then, by which they were made to sign the treaty.

Mr. STANTON, of Tennessee. Allow me to ask whether Colonel Medill denies having made use of these threats?

Mr. FITCH. I do not know. No denial by him is before the Indian Committee, or referred to by the Bureau.

Mr. JOHNSON, of Arkansas. There is a denial by certain witnesses, to which the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. FITCH] has previously referred.

Mr. FITCH. Certainly; and I thank the gentleman from Arkansas for calling my attention to those witnesses again, or in my anxiety to encroach no further upon his time, I should have omitted any further allusion to their evidence. The denial, to which the gentleman from Arkansas refers, consists of written statements (not sworn to) of five individuals. Two of these, I believe, were Indian sub-agents. Certainly one was, and he appears to be the principal one—William H. Bruce. The name is one with which the House is probably familiar. He figured in the recent deficiency bill as a defaulter to the amount of some $33,000, and under circumstances which should destroy his credibility, even if he was a man of veracity before. It appears to have been through him that the statements of the other four persons were obtained, at least they were forwarded to the Indian Bureau by him. With a reiteration of what I have before said, that the application for additional compensation is based not upon charges against Mr. Medill, or any motive which may have governed his acts, but upon their result, upon the fact that by his treaty the Indians were paid for less than two million acres while they were made to cede five millions, I surrender the floor to the gentleman from Arkansas, with thanks for his courtesy.

Mr. JOHNSON, of Arkansas. There is no statement of Mr. Medill, whether he denies having made use of the threats or not, but we must presume he does.

The gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. CHANDLER] asked whether or not we have got land which we did not pay for; and he came to the conclusion that if we have, and from Indians that were at our mercy, it ought to be paid for. Every one will agree to that proposition. Well, the object of this amendment is to pay for what we got, over and above what we have paid for. We are called upon to come to a conclusion, whether it is true that we did get more than we paid for, from the facts of the case.

Mr. FITCH. Will my friend from Arkansas allow me to state that there is an Executive recommendation to pay the Indians the difference? The amount of land estimated by the Attorney General at the time Medill went out, was three million and odd thousand acres; but it was subsequently ascertained, and Medill knew it, that it was four millions of acres.

Mr. JOHNSON. That we got more land than we paid for, cannot be said legally. It is not correct legally, because the treaty defines in the description of the land sold, all the land that they possess. But what is the fact, in truth and justice, with reference to this transaction between these Menomonees and the Government of the United States? Sir, it was difficult to determine what land these Indians were entitled to, and what were the boundaries of their territory. All the facts were accordingly collected from various previous treaties with the tribe, and the whole matter was referred to the Attorney General of the United States to settle the law points involved, and to determine carefully what in truth were their boundaries. The decision of the Attorney General exposed an amount of land in their possession, and belonging to them, of 3,023,000 acres. Armed with these documents and this decision, Mr. Medill started for the Indian territory, as a special commissioner, to make a treaty with this tribe. Well, sir, when he got there, he discovered that there was an error, and that the land which the Indians had amounted to 4,000,000 of acres, as he stated in his own report, instead of 3,023,000. He reported this when he came back, and spoke of it with pride, that in the transaction with the Indians, he had got the whole 4,000,000 of acres for $350,000. Well, sir, it turns out, on surveying the land, and on putting it into our surveyor general's land office, in plats marked out by the chain and compass, that we got 5,000,000 of acres from the Indians.

Now, sir, what were the instructions given to this commissioner when he was sent out to make this treaty? Those instructions from President Polk were, that he should give to these Indians for their lands not exceeding what had been paid to them for another portion of their land, under a treaty of 1836. The rate which was paid then, if paid for 3,023,000 acres which the Attorney General estimated the Indians to possess, would have amounted to upwards of $571,000. Well, sir, Mr. Medill goes out and buys the whole of the land owned by the Indians, and in conformity with those instructions, he makes a treaty and gives them $350,000. For what? For 3,023,000 acres? No, sir; but for all the land they had, which turns out to have been 5,000,000 acres. But that is not all. It is charged by the Indians, that Mr. Medill exhibited maps to them, and represented to them that they had not more than 1,600,000 acres. What is there in this transaction, aside from all the oral testimony, which goes to prove that that representation was made? There is this, (and if it be not the evidence of truth, it is one of the most remarkable coincidences that ever occurred, or, as some might consider it, a piece of circumstantial testimony more conclusive than direct proof of the fact, and it is this,) that taking the instruction to pay a given sum—say about nineteen cents per acre—for the 3,023,000 acres which it was estimated the Indians possessed, it would have amounted to upwards of $571,000; but if you estimate it, you will find that $350,000, which he agreed to pay, was precisely, leaving off about $40,000, what he was authorized to pay if the quantity of land had been 1,600,000 acres instead of 3,023,800 acres; and the $40,000, which makes up about the $350,000, is expressly set apart for the half-breeds, whose aid was essential to him.

Now, I mean to convince you that it was represented to the Indians that they had only one million six hundred thousand acres, and that they made the treaty on that representation. I do not speak of it as a point of dishonor to Mr. Medill. Indeed, it may be regarded by many as a skillful piece of diplomacy for the service of this Government, and that it was faithful service; but was it honorable for a powerful nation? Certainly, it is a most singular coincidence that the amount agreed to be paid would almost precisely come up to the amount authorized by the instructions, if the amount of land had been one million six hundred thousand acres. Is it not, then, reasonable to suppose that the land was bought from the Indians as one million six hundred thousand acres? It all may be right, or it all may be wrong. This amendment is for the purpose of paying for the whole amount of land supposed at the time to be theirs. If we take the five million acres from these Indians for $350,000, they may indeed say that their great father has certainly driven a very hard bargain with them.

Mr. SWEETSER. With the permission of the gentleman from Arkansas, I desire to ask whether these Indians, prior to the ratification of this treaty by the Senate, sent in any protest against the ratification, showing the fraud now represented to have been perpetrated upon them by the commissioner?

Mr. JOHNSON. I know that the Christian part of this same tribe represented these things here, but how soon after this treaty I am unable now to say.

Mr. OLDS. As I stated before, my relations with Colonel Medill are not friendly; but as his representative, I feel authorized to put in a disclaimer against these charges. Colonel Medill is regarded by those who know him as an honorable man. I have known him often accused by his political enemies, but never before by his political friends. Allow me to say that the evidence now adduced against him, although introduced here by the political friends of Colonel Medill, nevertheless is furnished by his political enemies. I am not myself familiar enough with the affairs of the Indian Bureau to attempt his justification. This, however, is not the first attempt that has been made by the political enemies of Colonel Medill to assail his administration of Indian affairs. He triumphantly vindicated himself before, and I think I may venture to pledge him to do so again. I trust I may ask the indulgence of this House and the public to suspend any condemnation of Colonel Medill until they have heard his version of this transaction. I am confident that, after hearing his statement, they will acquit him of any dishonorable motives.

Mr. JOHNSON. I desire to say, that to make up a judgment against Mr. Medill, when there is evidence furnished on the record to prove that he was not guilty of this fraud, without a hearing, would be doing him total and entire injustice. I say that there is testimony on the record that goes to repel all these charges.

Mr. PHELPS. There is the evidence of Morgan L. Martin.

Mr. JOHNSON. Morgan L. Martin is one, and there are three or four others. I will not charge Mr. Medill with having done these things and with having defrauded the Indians; but I will at the same time say, that it is plain we have got five millions of acres of land for $350,000. If, sir, we got 5,000,000 of acres of the land of this tribe of Indians for $350,000, it is an outrage in the sight of God and man. We will not give up the land, but hang to it like grim death, and rob the Indians of all their land.

Mr. STANTON, of Tennessee. I only desire to say, that from a personal acquaintance with Colonel Medill for a long time, I believe him to be totally incapable of perpetrating a fraud such as that represented; but at the same time we all know that he is a gentleman who from the best of motives would endeavor to drive the best bargain he could. It seems to me that without imputing any fraud to Colonel Medill, it is perfectly clear from the statements which have been made here, and which I presume to be correct, that a great mistake was made on both sides.

Mr. JOHNSON. That is exactly the conclusion I come to. In order to obtain relief in this matter, it is not necessary to prove that there must have been absolutely fraud and misrepresentation committed.

Mr. CAMPBELL, of Ohio. Will the gentleman permit me to interrupt him?

Mr. JOHNSON. Not till I have finished my sentence. I want to get out this idea, for I deal in ideas, one at a time, and do not wish them confounded. [Laughter.] I say it is not necessary for any man to suppose that there must have been fraud or misrepresentation in the matter, such as to dishonor a man in the slightest degree. I have not made these charges myself, nor will I do so, because I should want to see most conclusive proof before I would charge a man with such a crime. But the bill states the facts of the case, and they are ample enough to satisfy us that those Indians have been dealt most harshly by upon our part—that they have got nothing, and that we have robbed them of what we in Congress are all daily fighting over, as the greatest boon and richest blessing man can have.

Mr. CAMPBELL. As Colonel Medill is a resident of the State which I in part represent, I will state that these disclosures have somewhat surprised me, and I would suggest, as a way of getting along with this business, that my colleague from the Circleville district [Mr. OLDS] should embrace this inquiry in the resolution which he has been trying to get before the House for a long time in reference to the Gardiner claim. [Laughter.]

Mr. JOHNSON, of Arkansas. Oh, I cannot give way for these little disputes—gentlemen can never come that game upon me.

Mr. OLDS. I ask the gentleman to allow me to say one word?

Mr. JOHNSON. I cannot tolerate this. It will not do. [Laughter.]

Mr. OLDS. When I made the charge against Mr. Corwin, my colleague, as the immediate representative of Mr. Corwin, pledged him to call for an investigation; since which nothing has been heard from him. I have pledged Colonel Medill to make a full vindication of his administration of the Indian Bureau. We shall now see which will come up to the scratch.

Mr. JOHNSON. I have every disposition to be courteous, but I cannot stand this at all. [Laughter.]

I will leave that proposition, and I beg the attention of the House to another somewhat remarkable case.

I am come to a case in relation to which I procured all the facts and statements from the Department of Indian Affairs. It is from that Department that we have derived the facts in reference to all these cases. We have demanded of them, in every case where there has been a matter before us for inquiry, to investigate the matter fully from their own files, at the expense of the Government, and present us with all the facts, so that the Committee on Indian Affairs, and the House of Representatives, may have the fullest and fairest chance possible to judge in the case. I will now present a case where we have all the facts before us. I have a bundle of papers connected with it, large enough, in all conscience, and which I have made the basis of an amendment which I will send to the Clerk, and ask to have read. [A copy of the amendment was not procured.]

That the committee may understand more clearly, I will state a proposition, which has to be demonstrated, and the facts will demonstrate it. It is this: The United States made a treaty with one portion of a tribe of Indians, by which they sold them a certain portion of territory, defined by lines and bounds, and received a consideration in full for it, pledging ourselves to give them a title and patent in fee for all of it. Six years after that, the United States sold one hundred thousand acres of the same land to another portion of the same tribe, and received a consideration for it, for which we were to give to that portion of the tribe, also, a fee simple title, and give them, too, a patent for it.

Now, there are two questions which arise: Are not the United States bound to return the consideration which they received from the last sale, to the latter part of the tribe, and which portion of the tribe should it be paid over to? Both portions of the tribe occupy all the land first sold, and they live together like a band of brothers. They are the Shawnee Indians, and the best civilized portion of the Indians. I repeat, the question which now arises is, are not the United States bound to refund the money she received from the second sale of the same land? Now, in view of these facts, can any man rise in this House and contend that it is not right that the Government of the United States should return the consideration which she thus obtained of the ignorant Indian under false pretenses?

There is one proposition. There is another which originates in it, and it is this: As the first portion of the tribe purchased all of the land upon which the whole tribe are now located, and as they have received the second portion of the tribe with them upon that land, whether it is not right that the consideration to be refunded by the United States should not be paid to the first portion? We have brought in this amendment so as to provide that the entire fund obtained by the Government on the second sale of the same land, should be refunded to the Indians, and should be paid over in money; and the Committee on Indian Affairs have determined that it shall not be paid to either portion of the tribe separately, but that it shall be paid to the whole tribe. This is a succinct statement of the whole case. I beg leave to read to the House this document which I hold in my hand, with some commentary upon it, in order to make it more plain. It is short, and if this House is disposed to do justice, there will be interest enough manifested to hear it read.

With some parts of this report I do not concur. I think they are not consistent with a just conclusion from the facts of the case, but I will point them out as I go on. It is from the Secretary of the Interior. It is dated the 6th of July, 1852, only a few days ago. It was completed first in April last; but some errors were discovered in it, and I returned it for correction, and it now comes dated only a few days ago. It says:

"I have the honor to transmit to the Committee on Indian Affairs of the House of Representatives the accompanying papers, relating to a claim of the Shawnees of Ohio, in which I find the facts to be as follows:

"On the 4th of January, 1793, Baron Carondelet, in behalf of the Spanish Government, gave permission by grant to Lewis Laramie to settle with the Delawares and Shawnees within the province of Louisiana, upon the right banks of the Mississippi river, from the Missouri to the Arkansas, with the understanding that the lands selected were to be considered as vacated upon their removal therefrom."

They were to have the lands so long as they lived upon them, but it was to be considered vacant as soon as they removed from it.

"By virtue of this grant, a tract of land near Cape Girardeau, twenty-five miles square, was taken possession of by the two tribes, who, for a time, occupied it jointly, but in the year 1815 the Delawares abandoned it, leaving the Shawnees the sole occupants.

"In the sixth section of the treaty made by the United States with France on the 30th of April, 1803, by which the Province of Louisiana was added to the United States, it was stipulated that such treaties and articles as existed between Spain and any Indian tribe should be observed by the United States."

Now we come directly to that portion which relates to the matter of dispute, and I ask your especial attention:

"On the 7th of November, 1825, the United States entered into a treaty with these Indians by the name of the Shawnees of Missouri, by which the latter ceded and relinquished to the former the lands abovementioned, in consideration of a gift to them, and those of the same name in Ohio, who might thereafter emigrate to the west of the Mississippi, of a tract equal in extent to fifty miles square, situated west of the Mississippi, and designated by metes and bounds; with the proviso, that if, upon exploration, said lands should not, by a delegation of the tribe, be deemed suitable, an equal extent of territory should be assigned them on the Kansas river, west of the boundary of the Missouri.

"It was finally determined to settle them on the Kansas, and the Missouri Shawnees were removed there in 1828."

It will be perceived at once that fifty miles square on the Kansas river was bought and paid for by the Missouri Shawnees, and the United States got the lands which the Missouri Indians had occupied, between the Missouri and Arkansas rivers, near Cape Girardeau.

"There is no evidence to show that this tribe was, until this time, associated in any manner with the Shawnees of Ohio, who, as a separate and distinct tribe, were dwelling upon lands of their own, in a distinct region."

This last sentence of the report is all nonsense, and not worth the reading. The two tribes spoke the same language; the one provided for the other by a treaty, and there are other important intrinsic facts which show they were the same, and divided perhaps years before by some unfortunate intestine feud. Schoolcraft would tell a different tale in his Indian History and Statistics.

"One of the stipulations of the treaty of 1825 was, that the lands in question should be conveyed by patent, in fee-simple, to the Missouri Shawnees." By patent in fee-simple, these fifty miles were secured to the Shawnees. "This provision was complied with on the 11th May, 1844," during Mr. Tyler's administration, for the first time. There was the treaty standing unperformed all the time from 1825 to 1844, during all of which time they were entitled to a patent in fee-simple. "The provision was complied with on the 11th of May, 1844, when a patent was issued to them," following the conditions of the treaty. It conveyed the fifty miles square of land on the Kansas to the Shawnees of Missouri, for themselves "and those of the same nation" who were residing in Ohio, subject to the right secured to the "Ohio band of Shawnees." Now, these two bands of Shawnees had been separated for many years—we do not know how long. But there is, we see, a provision made in the treaty of 1825, with the Missouri Shawnees, though separated hundreds of miles from the Ohio Shawnees, by which fifty miles square should be conveyed to the Missouri Shawnees for their benefit, and the joint benefit of the Ohio Shawnees, whenever they should remove west of the Mississippi. But "this right," that is, the right of the Ohio Shawnees so called, "as will appear hereafter, was only a right of occupancy, (so says this report,) no consideration passing from them." The Ohio Shawnees paid nothing for the right, it is true. "They were at the time living in the State of Ohio, on lands owned by them, in their own exclusive right." But by the treaty of 1825, they were provided for, and by the language of the treaty, as well as the patent, they have a full interest in the fee, and cannot be forced out of it by the action of the Missouri Shawnees.

Now, sir, we come to the other band, the Ohio Shawnees. "On the 8th of August, 1831, the United States executed a treaty with the Shawnees of Ohio, by which they agreed to grant to this 'division of the tribe, by patent in fee-simple to them,' as the language of the treaty expressly says, 'and to their heirs forever, as long as they shall exist as a nation, and remain upon the same, a tract of land to contain one hundred thousand acres, within the tract of land equal to fifty miles square which, as above-mentioned, had been before granted to the Shawnees of Missouri.'" This is the treaty of 1831. "The consideration to the United States of the cession of the said hundred thousand acres on the Kansas, was the lands 'owned or claimed by them in the State of Ohio.'" These lands the United States received from the Indians, in consideration of conveying lands to the Indians; lands which they (the United States) had already sold, and in which these Indians already had an interest, although they did not know it, secured to them through their brethren of Missouri in the treaty of 1825, from whom, at that time, they were widely separated, and of whose existence even they may have been ignorant.

Thus these Ohio Shawnees ceded all the lands they had in Ohio, and the consideration paid by the United States was one hundred thousand acres of land which the United States had already sold, and already received pay for, and which they thus sold a second time. A singular position this—for a people to sell a second time what they had already sold, and receive pay a second time for what they had already received pay for, and to a part of the same people who had paid for it in the first place, and who owned it, and had a joint fee-simple interest in it at the very time it was a second time purchased.

Now, if there is any conscience among men—any honor in the Government—and I have doubted whether there could be an element of that character reckoned upon in this soulless corporation—after I have seen men, intrusted so highly as we are here, vote in the way I have seen them vote upon matters of this character—I say if there is any conscience among men—any honor in the Government, the consideration a second time paid to the United States, and now lying in your Treasury, must be paid to these people.

[Here the hammer fell.]

Mr. PHELPS here obtained the floor.

Mr. JOHNSON. Will the gentleman allow me a few words more in explanation. I will occupy but a few moments, I assure him.

Mr. PHELPS. I will yield for a few moments.

Mr. JOHNSON. I will then proceed, and I will comment no longer upon that kind of spirit which, out of mere suspicion as to whether a measure is right or not, will not examine to see whether it is right, and, from mere suspicion, will vote dishonor upon the escutcheon of the nation itself. I will make no further remarks about that, but continue with the statement in this paper. "It was also stipulated, that if there should not be a sufficiency of good land unoccupied by the Shawnee Indians," those already on the Kansas river, "those who had already settled on the tract, then the one hundred thousand acres thereby granted to the Shawnees of Ohio should be located on land contiguous." If they had taken the one hundred thousand acres of land contiguous, then there would have been some consideration for the lands they had ceded to the United States in Ohio. They went over among their brethren after this, and found their brethren ready to receive them with open arms. They settled down amongst them, and intermarried, and they are one people. Their interests are common, their friendships and affections are altogether. They have settled, and are at home there, and live upon the rights which were secured to them under the treaty of 1825 with the old original Cape Girardeau Shawnees. They have never thought of taking the lands contiguous.

"The United States further agree, that upon the sale of the lands in Ohio, the proceeds of those lands, after deducting seventy cents per acre, the cost of survey, and certain improvements, shall constitute a five per centum fund for the future necessities of the tribe."

The United States was to reserve seventy cents per acre, so that there can be no difficulty in making the estimate of what is the true consideration paid over. The whole of those lands have been surveyed and sold, as the records of the General Land Office show.

"When the lands in Ohio were surveyed, there were found to be 96,051 acres, which have been sold by this Government for $126,551. The cost of the sale and the improvements mentioned in the treaty, amounted to $21,005 40, which, together with the seventy cents per acre, was deducted from the aggregate amount received for the land in Ohio bought from the Indians, and the remaining sum of $39,300 18, now constitute a fund upon which five per cent. per annum is paid by the United States for the use of the Ohio Shawnees." All they ever got out of what their lands actually brought, was $39,000, and the seventy cents per acre was what the United States got from them, without giving them one cent of consideration for it.

"The aggregate amount of seventy cents per acre, which was deducted from the sum received for the land, is $66,246 23, and remains in the Treasury," and is the amount of money which, by the amendment I shall offer to the Indian appropriation bill, is asked shall be refunded to the Shawnee Indians.

Now, sir, the question is, how shall it be refunded? The Ohio Shawnees, as it is claimed by their agents here, or was claimed, demand that they shall receive it, because it was for their lands. But the Missouri Shawnees say that they have furnished the consideration in this fifty miles square, which the United States was bound to furnish, and demand the consideration which the United States received for it. If we pay over the amount to the Ohio Shawnees, the Missouri Shawnees might well come forward and say to the United States, "We furnished the land, and we demand the money which you received, as an equitable settlement, if, indeed, it be not a legal right; and thus you may have to pay it over again." It would be at least a troublesome case for a kind heart or a tender conscience. If, upon the other hand, we pay it to the Missouri Shawnees, the Ohio Shawnees may say, "That under the treaty of 1825, though it is true we paid nothing for it, still our joint rights were provided and secured in the fifty miles square. 'It was our land you got for nothing in Ohio. Your payments to the Missouri Shawnees are made in your own wrong, and we make our demand.'" Thus we might have to pay to them this sum again. Therefore it is that I have offered the amendment in the way I have, after full consultation, "for the payment to the Shawnees (embracing the whole tribe) of the moneys due to them under and by virtue of the treaties of the 7th of November, 1825, and the 8th of August, 1831, between the United States and said tribe of Indians, the amount being $66,246 23," with a proviso, however, that the said tribe of Indians shall first express their assent to this method of settlement, and that the payment of the above sum, equally to the whole tribe, shall be satisfactory in discharge of this debt by the United States. If we pay it to one tribe we may have to pay it to the other. Their rights stand equally balanced, and we should pay it equally among them all, and not until they express their assent that it shall be so received by them, in satisfaction of the debt.

Now, Mr. Chairman, I will not trespass longer upon the time of my friend, [Mr. PHELPS,] and will yield the floor.

Mr. PHELPS. Mr. Chairman, I would not have sought the floor to address the committee, were it not that charges have been made by two members of the Committee on Indian Affairs against a gentleman whom I have always esteemed as a faithful officer and as an honorable man. I knew Wm. Medill when he was Commissioner of Indian Affairs.

Mr. JOHNSON, of Arkansas. You say charges by two members. I have not charged. I cast no imputation against him, because I expressly said that the facts were there, and I would not permit myself to draw a conclusion, or to make a charge, knowing that he had no chance to be heard.

Mr. PHELPS. Then it is to avoid inferences which may be drawn by persons who may read the remarks of my friends from Indiana and Arkansas that censure is due Colonel Medill in the negotiating of this treaty.

Mr. FITCH. If there be a charge made in stating the evidence of the Indian Bureau, communicated in part by Mr. Medill himself, and part by others, in full, the charge has been made.

Mr. PHELPS. I take the position, looking to the documents before me, that Colonel Medill is fully exonerated from practicing any fraud upon the Menomonees in the negotiation of the treaty of 1848. But it is true I have not before me the official documents, by which I mean, the letters and other evidence on file in the office of the Commissioner of Indian Affairs. I have, however, the annual report of the Commissioner of Indian Affairs made to the Secretary of the Interior, wherein he introduces and refers to extracts taken from the evidence on both sides. The gentleman from Indiana [Mr. FITCH] took occasion to refer to the character of Mr. Bruce, whose letter is upon file fully exonerating the Commissioner of Indian Affairs from any misrepresentation to the Menomonee Indians at the time of the negotiation of the treaty. With regard to the character of Mr. Bruce, perhaps the gentleman from Indiana and myself will not disagree. But were there not other men—honorable men—who filled and who are filling high and responsible stations in the country, who gave the same testimony Mr. Bruce gave? I will refer to one gentleman, Hon. Morgan L. Martin, who was a Delegate from the Territory of Wisconsin, and with whom I served here in the Twenty-ninth Congress. He was the president, I believe, of the convention which framed the constitution of the State of Wisconsin, and he also had the confidence of the administration of Mr. Polk, for he was appointed commissioner to negotiate treaties with the Indians. He testifies in relation to this matter, that the representations to which the gentleman from Indiana refers as having been made to the Indians at that time, were not made, and that he was present at the time of the negotiation of the treaty.

Mr. FITCH. If the gentleman will allow me, I will state a distinction between their statements.

Mr. PHELPS. One is a letter, and the other is sworn to.

Mr. FITCH. The statements the gentleman refers to, of the position of the Christian party, are mere statements. The charge is sustained by ten gentlemen under oath. There is a very broad distinction.

Mr. PHELPS. I am willing to that. But first, Mr. Chairman, let us refer to the instructions given to Colonel Medill, when he was appointed the commissioner to negotiate this treaty with the Menomonees. There was a controversy as to the extent of their rights—some contending their territory was less than 2,000,000 acres; but upon a reference of this matter to the Attorney General of the United States, he stated that he was of the opinion there were upwards of 3,000,000 acres of land to which the Menomonees had a title. That was then assumed as the basis upon which the treaty was to be negotiated. The Attorney General said they had title to 3,023,800 acres of land. I will now read the following extract from the instructions given to Colonel Medill by the then Secretary of War, under whose jurisdiction Colonel Medill at that time was:

"In consequence of the conflict and confusion as to the true boundaries of the Menomonee country within the limits of the State of Wisconsin, I have taken the opinion of the Attorney General of the United States on the subject, and inclose to you a copy for your information. The President is disposed to treat the Indians with kindness and liberality; and while the extreme claims of the Menomonees to territory already purchased by the United States from the Chippewas and Winnebagoes cannot be recognized; you may, if a treaty can be effected at a cost per acre of the estimated quantity of land within the limits suggested by the Attorney General, not exceeding that paid by the United States under the treaty with the Menomonees of September 3d, 1836, provide in the treaty for the purchase of all their claims to lands in Wisconsin, and stipulate for the payment of a sum not exceeding the same ratable price as in the same treaty above referred to; the quantity of land estimated to be within these limits, and to form the basis of your calculation of price, is three millions twenty-three thousand and eight hundred acres."

The instructions to the commissioner then were positive that he must assume there were three million twenty-three thousand eight hundred acres of land, to which the Menomonees had a title, as the basis upon which the treaty was to be made. He could not, under the instructions given him by his superior officers, recognize any right in the Menomonees to an excess over that quantity. The instructions were, that he might allow a price not exceeding that which had been paid to the Menomonees per acre by the treaty of September 3d, 1836. We have only this extract from the instructions to that commissioner, but, as a matter of course, the instructions which have always been given by the Secretary of War, when the Commissioner of Indian Affairs was under the jurisdiction of that Department, and by the Secretary of the Interior since it has been placed under the jurisdiction of his Department, are, that you shall not give exceeding a certain amount. Furthermore, the instructions are generally directed to the purchase of the land at a low price, and not for $1 25 per acre; for there is no land we have purchased from the Indians that we have paid $1 25 per acre for. The price has varied from three to fifty cents per acre. Recently a treaty was negotiated with Indians living within the Territory of Minnesota, represented by my friend before me, for the purchase of certain land. I do not know the price they were paid, but I have no doubt the Delegate will inform us.

Mr. SIBLEY. They were paid a little over ten cents per acre—between ten and eleven.

Mr. PHELPS. Large tracts of land within the limits of Minnesota Territory have been negotiated for by the present Commissioner of Indian Affairs, and purchased at a price not far from ten cents per acre, just about the same price stipulated to be paid the Menomonees by the treaty of 1848.

Mr. FITCH here made a remark entirely inaudible to the Reporter.

Mr. PHELPS. Upon the basis given him in his instructions for the treaty, he could not recognize an excess, because he was instructed by the Secretary of War to assume that they had title to 3,023,800 acres of land; and he paid $350,000 for the tracts which he did purchase from the Menomonees. The Commissioner of Indian Affairs remarks as follows:

"Some controversy had arisen in relation to the extent and boundaries of the country owned by these people, the principal chief claiming nearly eight millions of acres, whilst the Department conceded to them a much less quantity. The matter was referred to the Attorney General, who, upon a full examination of the numerous treaties heretofore made, as well with this as the various other tribes which formerly inhabited that region of country, gave an elaborate and satisfactory opinion on the subject. I was accordingly limited in the recognition of their rights, as will be seen by the letter of instructions, to 3,023,800 acres, and to the same rate of compensation therefor which was paid for the land acquired from the same tribe by the treaty of 1836."

He acted within his instructions, and received the approval of the Secretary of War and of the President of the United States for his conduct in that negotiation. The treaty was subsequently ratified by the Senate. When did you hear the charges of fraud and misrepresentation? I say they are made by some traders or half-breeds, who desire to receive more of the money of the Government. The statement was made under oath, I will say, that some of these persons charged the commissioner had represented to them at the time of the negotiation, that they owned but 1,600,000 acres of land, and that he threatened, unless they signed the treaty presented to them, he would disgrace some of their chiefs—that he would depose them and install others into their position. These are the representations which have been made by these half-breeds and traders, who are living with the Menomonees. Who were present when the treaty was executed? There were present gentlemen of character and standing, whose letters are as much a guarantee of truth, contained over their signatures, as the oath of an employee of an Indian trader or a half-breed.

By reputation I have some knowledge of the character of the half-breeds and of a class of white men who resort to the Indian country. You have heard the Commissioner of Indian Affairs charge that when money was to be disbursed to the Indians that they were defrauded of the rights by white men. The charges of misrepresentation are made by this class of men against Colonel Medill. One of the gentlemen who speak of the complaints made by the Indians about the manner of the negotiating of this treaty denominates them a "issue of cunning fabrication"—"looks upon it as a scheme to get money out of the Treasury." Of the character of Mr. Bruce, as I have already stated, I have nothing to say. Of Morgan L. Martin I have already spoken. The member upon this floor representing his district is well aware of his character and high standing. I will also refer to A. G. Ellis, a gentleman with whom I have no personal acquaintance. I find that A. G. Ellis and M. L. Martin, were by Mr. Polk's administration appointed commissioners to negotiate treaties with the Stockbridge and other tribes of Indians residing in the Northwest Territory. A. G. Ellis was a witness to the negotiation of this treaty, and at that time an Indian sub-agent. I have before me the treaty signed by Colonel Medill as commissioner, and by the Indians, and signed and sealed in the presence of Albert G. Ellis, Morgan L. Martin, Samuel Ryan, and several other gentlemen. The present Commissioner of Indian Affairs reporting upon this case refers to some of the testimony. I will read the statement of the testimony of these gentlemen in connection with that of Mr. Bruce:

"William H. Bruce, the sub-agent, to whom a copy of the petition had been transmitted by this office, states that he was present at the making of the treaty, and denies that anything derogatory to the character of the gentlemen employed in making it took place. He adds, if a mistake was made by Mr. Medill, it was owing to the maps before him. He also submits—

"1st. A letter from the Hon. M. L. Martin, in which it is stated that he (Mr. Martin) was present with Commissioner Medill at the making of the treaty, and that every charge, either direct or by implication, against the latter, of improper conduct, is destitute of truth.

"2d. A letter from A. G. Ellis, in which it is stated that the charges against Mr. Medill are gratuitous and malicious; that the latter exhibited great kindness and patience to, and used no concealment with, the Indians; that the opposition to the treaty came, not from the Indians, but from the half-breeds, the traders, and their missionary.

"3d. The deposition of Samuel Ryan, which sustains the foregoing; and,

"4th. A letter from Colonel Francis Lee, United States Army, in which he says, with some facts to give plausibility to the whole, the petition of the Christian party is a tissue of cunning fabrication; looks upon it as a scheme to get money out of the Treasury."

Now, these are the witnesses who testify to the conduct of Colonel Medill at the time this treaty was negotiated. We have the testimony of a Lieutenant Colonel of the Army of the United States, who can have no inducement to misrepresent. He has no personal interest at stake. His profession calls him to maintain and defend the honor and the rights of this nation. The station he occupies stamps with truth every assertion he makes. He would as soon falsify his oath as to make a statement under his hand that is untrue. It is only for the purpose of presenting this testimony in relation to the conduct of Colonel Medill at the time these negotiations took place with the Menomonees—it is to remove the inference of any improper conduct on the part of Mr. Medill, from the charges which have been made here, tending to inculpate and censure him, or cast even a shadow of suspicion upon him, that I am induced at this time to refer to these things. I regret that I did not know this matter was coming up. I am sorry that either myself or some gentleman from the State of Ohio had not been furnished with this evidence for the purpose of making a more complete defense of Mr. Medill's character—knowing him, as I do, to be a noble and honest man, and a faithful officer—one who has sought the interests of the Government, and, as I believe, those of the Indians also, and which can be easily shown by reference to the public documents of the country. For five years I had a personal acquaintance with him, and the greater part of that time he held the office of Commissioner of Indian Affairs. Prior to that time, he had held a seat in the House. At this time he is the Lieutenant Governor of the State of Ohio. His character for honesty is above reproach. I have defended him from the charge of fraud or misrepresentation in negotiating this treaty.

Mr. SWEETSER. I do not wish to detain the committee but for a few moments. The ground upon which the Committee on Indian Affairs ask the appropriation for the Menomonee Indians is most extraordinary, and involves a most grave and serious charge against an eminent citizen of my State, the former Commissioner of Indian Affairs.

Mr. HOUSTON. Will the gentleman allow me to make a motion, to see whether the committee will not have a recess and meet again this evening for discussion?

Mr. SWEETSER. I do not desire to occupy the attention of the committee more than ten minutes, and therefore I prefer speaking now, and finish the discussion. I say, the ground upon which this appropriation is asked is a most extraordinary one. I do not rise for the purpose of resisting the influence of the argument made in favor of this appropriation; but standing as I do here, one of the Representatives from Ohio, I feel bound, in consideration of public duty, to interfere in this debate, in order to exculpate an absent friend, who had no knowledge that an attack would be made upon him in this House, and what I may say is without examination, or any pretended knowledge of the facts further than they have been disclosed here.

That I may proceed understandingly, I will repeat the charge, as I understand it, and as I apprehend it was understood by the committee. I will do the honorable gentleman from Arkansas [Mr. JOHNSON] the justice and credit to say, that he has not himself indorsed this charge. If I have understood the gentleman from Indiana, [Mr. FITCH]—and if I am wrong, I wish he would correct me—he started out with the assertion that he desired to call the attention of the delegation from Ohio, particularly, to what he would state, inasmuch as he was about to state harsh things against an individual who stood high in that State. I consequently paid particular attention as the gentleman proceeded to state his charge, and I call his attention to some facts, which I consider material in the defense of this case.

The charge, substantially, is this: that Colonel Medill being armed with power from the Government, proceeded to the Territory of Wisconsin, in order to make a treaty with the Indians residing within that Territory; that prior to this the Government had given him information, predicated upon the statement made by the Attorney General, of the extent of the possessions of the Indians within that Territory; that he went there with a full knowledge of all the facts upon which his action was to be predicated; that in the face of this information and the truth, he said to these Indians that they had but about 1,600,000 acres of land, for which he was to treat, when he knew that they possessed and claimed about 5,000,000 of acres, and by threats and falsehood obtained from them a cession of all their territory, under a general grant. That is the nature of the charge. Superadded to that is the charge, that when the Indians were hesitating in relation to making the treaty, Colonel Medill, armed with the powers of the Government as one of its high officers, and the only channel through which these Indians could reach the Government, threatened these Indians that unless they made the treaty upon the basis laid down by him, the strong arm of the Government would be used against them, the chiefs would be overthrown, and they would be removed by the military power of the country. Will this charge be proved by the records of the country? I interrupted the honorable gentleman, and demanded to know upon what authority, or even evidence, he made the charge. He replied, upon record evidence now on file in the Indian Bureau. I now say, if that charge be true, the country is disgraced, and I stand here, as one of the people's Representatives, to say, when that case is made out, that I am prepared to go as far as any man to set aside all these treaties predicated upon grounds that outrage the feelings of every man, not only of the House of Representatives, but the whole country. This charge should not be made unless predicated upon proof about which there can be no cavil. This charge ought not to be made against the Government in which we live, and go abroad to the nations of the earth, that this Government, in the nineteenth century, with all its power, has so abused and outraged an inoffensive people, who have never shed the blood of a white man, as has been stated to their credit. If this charge can be substantiated, there is no penalty known to any criminal code upon the face of the earth that ought not to be inflicted upon the commissioner who negotiated the treaty.

I interrogated the honorable gentleman upon one part of his argument, whether there was any conceivable motive for the perpetration of this outrage upon the Indians. He did not assign any. As this discussion proceeded—and it seemed that none of these gentlemen who had investigated the matter were disposed to assign any motive upon the part of Mr. Medill—my colleague from the Butler district [Mr. CAMPBELL] arose, and in order to make a political point here, asked my colleague from the ninth district [Mr. OLDS] whether he was willing to let this charge go in connection with the charge which he had made against a high officer of Government. The only distinction between the two cases is, that Colonel Medill was charged with cheating the Government not for his own benefit, while the other officer was charged with cheating the Government for his own benefit. The cases are not parallel. As we proceeded with this matter, the honorable gentleman from Missouri, [Mr. PHELPS], whose attention has been called to this matter in consequence of being a member of the Committee on Indian Affairs, presents a different phase of the case, and before I sit down I will call the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. FROST] to either explain his statement, or take back the charge which he has made against Colonel Medill. It appears that when Colonel Medill went to Wisconsin to treat with the Menomonee Indians, that his data was mere conjecture. The estimate of quantity was not the result of any actual survey or reconnaissance of the country, that had even the pretense of accuracy.

It was known to the Attorney General and to Colonel Medill, that these Indians possessed a considerable territory, but the precise amount was to all uncertain. His instructions were to purchase all for a gross sum. Supposing that the quantity would be about three millions of acres, he purchased the whole of their possessions in Wisconsin. The treaty was ratified by the Senate without objection from the Indians.

At this point allow me to repeat that there is no evidence here that Colonel Medill used any threats for the purpose of inducing these Indians to sell their possessions.

Mr. FITCH. I simply rise to say that the gentleman is mistaken.

Mr. SWEETSER. I hope the gentleman will publish the evidence, if any exists, in his speech. If the charge be true, I desire that the severest penalties should be inflicted upon an American citizen who dared, in the face of the American people, to perpetrate such an outrage. I care not who he is. I do not rise here for the purpose of pettifoggery or shielding this man at all; but I rise for the purpose of making a point that will bring out the truth. I will not trespass upon the attention of my friend from Minnesota [Mr. SIBLEY] but a moment longer. Here is a plain case in relation to the public lands. Colonel Medill was in error in relation to the extent of the possessions of the Indians, as has been developed by subsequent examinations and survey. The Attorney General was not well advised, and the Indians were in error themselves. The Government desired to buy all their possessions in Wisconsin, and they intended to sell all. It is now ascertained that the amount, as stated by the commissioner, was too low. That is the true state of the case. We are not called upon to vote so as to disgrace any Department of the Government, or any man connected with the treaties. Instead of predicated the case upon the statement of the gentleman, it seems to me that he has presented a false issue, and one that will not command the vote of this committee favorably. It may be that the gentleman's judgment was clouded by prejudice.

If you predicate your vote upon the fact that this charge was true, there is no man here that would give such a vote until after a full and fair investigation of this matter, and until the accused party had been heard in his defense, and the facts had been placed before the country. If there has been an honest mistake, which is the reasonable view of the case upon the admitted testimony on file, if we have driven the Indians into a hard bargain through a mistake in relation to the quantity of land they possessed, we should now come forward and make up to these Indians what is honestly their due. In my judgment that is the ground upon which this case should rest. There is no reason, from the disclosures made here, to make the charge which has been made here against Colonel Medill, the commissioner who negotiated this treaty. Thanking gentlemen for their attention, I yield the floor to the gentleman from Minnesota, [Mr. SIBLEY.]

Mr. SIBLEY. I have not risen with any design of making a set speech or of consuming much of the time of the committee. I deemed it but right and proper in me, however, in view of the fact that an attack had been made upon a gentleman who formerly occupied a distinguished position under this Government, to yield a portion of my time to the gentleman from Ohio, [Mr. SWEETSER], to enable him to reply to the very serious charges which had been made against Colonel Medill, by members of the Committee on Indian Affairs of this House. It was but justice to the absent, that the reply should go forth to the country simultaneously with the accusations against him, and to effect this object, I very cheerfully permitted the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. SWEETSER] to occupy as much of my time as he might deem necessary to devote to the defense of the former Commissioner of Indian Affairs. Being myself ignorant of all the facts connected with the transactions between the Government and the Menomonee Indians, I have nothing to say on that subject. I propose to detain the committee for a short time in the discussion of another matter of very general interest to the country at large, and particularly to the Indians themselves. Sir, the aboriginal tribes upon this continent, and especially those inhabiting the northern portions of it, are subjected to a great amount of suffering, because of the want of food and proper clothing. This is a subject which I had the honor of bringing before this House during the last Congress, in a speech which I made upon the general topic of our Indian relations, when I took occasion, among other things, to state, that the miserable condition of the wild tribes of the West was far from being realized by Congress and by the country.

Sir, but two short years have passed since that speech was delivered, and my observation and the information I have gathered since that time, have entirely corroborated the statements therein contained. I have seen whole bands of Indians, comprising men, women, and children, reduced to a state of emaciation from hunger, shocking to behold in this fair land, which God has blessed with an abundance of all the elements necessary for the support of human life. I have witnessed the voracity with which these poor creatures have seized upon and devoured garbage the most disgusting, from which the very pampered dogs of your cities would turn away with loathing. It would be some consolation to be able to assert with truth, that reduced to these extremities, there was still no reason to believe that any had actually perished from the want of some kind of food capable of sustaining life. Unfortunately even that solace is denied us.

I have reason to know, from statements which have been made to me, by respectable men in the Indian country, that during the last year, in the Territory which I have the honor to represent upon this floor, there have been from sixty to one hundred deaths among the Indians, from actual starvation. I may be met here with the statement that these calamities befall them because of their improvidence. I have no disposition to deny that such is the case to some extent. Everybody who knows anything about the character of an Indian is aware that he acts up to the scriptural maxim of letting "the morrow take thought for the things of itself." If he has but sufficient to feed himself and his family for one day, he does not trouble himself much about what he is to have of fare for the next. That is especially the case with the Indians who depend exclusively upon the game for subsistence. Now, I have reason to know, that many of the large western prairies which formerly abounded in wild animals are now entirely denuded of them. The consequence is, that within two or three years bands of Indians who relied entirely upon the buffalo, elk, and antelope for their daily supply of food, have been reduced to the last stages of destitution.

I propose in an amendment I shall offer to the bill under consideration, before I take my seat, to appropriate the sum of $100,000, to be applied by the Secretary of the Interior to relieve such cases of suffering as I have described among the Indians in any part of the United States. I have taken particular care likewise to provide that no part of this money shall be paid out by the Secretary unless statements from entirely reliable sources shall be brought to his notice, showing the absolute necessity of the expenditure.

In immediate connection with this subject I propose to reply to a charge made by the gentleman from Missouri, [Mr. PHELPS], against a class of persons in the West called Indian traders.

Mr. PHELPS. The gentleman will permit me to say, that in the allusion which I made to the Indian traders as being unworthy of credit, I did not mean to refer to the owners of trading establishments, but to the class of men employed by them to trade with the Indians. Those persons do not stand very well on the frontier where I live.

Mr. SIBLEY. Sir, I accept the explanation of the gentleman, so far as it goes, but I will not remain silent in this House and hear a whole class of citizens, with many of whom I am intimately acquainted, denounced, as I have sometimes heard them, by gentlemen who knew nothing about those they so bitterly inveighed against. I am aware that there are individuals in the West who are very improperly denominated Indian traders, who deserve all the denunciation that can be poured upon them, here or anywhere else. I mean those men who are engaged in selling liquor to the Indians, and taking from them in exchange therefor, blankets, guns, or anything else they may chance to possess. I hold these individuals in just as much detestation as the gentleman from Missouri can probably do. Thank God! we have very few of them in our Territory, and when they come there they are not suffered to remain long, before they are made to feel the weight of the public indignation.

But when that gentleman, or any other, undertakes to pour forth denunciations upon the regularly-licensed traders, as destitute of integrity and honor, I shall take issue with him at once.

We have in our Territory many citizens who have been engaged for years in the Indian trade, and who are as high-minded, as honorable, and as little obnoxious to the charge of defrauding the Indians, as any gentleman in this House. I will do them the justice to say, that they, in conjunction with the missionaries of the Cross, have gone further to benefit the Indians, to feed them when they were hungry, to clothe them when they were naked, to prevent the introduction of liquor among them, and to alleviate their sufferings generally, than any other class in the community.

Mr. SWEETSER. I ask the gentleman if it is not within his knowledge that, during the times of scarcity and starvation with these Indians, the traders have reduced themselves almost to poverty, in order to relieve the Indians in their exigencies?

Mr. SIBLEY. I will state to the gentleman that such is very frequently the case. The men who receive licenses as traders must first show that they are of good character, otherwise, by the terms of the law, they should not be permitted to go into the Indian country at all. They are withal compelled to give bonds to the Government in a large amount to observe all existing regulations, and to refrain from any violation of the laws regulating trade and intercourse with the Indian tribes. Such men are the real friends of the poor Indian, and will share the last crust or the last blanket with the starving, shivering savage. For the most part, so far from defrauding the Indians, they are defrauded by them; for I assure the gentleman that he very much underates the character of these western Indians for shrewdness and intelligence, if he thinks they can be very easily imposed upon. They know the value of the articles of merchandise used by them about as well as the whites themselves, and are quite as apt to look after their own interests.

But I wish to present another fact in relation to this much-abused class of men. I have been an Indian trader myself for fifteen or more years, and I cannot consent to be placed in the category mentioned by the gentleman from Missouri.

Mr. PHELPS. I exonerated you.

Mr. SIBLEY. I know the gentleman did not intend to apply his remarks to me personally; but I choose to defend the class to which I myself have so long appertained against all such imputations.

Mr. PHELPS. I have already said that I did not intend to embrace in my remarks the principal traders, the proprietors of the trading establishments; I only intend to embrace their employees, the men whom they employ to trade with these Indians.

Mr. SIBLEY. I am perfectly willing to admit that there are traders and half-breeds among the Indians, as there are persons in all communities, who are no better than they should be. It would be strange indeed if there were not exceptions to the general rule.

Mr. PHELPS. That is the class to whom I allude.

Mr. SIBLEY. They form a portion of those who spend their lives among the Indians; but they are men whose characters are just as well known and appreciated among the Indians, and held in as just estimation by them as they are by the whites. I wish, as an act of justice to this class of the community, to state one fact which no man who knows anything about it will controvert. Of all the Indian traders of my acquaintance, (and they are many in number,) I know of none who have enriched themselves, but I am aware that by far the largest number have become utterly impoverished in the prosecution of this branch of commerce. Do these facts go to show that the Indians are defrauded by these people? or rather, do they not afford incontestable evidence that such wholesale charges are utterly without foundation? I have no knowledge of the kind of men they may have upon the frontiers of Missouri, to whom the gentleman particularly alludes. I am speaking of men some of whom hold high social positions in our Territory, and whose representations may be regarded as entirely reliable. It is from them that I have derived in part the information of the miserable condition of the Indians; and it is upon the statements of such individuals, together with my own general knowledge of the necessity of the case, that I have based my action in the introduction of the amendment referred to.

Now, sir, I desire to advert to another fact connected with Indian treaties which have been made, and are constantly being made with the Indians. There is a great mistake in the public mind about the amount of compensation which the Indians receive under these treaties. It is generally supposed that they are paid a price for their lands somewhat approximating to that at which the Government holds its public domain. Why, sir, so far from that, the average rates paid to the Indians for land, since the foundation of the Government, have been about eight cents an acre; and yet we constantly hear complaints made of the large appropriations that are required to fulfill these treaty stipulations. Gentlemen seem to forget that we have taken away the homes of these poor wretches, driven them west of the Mississippi, amongst wild and hostile bands of Indians, who fall upon them with scalping-knife and with tomahawk, and that their principal dependence for subsistence is on the small annuities which they receive from this Government.

Mr. MURPHY. I desire to ask the gentleman a question. He appears to be well acquainted with the Indian character, and I understand his proposition to be to make provision for those that are suffering among them. I desire to ask the gentleman if the tendency of this provision will not be to increase the suffering?

Mr. SIBLEY. I will answer the gentleman from Georgia very cheerfully. If I had any idea that such would be the effect of this provision, I should certainly not offer the amendment. I will state to the gentleman, that as to the matter of fact, there can be no difference of opinion among men who are at all acquainted with the situation of matters in the West, that this state of things does exist. Not a year passes by, that scores and scores of these Indians do not perish from actual starvation, and I ask the gentleman, whether he thinks that in view of that state of things, this Government should fold its arms and refuse to make a small appropriation to meet such exigencies as these?

Mr. SWEETSER. With the permission of the gentleman, I will state that I have a near relative living in his neighborhood, from whom I received a letter a few days since, concerning the Indians in that locality. He writes me, that in consequence of the treaty made last fall, the Indians have not made so much provision for their subsistence as they have done hitherto, and that consequently, large numbers of them are not only suffering from hunger, but are actually dying. I believe that the Indians need the aid of the Government, and I shall vote for the amendment of the gentleman from Minnesota.

Mr. SIBLEY. I have no doubt the gentleman's information is correct. I will state to the committee, that I was present at the time the Upper Sioux treaty was made, which has just received the sanction of the Senate. I know that when the Indians arrived at the grounds, a great many of them were scarcely able to walk, from pure exhaustion. Many women and children were reduced almost to skeletons. There were present, when the treaty was made, from two thousand to three thousand Indians, and the commissioners were obliged, as a matter of absolute necessity, to send out teams to meet them laden with supplies to save them from death by actual starvation on their way to the treaty ground. I mention this as a single instance of the desperate straits to which the wild tribes of the prairies are reduced. If the facts could be obtained in an authentic form from all parts of our extended country, it would be found that other tribes are suffering in like manner.

Sir, this Government has assumed to itself the guardianship of these poor Indians, and should take immediate measures to meliorate their condition. With an overflowing Treasury—with your teeming granaries, and all the elements of prosperity abounding in your midst, for very shame let not the American Congress refuse to contribute something to alleviate the awful sufferings which, unrelieved, bid fair soon to destroy utterly the remnants of that noble race whose homes you are daily invading and appropriating to your own benefit. The sum proposed in the amendment is, as I have before stated, $100,000. If by the expenditure of a part, or the whole of this amount, the lives of hundreds can be saved, who will regret the outlay? If no such exigency arises as to require the money to be devoted to that sacred purpose, it will remain in the Treasury, and Congress will at least have the satisfaction of knowing that its duty has been performed.

I now send up the amendment, and ask that it may be read:

For the subsistence of the Indians of any tribe residing within the limits of the United States who may hereafter be suffering for want of food and proper clothing, to be expended under the direction of the Secretary of the Interior, $100,000: Provided, That in no case shall any portion of said sum be paid out unless a reliable statement shall be made to the Secretary of the Interior of the existence of such a state of suffering amongst the Indians as is contemplated in this clause.

Mr. GIDDINGS. I rise for a different purpose than that of expressing my approbation of the amendment which has just been read. But I will say, that my heart responds to the proposition of the gentleman from Minnesota. I would that the Committee on Indian Affairs should report a general change in our policy towards that much-abused people, and, instead of sending armies to slay them, we should send them food to sustain them. That would operate as the most efficient protection to our frontiers that could be provided. If this system were adopted, we should have no more trouble with them—no more Indian depredations. But I rise to make a statement, to which I ask the particular attention of the chairman of the Committee on Ways and Means, and the chairman of the Committee on Indian Affairs.

[Here a message was received from the Senate, by the hands of ASBURY DICKINS, its Secretary, announcing that it had agreed to some, disagreed to other amendments made by the House, and had made one new amendment to the bill to supply deficiencies in the appropriations for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1852.]

Mr. G. proceeded. I repeat, I ask the especial attention of those gentlemen to some interrogatories which I desire to propound to them, for the purpose of obtaining information, and that the information may go to the country. I will observe, that I desire to have the experience of the able chairman of the Committee on Indian Affairs [Mr. JOHNSON, of Arkansas] to obtain this intelligence. According to reliable information, which I received in the summer of 1850, these Creek Indians, to whom attention has been turned, and for whose benefit I shall most heartily concur with the chairman of the Committee on Indian Affairs, by voting for the compensation he proposes to give them, with force and violence seized from seventy to one hundred free persons of color in the Indian territory, or, at least, those claiming to be free, and enslaved, sold them, and transported them to the State of Louisiana, where they are now in servitude as slaves. I will state that this was done in violation of their treaty entered into in 1845, and in subversion of our solemn faith entered into with these negroes during the Seminole war, in 1837. The official information upon this subject is in the Indian Department, where it has been received, and from which we have not been able to obtain any intelligence by resolution, although a resolution for that purpose has been in my desk since the first day of the session.

The questions I desire to propound to those gentlemen are, first, Is it a fact that those persons of color were seized and sold into slavery? and, second, by what claim of right, or pretended title, did these Creek Indians enslave and sell those people? If gentlemen are not prepared to answer these interrogatories now, I hope they will be to-morrow. I hope I shall have a plain and distinct answer to these two questions. In order that I may not be misunderstood, I will repeat, is it a fact, shown by the official records of this nation, or within the knowledge of these gentlemen, that from seventy to one hundred persons, claiming to be free, were seized by these Indians and sold into slavery? Secondly, by what authority was that outrage committed? In order to give time to answer these two questions, I will now consent that the committee rise.

Mr. JOHNSON. I never fail to answer a gentleman's question if I am able; and I will answer the questions put by the gentleman from Ohio so far as I can.

The subject-matter of which the gentleman speaks has never been before the Committee on Indian Affairs during my connection with that committee, in this or any other session of Congress; and, therefore, I have no official knowledge in regard to the matter at all. Then as to the knowledge I have obtained incidentally, I do know that there has been a great contest in relation to a portion of these Creek Indian negroes. I do know that the matter has been looked into here in the Executive Departments; I do know that the matter has never been before the House at all, unless it has strangely escaped my notice. I know it has not been before my committee. I know the Attorney General of the United States has declared his opinion as to the title of these negroes. I think there were seventy of them, though it might have been more or less. So, then, I have no official information on the subject to which the gentleman alludes.

Some two or three years ago, I knew of a contest going on about the title to these negroes, and that it was decided that they belonged to those Indians. They had established themselves in a free town, which they maintained with force and arms. There were heavy disturbances existing there in the Indian nation, amounting at times almost to civil war. I believe before it was done with, it was quite civil war. I know they were taken, but what was done with them I do not know. They were taken and carried out of the nation, with the design of holding them as property, when they could not hold them in the nation, on account of the disturbance which they created. I know the decision of the Attorney General of the United States, as to the title to these negroes, and that is the whole statement in regard to the matter, as far as I can give it. I know nothing at all officially, but as far as I know anything in relation to the matter from any source, the gentleman is welcome to it. There is nothing disguised, so far as I am concerned.

Mr. GIDDINGS. I have not the least doubt there is not. I have served with that gentleman, and I know his feelings, the humanity which he always exhibits. But there is one thing which I want to say here, and then I will give way.

Mr. JOHNSON. There is one thing more which I will give. I have it from a gentleman from the State of Arkansas, who is generally correct in the statements he makes. I can only give the gentleman's understandings, for I have no official information. I can, however, give some information from this gentleman, who is well acquainted with the progress of this contest, and the condition of things there at the time, in relation to the action of these very same parties who were slaves to the Creeks. The representation is, that the most shameful outrages upon the face of the earth have been perpetrated upon females, the daughters of the Indians themselves, which justified civil war upon their part.

Mr. GIDDINGS. Before I give way for the committee to rise, I must protest against this offsetting of crimes. If those negroes were guilty of rape, it was no reason why this Administration should sell them, or suffer them to be sold, into slavery. But I know what gentlemen would answer—

Mr. JOHNSON. Then why ask for an answer?

Mr. GIDDINGS. Because I intended to expose the manner in which these crimes have been treated, and to-morrow I will explain the matter further.

Mr. JONES, of Tennessee. The gentleman does not acknowledge either of the Baltimore platforms, so I suppose he may agitate. [Laughter.]

A motion was then made that the committee rise, which was put, and carried in the affirmative.

The committee accordingly rose, and the Speaker having resumed the chair, the chairman (Mr. DISNEY) reported that the committee had, according to order, had the state of the Union generally under consideration, and particularly House bill No. 44, it being the Indian appropriation bill, and had come to no conclusion thereon.

Mr. HOUSTON. The deficiency bill has been returned to the House. I understand the Senate has concurred in most of the amendments of the House. I had hoped it would be in such a condition that the House could concur in the amendments to which the Senate have disagreed. I will state what they are.

Several MEMBERS. There is no quorum, and you cannot pass them.

Mr. HOUSTON. I do not want to have any trouble about it, and I will move that the bill be committed to the Committee on Ways and Means. There are but three amendments which the Senate have not concurred in, and I think there will be no objection to those. They have non-concurred in the amendment of the House in reference to the appropriation for the Louisville custom-house. They have reduced the appropriation to $16,000. They have insisted upon the amendment which we rejected, providing that money should not be expended in the Territories without being previously sanctioned by law. They have also non-concurred in the amendment of this House to that paragraph of the bill which proposes to allow $25,000 to negotiate for the removal of the Indians from Texas. They non-concur in our amendment by which we propose to give it to all the Indians. They propose to confine it, as originally, to the Indians who have gone from the territory of the United States into Texas. Those are the amendments now pending between the two Houses. The Senate have added an amendment to the amendment of this House by which they propose to appropriate $50,000 for the pay and mileage of members of the Senate. I would like a concurrence in these Senate amendments.

Mr. MARSHALL, of Kentucky. I trust this House, although there are very few of us here now, will be very far from concurring in that portion which relates to the Louisville custom-house.

Mr. HOUSTON. The gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. MARSHALL] resists it as a matter of course.

Mr. SKELTON. I rise to a question of privilege. I move that the House do now adjourn.

The SPEAKER. The motion is not now in order.

Mr. MARSHALL. I have only this to say, that I trust the House will not concur in that portion of the Senate report which relates to the Louisville custom-house. As a Representative of that district, I do not know by what instrumentality the Senate has been affected, or who it is that has operated upon it; but I would rather have no amendment than to have $16,000, because there is no sense or propriety in it.

Mr. SKELTON. I rise to a question of order.

Mr. MARSHALL. But whether this House concurs or not in the other amendments, I trust it will not concur in that, and that they will either drop it entirely, or give me the benefit of a committee of conference. I have said all I desire to say.

Mr. JOHNSON, of Arkansas. I desire the gentleman to yield me the floor a moment.

Mr. SKELTON. I rise to a question of order. It is, that there is no business before the House, and consequently debate is out of order.

The SPEAKER. (Mr. PHELPS in the chair.) The Chair will say to the gentleman—

Mr. FOWLER. I was recognized by the Chair.

Mr. HOUSTON. I was going to move to commit this bill.

Mr. FOWLER. I was recognized by the Chair, and I claim the floor.

Mr. HOUSTON. I move to refer this bill to the Committee on Ways and Means.

Mr. FOWLER. I have the floor.

Mr. MARSHALL. How can gentlemen take the floor in this way? I yielded the floor to the gentleman from Arkansas, [Mr. JOHNSON.]

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from New Jersey [Mr. SKELTON] rose to a question of order.

Mr. SKELTON. My question of order is, that there is no question properly before the House, and consequently that debate is out of order.

The SPEAKER. By general consent the deficiency bill was taken up.

Mr. COBB. General consent was not asked.

Mr. HOUSTON. I asked that the bill be referred to the Committee on Ways and Means. We will have a report in the morning.

Mr. MARSHALL. Is it the order of this House that the floor can be taken from me in this manner?

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from New Jersey [Mr. SKELTON] rose to a question of order.

Mr. MARSHALL. I am willing to yield to a question of order.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Alabama [Mr. HOUSTON] moved informally to proceed to the consideration of the deficiency bill. No objection being made to the motion the Chair then entertained it, as he understood, by unanimous consent.

Mr. JOHNSON, of Arkansas. That is right; that is correct.

Mr. COBB. No appeal to the House for consent was made.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. MARSHALL] is entitled to the floor.

Mr. JOHNSON. The gentleman has yielded to me to make a single remark by way of explanation. It is this, sir; I do not wish to make a motion myself to have this bill referred to a committee of conference between the two Houses, upon those two or three amendments. I do not wish to make the motion myself, because it involves upon any one who makes the motion the necessity of taking the position of chairman of the committee, and I do not want it, because I should have no time to attend to it. I suggest that such course be taken with it; and I hope the amendment of the gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. MARSHALL] will be concurred in.

Mr. FOWLER. I rise to a question of order. There is no quorum present, and I make the point of order, that we cannot transact business without a quorum.

Mr. MARSHALL. That question cannot be ascertained while I am upon the floor.

Mr. FOWLER. My question of order is, that we can do no business, because there is not a quorum here.

The SPEAKER. There has been no division by which the Chair could determine whether a quorum is present or not.

Mr. MARSHALL. I move that a committee of conference be appointed upon the points of difference between the Senate and ourselves.

Mr. COBB. I want a division upon that motion.

The SPEAKER. The Chair will state to the gentleman from Kentucky, [Mr. MARSHALL,] that he is informed that there is a new amendment proposed by the Senate to this bill, which will require some other action upon the part of the House than a committee of conference.

Mr. MARSHALL. Then I change my motion, and move that this House disagree to the Senate amendments, and appoint a committee of conference, and inform the Senate of the fact.

Mr. FOWLER. I move that the House adjourn.

The House was being divided on the motion, when—

Mr. HART took the floor. Where will this bill go should the House now adjourn? To the Speaker's table?

The SPEAKER. The motion is now pending to disagree to the Senate amendments.

Mr. HART. Will it be the first business in order to-morrow morning?

The SPEAKER. It goes to the Speaker's table.

Mr. HOUSTON. If there is a new appropriation, it will be necessary to send it to the Committee on Ways and Means.

Mr. JONES, of Tennessee. That bill as it comes from the Senate, proposes a new appropriation of $50,000. That, as a matter of course, under the rules, if required, must go to the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union.

Mr. AVERETT. I understand that a motion to adjourn has been made, and the House is divided upon that motion.

The SPEAKER. A motion was made to adjourn, and while the question was being put, the gentleman from New York [Mr. HART] rose to a question of order.

Mr. HART. I beg pardon. I rose to make an inquiry of the Chair.

Mr. HENN. I rise to a question of order. The rules of this House require each member to keep his seat, and that but one member shall speak at a time. [Laughter.]

The SPEAKER. The question is upon the motion to adjourn.

Mr. FOWLER. I would like to inquire if the chairman of the Committee of Ways and Means did not make a motion to recommit this bill?

The SPEAKER. The floor was not assigned to him for that purpose.

Mr. FOWLER. I understand that to be the fact.

Mr. HOUSTON. I do not want to be captious about this thing at all. I know the bill has to take that course, and therefore I move to commit the bill to the Committee of Ways and Means.

Mr. JENKINS. I rise to a question of order. I wish to know what question is now pending?

Mr. JOHNSON. Is it not a question of adjournment?

The SPEAKER. That is the question.

Mr. MACE. I call for the yeas and nays.

The question was again being taken on the motion to adjourn, when

Mr. FOWLER said: I withdraw the motion to adjourn, as there is some doubt about the position of the bill.

Mr. COBB. I renew it.

Mr. HOUSTON. I move to commit the bill to the Committee of Ways and Means.

Mr. COBB. I ask for a division upon that motion.

Mr. MARSHALL. I understand my motion is pending, and I do not mean that it shall be overslaughed. I understand I had made a motion to disagree with the amendments proposed by the Senate, and to appoint a committee of conference, and inform the Senate thereof. I do not intend that that motion shall be set aside, unless this House votes it down.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman will suspend a moment. The gentleman from Kentucky has submitted a motion that the House disagree to the amendments made by the Senate to the deficiency bill. The gentleman from Alabama [Mr. Houston] has submitted a motion that the bill, together with the amendments, be referred to the Committee of Ways and Means. The Chair is informed that the Senate have adopted a new amendment, appropriating $50,000. The rules of this House require its consideration in a committee. Hence, in the opinion of the Chair, the motion submitted by the gentleman from Alabama [Mr. Houston] would have precedence. The motion now pending before the House, is the motion to commit the bill to the Committee of Ways and Means.

Mr. FOWLER. That being the motion, I move that the House adjourn.

Mr. HOUSTON. Let us act upon it in the morning.

Mr. AVERETT. I protest against any proceedings here with only twenty-five members present. There are not more than twenty-five or thirty present, and I insist on a division upon the question of adjournment.

The House being divided on the question, there appeared—ayes 12, noes 18; but before the vote was announced,

Mr. FOWLER withdrew the motion.

Mr. AVERETT. I move that the House do now adjourn.

The SPEAKER. The question has just been put and the House refused to adjourn.

Mr. HOUSTON. I ask that the question may be put upon the motion to commit the bill.

Mr. WALSH. When will the committee have a chance to report back the bill?

Mr. AVERETT. I have no sort of objection to proceeding, but for the fact that there are not thirty members present, and therefore I protest against any proceedings being had.

Mr. MARSHALL. I rise to a question of order.

Mr. AVERETT. There is no quorum present. I move that the House adjourn.

Mr. MARSHALL. My motion is pending.

Mr. SEYMOUR, of New York. I wish to inquire whether the gentleman from Alabama [Mr. Houston] has made a motion, which is entertained by the Chair, that this bill be committed to the Committee of Ways and Means? and whether if the House now adjourn, that motion having been made, the bill will be prevented from going to the Speaker's table, so that it will be reached in the morning?

The SPEAKER. The motion of the gentleman from Alabama [Mr. Houston] is already entered. The bill will therefore not go to the Speaker's table.

Mr. MARSHALL. Before the question of adjournment is presented, I want to know what decision the House has made upon my motion?

The SPEAKER. The Chair decided that the motion of the gentleman from Alabama [Mr. Houston] took precedence of the motion of the gentleman from Kentucky, [Mr. Marshall], and therefore entertains the motion to commit. If the House decides not to commit the bill, then the motion of the gentleman from Kentucky will be next in order, unless some other motion be submitted. But that question must be first taken. I will furthermore state to the gentleman from Kentucky, that there is a rule of this House requiring all appropriation bills to be considered in the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union. The motion of the gentleman from Kentucky is decided out of order until the committee have acted upon this new appropriation.

The question was then taken on the motion of Mr. AVERETT, and it was agreed to.

So the House adjourned until to-morrow at eleven o'clock.

PETITIONS, &c.

The following petitions, memorials, &c., were presented under the rule, and referred to the appropriate committees:

By Mr. ABERCROMBIE: The petition of Stephen O'Kelly, claiming compensation for services and losses incurred in behalf of the United States, during the Creek Indian hostilities in Alabama, in 1836.

By Mr. PARKER, of Indiana: The petition of Jeremiah Smith, G. W. Monks, and 56 others, citizens of Randolph county, Indiana, praying for the passage of Mr. STANLY's bill, applying the fourth installment to purposes of colonization.

By Mr. GOODRICH: The petition of Stephen Thompson and others, revolutionary soldiers, for a modification of the pension laws.

By Mr. PEASLEE: The petition of Roswell Shurtleff and others, praying for the passage of the bill introduced by Hon. EDWARD STANLY, in favor of African colonization.

IN SENATE.

FRIDAY, July 16, 1852.

Prayer by the Chaplain, Rev. C. M. BUTLER.

The PRESIDENT. This is private bill day. Mr. BORLAND. I would inquire whether this is the day on which private bills may be discussed?

The PRESIDENT. This is the day on which, if any discussion arises, the bills must be passed over.

THOMAS H. LEGGETT.

The PRESIDENT. The first bill on the list is a bill for the relief of Thomas H. Leggett.

Mr. HUNTER. There is objection to that bill; and I understand that no bill can be discussed to-day.

The PRESIDENT. The rule requires that if any discussion arises, a bill shall be passed over; or it shall be passed over if any Senator expresses a disposition to discuss it.

Mr. SEWARD. If there is no disposition to discuss the bill, we may as well take the question now.

Mr. HUNTER. I would prefer that the bill should be passed over for to-day.

The PRESIDENT. Does the Senator propose to discuss the bill?

Mr. HUNTER. I cannot tell until the bill comes up; other members may wish to discuss it.

Mr. BORLAND. I have something to say on it.

The PRESIDENT. It will be passed over.

MARVIN W. FISHER.

The next bill on the Calendar was the bill for the relief of the widow of Marvin W. Fisher, which provides for directing the Secretary of the Treasury to pay to Harriet F. Fisher, widow and executrix of Marvin W. Fisher, the sum of $20,000, as a full compensation for the past use of the machine invented by him for charging percussion caps, in the arsenals of the United States, and also for the future free and undisturbed use by the Government of the patent right to the machine, with its improvements, as patented November 21, 1848.

Mr. BORLAND. I would suggest, as I did before when that bill came up, that another bill has been reported embracing substantially the case provided for here, and other cases of a similar character. That bill is intended as a substitute for this. For that reason I move that this bill be laid upon the table.

The motion was agreed to.

THOMAS PEMBER.

The Senate proceeded to consider, as in Committee of the Whole, the bill for the relief of Thomas Pember. It proposes to direct the proper accounting officers of the Treasury to audit the account of Thomas Pember, and to pay him the difference between the compensation of a captain's clerk and a purser on board the United States steamer Vixen, from October 23, 1848, to June 20, 1850, and the difference between the compensation of a captain's clerk and a purser on board the ship Electra, from July 1, 1847, to February 28, 1848.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, and ordered to be engrossed for a third reading. It was subsequently read a third time and passed.

MARK BEAN AND RICHARD H. BEAN.

The bill for the relief of Mark Bean and Richard H. Bean was stated to be the next in order. It proposes to direct the Secretary of the Treasury to pay to Mark Bean and Richard H. Bean, of Arkansas, the sum of $15,000, as a compensation and indemnity in full for losses sustained by them in their removal under the third article of the treaty with the Cherokee Indians, of May 6, 1828, by which they were forced to abandon not only the lands which they had settled, cultivated, and improved, but an extensive manufactory of salt, warehouses, dwelling-houses, and other large improvements.

Mr. BAYARD. When the bill was up before, it was opposed by the Senator from Kentucky, [Mr. UNDERWOOD,] now absent as one of the committee of the Senate, who has gone to accompany the remains of his late colleague. I think the bill ought not to be acted upon in his absence. He may wish to continue that discussion. Certainly, as I understood his argument then, this is clearly a bill which ought not to pass the Senate. I have no desire to discuss it myself. I am not sufficiently familiar with its details to do so, but I have no doubt he would discuss it, for he is opposed to it, and I think he was very successful in showing why it should not pass. I think the bill ought not to be taken up in his absence, and therefore I move to postpone its consideration till Friday next.

The motion was agreed to.

ROBERT T. NORRIS.

The Senate resumed, as in Committee of the Whole, the consideration of the bill for the relief of Robert T. Norris. It provides for the payment to Robert T. Norris of the sum of — dollars, in consideration of injuries received by him while acting as a pilot under the direction of the collector of customs in New York.

Mr. SEWARD. I move to fill the blank with $500.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. BAYARD. I would like to hear the report in that case read.

The report was accordingly read; from which it appears, that Robert T. Norris was a regularly trained and licensed pilot in New York; that in September, 1839, he was directed by the collector of the customs of that port to pilot a floating light-ship, belonging to the United States, from the East river to the station off Sandy Hook; and while performing this duty, and engaged in the act of mooring the vessel, the chain-cable slipped out of the hawse-hole on the port-bow, in consequence of one of the stoppers giving way, and coming in contact with his person; badly injuring his right leg, and so violently injuring the left, that amputation was afterwards necessarily performed. By this accident the petitioner was disabled from pursuing his avocation, and his means of support were rendered very precarious. The committee consider that the accident having happened on board a ship belonging to the Government, under its management, and while the party was engaged in the service of the Government, it is a case commending itself to the magnanimity, if not to the justice, of the United States. At the same time, the committee say that they cannot advise the precedent of granting pensions for injuries and wounds received in the civil service of the United States. They therefore have thought proper to submit a bill providing for the payment of a fixed sum; and they refer, as a precedent, to the report made in the House of Representatives, May 2d, 1850, in the case of Eli Darling.

Mr. FELCH. I wish that this bill should be laid over until another day. I see, by the proceedings heretofore, that a bill for the same object once passed the House, came to the Senate, was reported upon adversely here, and the bill was finally indefinitely postponed. I would like to look into that adverse report.

Mr. HUNTER. This bill ought to be laid over. It seems to me it introduces a new principle—the granting of pensions to pilots.

Mr. FELCH. I move to postpone the further consideration of the bill until Friday next.

The motion was agreed to.

LEWIS H. BATES AND WILLIAM LACON.

The Senate resumed, as in Committee of the Whole, the consideration of the bill for the relief of Lewis H. Bates and William Lacon. It proposes to authorize the accounting officers to audit and allow the claim of Bates & Lacon for losses and damages sustained by them in consequence of the proceedings of the custom-house officers in New York, in exacting from them, on certain importations of iron into that port, made between June 1st, 1829, and January 1st, 1832, higher duties than were required by law, and in seizing and libeling those goods on the refusal of Bates &

Lacon to enter the same subject to higher duty, and for certain costs of court paid by them, and not reimbursed.

Mr. FELCH. I move to postpone the further consideration of this bill. I find that it is in the same situation with the one last up.

The motion was agreed to.

RICHARD MACKALL.

The PRESIDENT announced that the next bill on the Calendar was one for the relief of Richard Mackall.

Mr. BAYARD expressing a wish to debate the bill, it was passed over.

HENRY KING.

The Senate resumed, as in Committee of the Whole, the consideration of the bill for the relief of the representatives of Henry King. It proposes to direct the Secretary of the Treasury to pay to the legal representatives of Henry King the sum of $8,140 for his services in the third Maryland regiment, and in the commissary department during the revolutionary war.

Mr. BAYARD. I do not desire to oppose this claim, or to discuss the bill, if those who advocate it are willing to have it amended by striking out the allowance of interest. I move to amend the bill by striking out the sum of "$8,140," and inserting "$1,817.36." On the face of the bill it does not appear that any interest is allowed, but in point of fact the claim originally for revolutionary services was $1,817.36. The report of the committee shows that interest to the amount of $6,332.64 is allowed upon the claim, and embodied in the bill, as if it were part of the claim. I move to amend the bill in that way, and if the amendment shall be agreed to without discussion, I shall not oppose the bill. Otherwise I shall be compelled to oppose it. I am opposed to paying four times the amount of the claim.

Mr. SHIELDS. I would like to hear the report read.

Mr. BAYARD. If interest is to be claimed, I shall discuss the bill; but if interest is not claimed, I have no objection to make to the bill.

The report was read, from which it appears that the claim is for the services of Henry King as sergeant in the third Maryland regiment from May 30th to October 20th, 1778, at the rate of $10 per month; as commissary's clerk from October 21st to December 31st, 1778, at $35 per month; as commissary's clerk from January 1st, 1779, to April 19th, 1780, at $50 per month; as assistant commissary of issues from May 10th, 1780, to September 10th, 1781, at $75 per month; and for a retained rating during a small part of the time, which latter item amounts to $8 15c., making the total $862 10c. The United States are credited with various payments during that time, amounting to $180 18s. 8d.

Mr. SHIELDS. I would suggest that this bill be laid over for the present, and that we go on with cases requiring less time and less trouble. There are several matters involved here that may, in my humble opinion, lead to an immense amount of claims upon the Government. For one, I want to examine this matter very carefully. If we establish the principle here involved, we may have to continue it in other cases. I am afraid that the principle of the case is wrong. I do not object merely to the allowance of interest, but I have my doubts as to whether the principal should be paid.

The PRESIDENT. Does the Senator propose to discuss the bill?

Mr. SHIELDS. Yes, sir.

The PRESIDENT. It will be passed over.

JOHN JACKSON AND OTHERS.

The Senate resumed, as in Committee of the Whole, the consideration of the bill for the relief of John Jackson, Joseph Pineau, and Louis A. S. Smith. It proposes to direct the Secretary of the Treasury to pay to these persons the mileage allowed by law to witnesses attending the courts of the United States, from Port-au-Prince, in the Island of St. Domingo, to the city of Boston.

Mr. GEYER. Mr. President, I understand that there are some differences in the mode of computing mileage, and it is desirable to avoid that. The sum which it was intended to allow to these witnesses was $180 each. I therefore move to amend it, by striking out the words "mileage allowed by law to," and to insert "the sum of $180 each for their mileage as;" so that the bill shall provide for paying them "the sum of $180 each for their mileage as witnesses attending the courts of the United States," &c.

The amendment was agreed to, the bill was reported to the Senate as amended, the amendment was concurred in, and the bill was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading. It was subsequently read a third time and passed.

HIRAM MOORE AND JOHN HASCALL.

The PRESIDENT. The next bill in order is a bill for the relief of Hiram Moore and John Hascall. The bill has been read once, and will now be read a second time.

The bill was accordingly read a second time, and considered by the Senate as in Committee of the Whole.

It provides that there be granted to Hiram Moore and John Hascall, citizens of the United States, and to their heirs, assigns, and legal representatives, for the term of fourteen years, from the 27th day of June, A. D. 1850, the full and exclusive right and liberty of making, constructing, using, and vending to others to be made or used, the improvements for cutting, thrashing, or cleaning grain, or either of them, and embraced in the model, drawings, or specifications connected with letters-patent granted to them on the 28th day of June, 1836, for a machine commonly known as "Moore & Hascall's Harvesting Machine," together with the improvements invented by them, or either of them, in perfecting said machine, or any part thereof, from the date of their original patent, to the day from which the same is hereby renewed and extended. And that the Commissioner of Patents be directed and required to make a certificate of such renewal and extension; and append an authenticated copy thereof to the original patent, with the proper specifications and claims: Provided, That the said patentees shall first pay into the Treasury, to the credit of the patent fund, the fees required by law for the renewal or extension of patents: And provided further, That all rights and interests in said patent heretofore granted or assigned by said patentees, or by their duly authorized agents, in their name, shall inure to and be enjoyed by such assignees and purchasers thereof, respectively, during the renewed term of said patent, upon the same conditions and to the same extent as for the term that did exist when such sale or assignment was made.

Mr. JAMES. I wish to offer an amendment to that bill. It is to add the following proviso:

Provided, That any additional claim to said letters-patent of 1836, so made and presented to the Patent Office for letters-patent, under the provisions of this act, shall be for a patent improvement or addition, and shall, by this act, in the same manner be open to be contested on the ground of priority of invention, or other legal grounds.

Mr. HUNTER. Is there any report accompanying that bill? If there be I would like to hear it read.

The PRESIDENT. There is no report.

Mr. HUNTER. I should like to hear some explanation of the bill from some of its friends, as there is no report.

Mr. FELCH. I believe there is no printed report. The amendment of the Senator from Rhode Island, if I understand it correctly, will probably lead to some debate, and I therefore move to postpone the further consideration of the bill until Friday next.

The motion was agreed to.

ADJOURNMENT OVER.

Mr. HALE. I move that when the Senate adjourns to-day, it do adjourn to meet on Monday next.

Mr. ADAMS. I ask for the yeas and nays on that motion.

Mr. SHIELDS. I hope the Senator will withdraw the call for the yeas and nays.

Mr. HALE. No, let him have them.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

Mr. WALKER. I should like to ascertain, Mr. President, if that motion is in order on private bill day?

The PRESIDENT. Certainly; it is a motion to adjourn.

Mr. WALKER. No, it is not a motion to adjourn, but a motion to regulate adjournment.

The PRESIDENT. It is perfectly consistent with private business.

Mr. WALKER. No; it is entirely public business.

The question was then taken on the motion, and resulted—yeas 30; nays 10; as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Atchison, Bayard, Forland, Bright, Brodhead, Brooke, Butler, Chase, Cooper, De Saussure, Downs, Felch, Foot, Geyer, Hale, Hamilton, James, Mangum, Meriwether, Miller, Norris, Pearce, Pratt, Rusk, Sebastian, Shields, Soule, Toucey, Upham, and Wade—30.

NAYS—Messrs. Adams, Dawson, Dodge of Wisconsin, Dodge of Iowa, Jones of Iowa, King, Mallory, Seward, Spruance, and Walker—10.

So the motion was agreed to.

JOSHUA KENNEDY.

The Senate took up "A bill for the relief of the legal representatives of Joshua Kennedy, deceased," which was read a second time and considered as in Committee of the Whole. The bill provides that the Secretary of the Treasury pay to the legal representatives of Joshua Kennedy, deceased, out of any moneys not otherwise appropriated, the sum of $6,500, in full compensation for the destruction of property by the Creek Indians in the year 1813.

The report from the Committee on Indian Affairs was read, in which they state that the destruction for which the petitioners ask indemnity did not take place "while" the troops occupied the property; but there can be no doubt that "such occupation was the cause of its destruction," so that the case, in the opinion of the committee, comes clearly within the spirit, if not the letter, of the act of 1816, and the supplement thereto. If the military occupation be the exciting cause of the destruction, it is difficult to imagine what difference the precise moment at which the destruction took place can make. It is the feeling of hostility, created on the part of the enemy by the act of the Government in erecting a source of annoyance in their neighborhood, which makes the Government liable for the consequences of its own act, and not the particular time chosen by the enemy to satisfy its vengeance. In the case under consideration, the petitioner had originally erected his buildings and other improvements under the assurance given in the President's proclamation, that the persons and property of settlers should be protected. Subsequently these buildings were converted into a temporary fort by an officer of the Government, and as such became the point of assault to the Indians immediately after their successful attack on Fort Mimms and the massacre of its garrison. It is true, the party of troops which had occupied the premises had, in their panic occasioned by the destruction and slaughter at Fort Mimms, retired; but immediately after that destruction, and whilst the military defenses were still in existence, the premises were attacked and destroyed by the enemy.

Mr. BAYARD. I would like to look into the report which purports to be annexed to the report which has been read, giving the result of a former examination of a committee, which is not stated in that report. There are some principles stated here to which I cannot assent, in regard to the construction of the law of 1817. The committee say that they have examined the case with great care; and that they find the facts to be in accordance with the report of the Committee on Claims of the Thirtieth Congress, "filed, and intended to be made a part hereof." That report is not printed, and the facts alluded to do not appear in this report at all. I move to postpone the further consideration of the bill until Friday next.

The PRESIDENT. The report to which the Senator alludes has been printed.

Mr. RUSK. I wish to say one word, sir, in regard to this matter.

The PRESIDENT. There can be no discussion.

Mr. RUSK. I do not propose to discuss the question. I merely wish to explain the nature of the other report.

The PRESIDENT. The other report is printed.

Mr. RUSK. I know it is, but the Senator from Delaware [Mr. BAYARD] has not examined it, and I wish to save him the trouble of an examination. I believe there have been adverse reports in both cases—an adverse report once, and two reports in favor of it. The principal difficulty arose from this claimant not complying with the law in regard to indemnity in such cases. The law was passed with a limitation, and that limitation expired before any decision was made on the subject, though the case was presented to the Commissioner. This was the cause of the difference between the two reports.

The PRESIDENT. The Chair must interfere to prevent discussion. Does the Senator from Delaware make any motion?

Mr. BAYARD. I would rather like to look into the facts, and examine the law of 1817.

The further consideration of the bill was then postponed until Friday next.

LIEUTENANT W. D. PORTER.

Senate bill No. 254 was then taken up, and read a second time, and considered by the Senate as in Committee of the Whole, being "A bill for the relief of Lieutenant W. D. Porter."

The bill provides that the Secretary of the Treasury be directed to pay to Lieutenant W. D. Porter, of the Navy of the United States, the sum of $1,848 61, being for so much money expended by him for expenses incurred in bringing Amin Bey, of the Turkish navy, and his attendants, to the United States, in the year 1850, at the request of the Minister Resident of the United States at Constantinople.

No amendment being offered, the bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, and ordered to be engrossed for a third reading. It was subsequently read a third time and passed.

BANCROFT WOODCOCK.

The Senate took up Senate bill No. 259, for the relief of Bancroft Woodcock. It was read a second time, and considered as in Committee of the Whole.

It enacts that the several patents granted to Bancroft Woodcock, on the 26th day of January, in the year 1832, and on the 23d day of November, in the year 1836, and on the 14th day of June in the year 1837, and on the 31st day of January, in the year 1845, for his improvements in the self-sharpening plow, be renewed and extended for the term of ten years, from and after the passage of the act; provided, the said Bancroft Woodcock shall, within three months after the passage of the act, make and file in the Patent Office amended specifications of his inventions, for the purpose of correcting defects therein; and shall pay the legal fees and charges thereof. And the Commissioner of Patents is directed to receive the surrender of the said patents; and on payment of the fees and charges provided by law for the extension of patents, to issue to Bancroft Woodcock new patents, with amended specifications; provided, however, that said patents, issued under the act, shall have no more force or effect as evidence, or otherwise, than if the renewal and extension had been made by the Board of Extensions or the Commissioner of Patents, before the expiration of the original patents; and provided further, that all persons now enjoying the lawful use of machines constructed under the patents aforesaid may continue to use the same, notwithstanding the act.

Mr. SHIELDS. That bill, as I understand it, is intended to revive a great many old expired patents.

Mr. JAMES. If the Senator from Illinois will permit me, I will explain the bill in a few words. Mr. Bancroft Woodcock had taken out four patents for his inventions, the last of which expires in 1859. The object of the renewal is simply to confirm to him the rights and privileges which heretofore belonged to him, and without which the last improvement would be of no value. Mr. Woodcock is a hard-working mechanic, and the committee have examined his claim, and are satisfied of its justice and propriety. The extension, nominally for ten years, is, in reality only for three years, because the patent which he at present holds, expires in 1859. The benefit which will be really conferred on Mr. Woodcock, will be the extension of the other patents, of which the last is an improvement, during that time.

Mr. SHIELDS. I believe I understand the bill now. The last patent which Mr. Woodcock obtained expires in 1859, and he asks for an extension of it—being an improvement on many previous patents—for a term of three years, and he desires to have the previous patents superadded, as it were, to the last patent?

I really do not know whether this is a matter upon which we can legislate properly. I am not acquainted with the subject; but it appears to me to be a question for the consideration of the Commissioner of Patents, rather than for the action of the Senate.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair will be under the necessity of passing the bill over, if any discussion should arise on it.

Mr. SHIELDS. I shall not offer any further objection to the bill.

Mr. WALKER. I object to it.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. It will be passed over.

CYRUS H. McCORMICK.

The next bill in order was a bill for the relief of Cyrus H. McCormick.

Mr. NORRIS. I propose to discuss that bill when it comes up. It is, therefore, unnecessary to read it now.

The bill was accordingly passed over.

CAPTORS OF THE FRIGATE PHILADELPHIA.

The next bill in order was a bill for the relief of the captors of the frigate Philadelphia.

Mr. HALE. I shall discuss that bill. I wish it to be passed over.

The bill was accordingly passed over.

FREDERICK VINCENT.

The next bill in order was a bill for the relief of Frederick Vincent, administrator of James Le Caze, surviving partner of Le Caze and Mallett.

Mr. BAYARD. That bill, I believe, reserves interest on the claim. I shall wish to discuss that question, if it is intended to give interest. From so much of the report as I have glanced at, I am inclined to think the Government never can be liable to interest in such a case, either on principles of justice or equity, or on any other principle.

The PRESIDENT. The bill will be passed over.

Mr. BAYARD. I would rather discuss it from the phase of the report.

The bill was accordingly passed over.

ANN ROBINSON.

The Senate took up "A bill for the relief of Ann Robinson;" which was read a second time, and considered as in Committee of the Whole.

It proposes to direct the Secretary of State to pay to Ann Robinson, of Virginia, the sum of $380, it being the assessed value of a slave, carried off from Virginia by the British forces, in June, 1813, during the war declared by the United States against Great Britain, if there be so much remaining of the fund of $1,204,960, provided by the first article of the treaty of Ghent, and paid by Great Britain, and accepted by the United States in full satisfaction for slaves and other property carried off.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, and ordered to be engrossed for a third reading. It was subsequently read a third time and passed.

GUSTAVUS A. DE RUSSY.

The Senate then took up House bill No. 96, being "A bill for the relief of Gustavus A. De Russey, late an acting purser in the United States Navy," which had been read a second time, and was considered as in Committee of the Whole.

It proposes to authorize the Secretary of the Treasury to pay to Gustavus A. De Russey, late an acting purser in the Navy, the sum of $514, in full of the balance of compensation to which he is entitled for his services as an acting purser.

Mr. FELCH. If there is a report in that case I desire to hear it read.

The report made by the committee of the House of Representatives was read, in which the committee state, that the ship Concord, belonging then to the Brazilian squadron, was some time in the year 1842, by order of Commodore Morris, commander of said squadron, sent to the coast of Africa. William Bærum was then captain of said ship, and the said Gustavus A. De Russey was captain's clerk, the latter officer receiving the pay of $500 per annum. In the month of October, in the said year 1842, the ship Concord, being engaged in the pursuit of slaves, was wrecked at the mouth of the Orange river, and the captain and purser were lost in an attempt to cross the bar in a boat. On the 7th of November, 1842, to fill the office of purser thus made vacant, Mr. De Russey received an acting appointment, under the hand of Lieutenant Gardner, then the senior officer belonging to the wrecked Concord; and was duly placed in charge of the stores, moneys, accounts, and effects of the former purser. He assumed this charge under all the disadvantages consequent upon a shipwreck on a desolate coast, and fulfilled in all their details the duties of a purser to the officers and crew until they were received on board the United States ship Pennsylvania, after their arrival in the United States. His services as purser extended to the 31st of March, 1843. The pay of pursers in the Navy, as previously regulated by law, was $40 per month and two rations per day, of the value of twenty cents each. In addition to this, however, certain perquisites attached to the office, in the shape of commissions on purchases, or profits on supplies; but on the barren coast of Africa, where few supplies could be obtained, and they only from a considerable distance and at great cost, Mr. De Russey was deprived of the benefit of any such perquisites or emoluments, because he furnished the supplies at the cost of procuring them.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, read a third time, and passed.

PROTECTION TO THE TERRITORIES.

Mr. SHIELDS. A bill passed this body this morning—House bill No. 259, being "An act to provide for the protection of the Territories of New Mexico and Oregon, and the States of Texas and California,"—when I happened to be absent. Yesterday, by an amendment made to the body of the bill, "Utah" was inserted as one of the Territories to be protected, and it was omitted in the title; I wish now to amend the title so as to assimilate it to the body of the bill, and ask permission of the Senate to do so.

Mr. RUSK. You have a right to make the amendment.

The PRESIDENT. The bill can be amended as the Senator from Illinois desires, by the unanimous consent of the Senate. If there be no objection made, the title will be so amended.

No objection being made, the title was amended, accordingly.

HEIRS OF THOMAS FLETCHER, DECEASED.

The Senate proceeded, as in Committee of the Whole, to consider the bill from the House of Representatives, entitled "An act for the relief of the executors and heirs of Thomas Fletcher, deceased," which was reported from the Committee on the Judiciary, without amendment. It enacts that William M. Seddith, and Henry Daniel, the surviving executors, and Felix F. Fletcher, D. W. Fletcher, and Margaret Washington, late Margaret Fletcher, heirs of Thomas Fletcher, shall be released and discharged from a certain penal bond, in the sum of $20,000, payable to the United States, executed by said Thomas Fletcher, as one of the sureties of Carey Nichols, May 28, 1817.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to be read a third time, and being read a third time, was passed.

SYLVESTER CHURCHILL.

The bill for the relief of Sylvester Churchill was read a second time, and the Senate proceeded to consider it as in Committee of the Whole. It proposes to require the Secretary of the Treasury to pay to Sylvester Churchill, Inspector General of the United States Army, out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, $1,020 14, being the pay and emoluments of his office from July 8, 1845, to January 21, 1846, to which he is justly entitled, but which he cannot obtain as the law now stands.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment.

At the request of Mr. DAVIS, the report of the Committee on Military Affairs was read, from which it appears that Sylvester Churchill, of the United States Army, was appointed inspector-general on the 15th of September, 1841, to rank from the 25th of June of that year; and that on the 23d of August, 1842, a law was passed which, among other things, abolished the office of one of the two inspectors general of the Army. The President and Secretary of War, however, found it necessary, for reasons which they assign at length, to continue both until the 29th of April, 1845, during which time the memorialist discharged the duties of the office with acknowledged zeal and ability. On the 29th of April, 1845, the President deemed it necessary under the law alluded to, to abolish the office. The memorialist, being the junior, was honorably discharged. The necessity of the service, however, and the injustice done a meritorious officer, induced Congress to restore the office; and on the 21st of January, 1846, the memorialist was restored to his former rank and emoluments. During the interval from July, 8, 1845, to 21st January, 1846, he continued in the public employment, but by an oversight in the act which restored his office, he is unable to draw pay for that period without a special act. The amount was $1,020 14, to which he is justly entitled; and the committee concur with the War Department in recommending that justice be done in this case to a gallant and meritorious officer by the passage of a special law for his relief.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading. It was subsequently read a third time and passed.

W. K. AND APHIA JENNINGS.

The bill for the relief of W. K. and Aphia Jennings was read a second time, and the Senate proceeded to consider it, as in Committee of the Whole. It directs the Secretary of State to pay to W. K. Jennings and Aphia Jennings, in the State of Virginia, the sum of $1,120, being the assessed value of four slaves carried off by the British forces in the month of June, 1814,—being the legal representatives of William Bean, deceased, who was the representative of Sarah Ullmer, his sister, who died in his lifetime, and who had lost three slaves, Esther, and two children, the said Bean having lost a negro man named Sam,—if there be so much remaining of the sum of $1,200,409 60, paid by Great Britain to indemnify the United States for slaves and other property carried off by Great Britain during the war, and which the United States accepted in full satisfaction of the same.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment and ordered to be engrossed for a third reading. It was subsequently read a third time and passed.

ANDREW SMITH.

The Senate proceeded, as in Committee of the Whole, to consider House bill entitled "An act for the relief of Andrew Smith," which was reported from the Committee on the Post Office and Post Roads without amendment.

It proposes to direct the Secretary of the Treasury to pay to Andrew Smith, of Campbellton, in Georgia, $100, in satisfaction for two Treasury notes, specially indorsed to his order, and alleged to have been abstracted from the mail between Hamburg, Mississippi, and Campbellton, Georgia, each for $50, on his producing satisfactory evidence to the Secretary that they were so indorsed and mailed to him, and abstracted as aforesaid, and paid under a forged order of the said Smith.

Mr. BAYARD. I perceive that the report made by the committee in that case is adverse, and I therefore move that the bill be indefinitely postponed. I take it for granted that the Senator from Texas [Mr. Rusk] would not have made an adverse report, unless it was absolutely necessary.

The motion was agreed to, and the bill was indefinitely postponed.

JOHN A. BRYAN.

The joint resolution for the relief of John A. Bryan, was read a second time, and the Senate proceeded to consider it as in Committee of the Whole. It proposes to require the Secretary of War to receive proof of the number of days that John A. Bryan was engaged in the discharge of the duties of a commissioner, to make and carry into effect the treaty with the Wyandot Indians, he being appointed commissioner for the purpose aforesaid, by the Secretary of War, on the 19th of April, 1836, and pay said Bryan at the rate of eight dollars per day, for the time so engaged, out of any moneys in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, deducting therefrom any amount which he may have heretofore received for said service.

The joint resolution was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, and, being read a third time, was passed.

ELISHA W. B. MOODY.

The Senate proceeded, as in Committee of the Whole, to consider the bill to reimburse to Elisha W. B. Moody moneys paid by him as owner of the British bark Sarah in the rescue of the passengers and crew of the American ship Caleb Grimshaw. It proposes to direct the Secretary of the Treasury to audit and pay to Elisha W. B. Moody, on having satisfactory proof that he was the owner of the British bark Sarah, such sums of money as he paid for disbursements in or about the rescue of the passengers and crew of the American ship Caleb Grimshaw, which took fire at sea in 1848, and in carrying them to New York, together with damages which he actually sustained as owner by reason of his performing that humane act, to be shown to the satisfaction of the said Secretary, and not to exceed $5,000.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, and ordered to be engrossed for a third reading. It was subsequently read a third time and passed.

ORANGE AND ALEXANDRIA RAILROAD.

The Senate proceeded, as in Committee of the Whole, to consider the bill for the relief of the Orange and Alexandria Railroad Company. It proposes to direct the Secretary of the Treasury to pay to said railroad company, assignees of the Commonwealth of Virginia, $120,000 in full of money advanced by the said Commonwealth to the Government of the United States in erecting public buildings in the District of Columbia, in pursuance of an act of the General Assembly of the said Commonwealth, approved 27th December, 1790.

The following amendment was formerly submitted by Mr. BRODHEAD. To add two additional sections to the bill:

SEC. 2. And be it further enacted, That the said Secretary be further directed to pay to the State of Maryland, out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, $72,000, in full for money advanced by the said State to the United States for the same purpose mentioned in the foregoing section, in pursuance of an act of said State, entitled "An act concerning the District of Columbia and the city of Washington," approved December 19, 1791, and the resolutions of their Assembly of the previous session.

SEC. 3. And be it further enacted, That the Secretary of the Treasury be directed to pay, out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, to the treasurer of the Commonwealth of Pennsylvania, for the use of the said Commonwealth, the sum of $100,000, in full compensation for siting up, for the use and occupation by Congress and the public officers, of the public buildings in the city of Philadelphia, then belonging to the said Commonwealth.

Mr. HUNTER. I hope this will be passed over. I shall have something to say upon it when it comes up.

The bill was accordingly passed over.

MARIA TAYLOR.

The Senate proceeded, as in Committee of the Whole, to the consideration of the bill for the relief of Maria Taylor, reported from the Committee on Private Land Claims. It proposes to enact that Mrs. Maria Taylor, wife of William R. Taylor, of the parish of Ascension, State of Louisiana, claiming in her own right a certain tract of land in that parish, near its upper limits, on the left bank of the river Mississippi, containing eleven and a half arpents by forty in depth, bounded above by the land of the late Jean Louis Parent, and below by that of the late Pierre Prospere, together with the land immediately adjacent to and back of the said tract, containing twelve arpents front by forty additional in depth, with such diverging of the lateral lines as to embrace an area of five hundred acres, be confirmed in the title thereto: Provided, That this act shall only be construed as a relinquishment of the Government of all claim to the said tract of land: And provided, also, That it shall not operate against the claim of any other person to the said tract of land.

The report of the Committee on Private Land Claims was read, from which it appears that the petitioner states that she is the lawful owner and proprietor of a certain plantation situated in the parish of Ascension, State of Louisiana, near its upper limits, on the left bank of the Mississippi river, composed of two tracts mentioned in the bill; that she derived the title to one tract, as described, through sundry main conveyances from the original proprietors, whose possession commenced long anterior to the treaty of cession of Louisiana, and which have been continued uninterrupted by any subsequent owners to the present time; that the possession and occupancy of the rear tract has also been continued nearly the same length of time; but a confirmation of the title thereto could not be obtained in consequence of its being included within the limits of the survey of the Houma grant, made by one of the claimants under that grant, and that in order to remove this objection Carlos de Armas, under whom she claims, on the 26th of December, 1816, purchased from General Wade Hampton, who had acquired that grant by purchase, all his right and title to said tract. The committee are satisfied that all the material facts stated by the petitioner are established by documents on file, accompanying the petition; and, considering the long uninterrupted possession and cultivation of the land, are of opinion that the petitioner is entitled to relief, and accordingly report a bill.

Mr. FELCH. I ask that this may be laid over until next week.

The bill was accordingly passed over.

JAMES HIGGINBOTHAM.

The bill for the relief of James Higginbotham was read a second time, and considered as in Committee of the Whole. It provides that James Higginbotham be authorized to relinquish to the United States, in such form as the Commissioner of the General Land Office shall prescribe, the south half of section No. 29, township No. 81, north of range 23 west, in the district of land offered for sale at Iowa City, in the State of Iowa; and, upon the relinquishment being made, he shall be authorized to enter, in lieu thereof, the south half of section 27, in the same township, or, if the same be sold, any other half section of land subject to private entry at the land office at Iowa City.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, and ordered to be engrossed for a third reading. It was subsequently read a third time and passed.

THOMAS MARSTON TAYLOR.

The bill for the relief of Thomas Marston Taylor was read a second time, and considered as in Committee of the Whole. It proposes to direct the proper accounting officers of the Treasury to allow to Thomas Marston Taylor, a purser in the United States Navy, in the settlement of his accounts, such deficiency as shall be shown to exist by reason of his making deposits of Treasury notes in the Phoenix bank, Charlestown, Massachusetts, subsequently to the month of April, 1842; and shall also allow to him such reasonable and proper expenses as he has actually incurred and paid in prosecuting any suit brought to enforce the supposed priority of the claim of the United States over other creditors, upon the just assets of the bank in the hands of the trustees; evidence thereof being furnished by the said Taylor to the accounting officers.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, and ordered to be engrossed for a third reading. It was subsequently read a third time and passed.

JOHN J. SYKES.

The bill for the relief of John J. Sykes was read a second time, and considered as in Committee of the Whole. It proposes to direct the Postmaster General to cause to be paid to John J. Sykes, or his legal representatives, such sum of money as may appear to be due to him for services rendered and disbursements made by him, as assistant mail agent in California, from October 19th, 1850, to December 25th of the same year, on the production of satisfactory vouchers, showing that such services were actually rendered and disbursements made.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, and ordered to be engrossed for a third reading. It was subsequently read a third time and passed.

WADE ALLEN.

The bill for the relief of Wade Allen was read a second time, and considered as in Committee of the Whole. It proposes to direct the Postmaster General to adjust and settle the claim of Wade Allen, deceased, for extra services performed as contractor under the firm of Allen & Kitchen, in transporting the mail from Montgomery to Mobile, in the State of Alabama, during the years 1844 and 1845, and to allow and pay to the legal representatives of Wade Allen a just and legal compensation for the extra services performed by him in carrying the mails one month in each of those years over that route on a different schedule, and in a less time than he was required to do by his contract; that compensation to be estimated by reference to the original contract and the special contract, if any such shall be proved to have been made in relation to the performance of such extra services.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, and ordered to be engrossed for a third reading. It was subsequently read a third time, and passed.

WILLIAM P. S. SANGER.

The bill for the relief of William P. S. Sanger was read a second time, and considered as in Committee of the Whole. It proposes to direct the proper accounting officers of the Treasury to pay to William P. S. Sanger the same rate of compensation for the time he was employed as engineer at the Norfolk navy-yard, as was allowed by the act of Congress, approved September 28th, 1850, to James Heron, for services which he had rendered at the Pensacola navy-yard.

Mr. BAYARD. I ask for the reading of the report in that case.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. (Mr. BRIGHT in the chair.) There is no report.

Mr. GWIN. There is no report, but there is a letter from the Navy Department which I ask may be read.

The Secretary accordingly read a letter from the Chief of the Bureau of Yards and Docks, stating that Mr. Sanger performed the services referred to; that he performed them to the satisfaction of the Bureau, and that he asks merely the same allowance as was made by Congress to the civil engineers at the New York and Pensacola navy-yards for similar services, and the Bureau recommend the allowance of the claim.

Mr. WALKER. I wish the Senate to understand that this is one of a class of cases where it is proposed to allow compensation to an officer because he happened to perform duty.

Mr. GWIN. Additional duty.

Mr. WALKER. It is additional compensation for performing duty.

Mr. GWIN. Additional compensation for performing additional duty.

Mr. WALKER. This person was required to perform duties as civil engineer at the Norfolk navy-yard.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator object to the consideration of the bill?

Mr. WALKER. No, sir. I wish simply to remind the Senate of what they are doing. I do not wish to see a principle established by which we are to pay additional compensation to every man in office who happens to perform some duty.

Mr. FELCH. I would like to inquire of the chairman of the committee who reported this bill, whether any compensation was ever before given for these services?

Mr. GWIN. If the gentleman had attended to the reading of the letter from the Chief of the Bureau of Yards and Docks, he would have seen that the proposition is to give to this officer precisely the same compensation which was given to officers at New York and Pensacola for services like those performed by Mr. Sanger. This is the third instance of the kind; and Mr. Sanger is the only officer who has not been paid additional compensation for those additional services.

Mr. FELCH. The Senator does not understand my inquiry. I wish to know whether any bill ever passed before providing for the payment of this individual for these services?

Mr. GWIN. No, sir.

Mr. FELCH. I find that two bills have been passed for the relief of William P. S. Sanger. I do not know whether it is the same individual or not. My inquiry is whether those bills were passed providing compensation for the same services. I think it would be better to let the subject lie over in order to examine it.

Mr. PEARCE. This bill is for an entirely different purpose from the bills referred to by the Senator from Michigan. Those bills were passed for the relief of Messrs. Sanger & De la Roche.

Mr. GWIN. This gentleman is one of the most worthy officers in the employment of the Government. I have examined this claim very thoroughly, and I was at first under the impression that the Naval Committee had accompanied the bill with a report. At any rate, the committee unanimously recommend the passage of the bill. They believed he was entitled to the additional compensation, as other officers who performed similar services had received it.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, and ordered to be engrossed for a third reading. It was subsequently read a third time and passed.

WILLIAM G. WILLIAMS.

The bill for the relief of the legal representatives of Captain William G. Williams was read a second time and considered as in Committee of the Whole. It proposes to authorize the proper accounting officers of the Treasury to adjust and settle the accounts of the late Captain William G. Williams, of the Corps of Topographical Engineers, and to allow the amount of certain vouchers alleged to have been lost in consequence of Captain Williams having been killed in the battle of Monterey; not exceeding $300, the balance appearing against him; and that the three months' extra pay allowed by the act of July, 1848, be paid to the widow or orphan children of said Williams.

Mr. PRATT. I propose to amend the bill by adding at the end of it these words: "out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated."

The amendment was agreed to, the bill was reported to the Senate as amended, the amendment was concurred in, and the bill was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading. It was subsequently read a third time and passed.

FRANCIS B. STOCKTON.

The bill for the relief of Francis B. Stockton was read a second time and considered as in Committee of the Whole. It proposes to direct the proper accounting officer to pay to Francis B. Stockton, a purser in the United States Navy, the sum of $67 57, being the amount of losses sustained by him by reason of making his deposits of public moneys in the Phoenix Bank of Charlestown, Massachusetts.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, and ordered to be engrossed for a third reading. It was subsequently read a third time and passed.

WALTER COLTON.

The bill for the relief of the legal representatives of Walter Colton was read a second time and considered as in Committee of the Whole. It proposes to direct the Secretary of the Treasury to pay to the legal representatives of the late Walter Colton, the sum of $7,865 33, being the amount deposited by him in the Treasury of the United States, above the net amount for which the prize ship Admirante was purchased by his agent.

Mr. GWIN objected to the consideration of the bill; and it was passed over.

Mr. HAMLIN subsequently rose and said: The Senator from California a short time ago, when the bill for the relief of the legal representatives of Walter Colton was under consideration, interposed an objection, and it was passed over. He has consented to withdraw his objection, and has requested me to call up the bill.

The Senate resumed the consideration of the bill as in Committee of the Whole.

Mr. DAVIS. That bill led to a pretty sharp discussion last year. The Senator from Maine, [Mr. BRADBURY,] who reported it from the Committee on the Judiciary, is not here; and I think perhaps it would be better to pass it over.

Mr. SHIELDS. The principal opposition made to this bill, on a former occasion, was by myself.

Afterwards, upon a thorough investigation of the question, I felt that I had not understood it at the time I objected to it; and I determined that if it ever came up again, I should not make any opposition to it. I saw Mr. Colton, after I opposed the bill. He called upon me, and laid his papers before me, and I went through an examination of them. He is now dead; and the bill now provides for paying the amount to his legal representatives. I make this statement, because I recollect that formerly I opposed the claim very violently; and afterwards, upon a thorough examination of it, I felt that it was a just one.

Mr. DAVIS. I did not make the objection on my own account. I do not know that I have any opinion about the bill. I recollect that there were gentlemen who opposed the claim, and I wished to state that fact. I withdraw any objection which I have made to the bill, if other gentlemen are satisfied.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, and ordered to be engrossed for a third reading. It was subsequently read a third time and passed.

WILLIAM GRAYSON.

The PRESIDING OFFICER announced that the next bill upon the Calendar was one for the relief of the heirs of Colonel William Grayson.

Mr. UPHAM. There is some dispute about that bill, and I ask that it may be passed over.

It was passed over.

ANN C. BELKNAP.

The bill granting a pension to Mrs. Ann C. Belknap was read a second time and considered as in Committee of the Whole. It proposes to require the Secretary of the Interior to place the name of Mrs. Ann C. Belknap, widow of the late Brigadier William G. Belknap, on the list of pensioners, and pay her a pension per month at the rate of half the monthly pay to which her late husband was entitled at the time of his death; the pension to commence on the 1st of January, 1852; and to continue during her widowhood.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment and ordered to be engrossed for a third reading.

It was subsequently read a third time and passed.

SANTIAGO E. ARGUELLO.

The bill for the relief of Santiago E. Arguello was read a second time and considered as in Committee of the Whole. It proposes to direct the Secretary of the Treasury to pay to Santiago E. Arguello, late a captain in the California battalion, the sum of $11,548 for losses of property sustained by him during the period of said service, and in consequence thereof.

Mr. HALE called for the reading of the report, and it was accordingly read. From the report it appears that Captain Arguello was a wealthy and influential inhabitant of California, residing in the vicinity of San Diego. On the invasion of the country during the Mexican war, and on the appearance of the proclamation of Commodore Stockton, then in command of that division of the American forces, Arguello placed himself at the head of a company raised through his influence and exertions, and immediately joined the United States forces, and fought with distinguished bravery upon several occasions under the command of Commodore Stockton, who fully attests his gallantry and the importance of his services. On November 25, 1846, he was appointed by Commodore Stockton a captain of riflemen in the California battalion, and on January 16, a member of the legislative council of the Territory. In consequence of his attachment to the cause of the United States, and the zeal and activity which he manifested in their service, his rancho was ravaged and laid waste, his buildings burned, and his cattle and other movable effects taken away by the enemy, by which he appears to have been reduced from competency and wealth to penury and dependence. The commissioner appointed by H. Fitch, esq., Alcalde of San Diego, to examine and report upon the losses of Arguello, stated under oath, after a personal examination, that the personal property thus destroyed by the enemy amounted, at the lowest value, to $14,888. The committee reduced some of the items so as to allow but $11,548, and consider that sum justly due to Captain Arguello. Accompanying the report are some letters of Commodore Stockton, showing his appreciation of the services of Captain Arguello. The report refers to a case in 1818, where a report was made by a committee of the House of Representatives in favor of a claim of the same nature. The Senate Committee on Claims in the second session of the Twenty-first Congress adopted the same principle in their report on the case of John Daly, a Canadian refugee, and on that report a bill was passed granting to John Daly $5,000 for supplies furnished and assistance rendered to the Army of the United States in Canada.

Mr. DAWSON. The principle involved in this bill is one which I have not considered. It would seem, from the report, that there have been some cases prior to this, in which the Government has adopted a similar principle. I do not know whether, on examination, it would turn out that the cases involved the same principle. Suppose an enemy were to enter our country, and one of our citizens should join him, and thus become a traitor to his own country, and take up the cause of those who are invading us, are we to place him in a condition where he could, with equity and justice, require a foreign Government to pay him for any losses occasioned by his course towards this Government? I am not prepared to adopt this principle, nor can I consider it correct in morals. When we invade a foreign country, and one of their citizens joins us, and then claims the protection of this Government against his own people, for confiscating his own goods, ought we to remunerate him? That is the whole amount of this transaction.

Now, sir, I maintain that the Government of Mexico, during the whole time that the war was going on, had a right to confiscate the property of this man, if he was one of their citizens, and deserted their standard, and took sides against his own country. I do not think we are bound, by any consideration of natural law, national law, or of morals, to interpose and protect him. I do not desire to go into the discussion now. I hope the bill may be passed over for the present.

Mr. BRODHEAD. One word before the bill is passed over. The Government of the United States had the benefit of this man's services; his property was destroyed in consequence of his attachment to our cause; and if the honorable Senator from Georgia will listen to the letter of Commodore Stockton, I think he will withdraw his objection.

Mr. BAYARD. I suppose the bill will have to be passed over; but I would ask the Senator from Georgia to look into the facts of the case. I think the case is one of great merit; indeed, I think the sum recommended by the committee is less than ought to be allowed.

Mr. DAWSON. I do not know that, upon examination, I shall be opposed to the claim. At present I am disposed unfavorably towards it; but I should like to have an opportunity of examining it, and ascertaining whether this principle has ever been recognized by the Government before.

Mr. GWIN. This gentleman is one of my constituents, and I will say a word in regard to him, as the remarks of the Senator from Georgia may be misunderstood. The Senator says that this man turned traitor to his own country. Why, sir, the people in California then were in a state of revolution. The Californians were fighting against the Mexican Government, and were revolutionizing the Government. In the midst of this revolution the proclamation of war reached California, and the United States took possession of the country. This individual, because he was prominent in opposition to the Mexican Government, independent of our contest, was punished by the destruction of his property. It is one of the most meritorious claims ever brought before the Congress of the United States.

Mr. SEWARD. I feel bound to move that this bill lie over till next Friday.

Mr. DAWSON. If the report had presented the facts as set forth by the Senator from California, the case would have been different, but there is nothing in the report about an existing revolution.

Mr. BRODHEAD. If the gentleman had listened to the letter of Commodore Stockton, he would have seen what were the facts.

Mr. DAWSON and Mr. HALE. Let the bill lie over.

The bill was passed over.

JACOB BANTA.

The bill to enable Jacob Banta to locate two revolutionary bounty land certificates was considered as in Committee of the Whole. It proposes to authorize Jacob Banta to enter and locate one hundred and sixty acres of land in any land district in Illinois or Iowa, on any lands subject to private entry, at the minimum price, upon presenting and surrendering at such office revolutionary bounty land certificates, numbered 3,178 and 3,182, issued under the act of Congress of May 30th, 1830.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment and ordered to be engrossed for a third reading.

HENRY C. MILLER AND OTHERS.

The bill for the relief of Henry C. Miller, Philip W. Thompson, and Jesse B. Turley, was read a second time and considered as in Committee of the Whole. It proposes to authorize the Superintendent of Indian Affairs at St. Louis, Missouri, to receive proof as to and inquire into the quantity and value of oxen and other property taken from Henry C. Miller, Philip Thompson, and Jesse B. Turley by the Osages or other tribes of Indians, in the month of June, 1847, while traveling from the State of Missouri to Santa Fé; that if the Superintendent shall find that the Osages, or other Indians receiving annuities from the United States, forcibly took said oxen from Miller, Thompson, and Turley, then the Superintendent is required to retain from the annuities of the Indians an amount sufficient to indemnify Miller, Thompson, and Turley for the loss of their property. It further provides, that if it shall appear from the proof before the Superintendent that the depredations were committed by Indians not receiving annuities from the United States, it shall be the duty of the Superintendent of Indian Affairs to report his proceedings, together with all the evidence and proof in the case, to the Commissioner of Indian Affairs, together with his opinion as to the value of the property, in order that the same may be paid out of the Treasury of the United States; and that in the examination of the claim the Superintendent shall proceed according to the provisions of the "Act regulating trade and intercourse with the Indian tribes and to preserve peace on the frontiers," approved June 30, 1834.

Mr. ADAMS. I ask that the bill may be passed over, as I intend to discuss it.

The bill was accordingly passed over.

ISAAC ADAMS.

The bill for the relief of Isaac Adams was read a second time. It proposes to enact that the letters-patent granted to Isaac Adams on the 14th of October, 1830, for a new and useful improvement in the printing machine, called the "power printing-press," and also the letters-patent granted to Isaac Adams on the 2d of March, 1836, for additional improvements in the power printing-press, be extended for the period of fourteen years.

Mr. ADAMS. I am opposed to all these bills. I intend to make a general speech on the subject of the extension of patents.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The bill giving rise to discussion will be passed over.

GEORGE DENNETT.

The bill for the relief of George Dennett, of Portsmouth, New Hampshire, was read a second time and considered as in Committee of the Whole. It proposes to direct the Secretary of the Treasury to pay to George Dennett the sum of $75 in full for services performed by him in bringing up arrears of business in the naval office, at Portsmouth, New Hampshire, at a time when there was no naval officer.

Mr. BAYARD. I shall object to that bill. It appears to me, as far as I can judge from reading the report, that it is a case in which the party accepted the situation of naval officer, and an attempt is made to give him extra compensation, because the books of the office had not been brought up for about three months anterior to the appointment. I shall certainly object to this claim, and I ask that it may be passed over.

Mr. HAMLIN. I hope the Senator will allow the report to be read.

Mr. BAYARD. I have no objection to hearing the report read.

At the request of Mr. HAMLIN the report of the Committee on Commerce was read, from which it appears that George Dennett was appointed naval officer for the port of Portsmouth, New Hampshire; that he took the oath prescribed by law, and entered on the discharge of his official duties on the 13th of March, 1849; that the office of naval officer was vacant from the 18th of December, 1838, to the 13th of March, 1839; that it therefore became Mr. Dennett's duty to bring up the arrears of business for the time the office was vacant, for which he received no compensation. In pursuance of the recommendation of the Secretary of the Treasury, and from the fact that, in the opinion of the committee, Mr. Dennett is justly and equitably entitled to compensation for that service, the committee report a bill for his relief.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Delaware withdraw his objection?

Mr. BAYARD. No, sir, I shall certainly oppose the bill whenever it comes up. It seems to me that the principle on which it is based is utterly unsustainable.

The bill was passed over.

HEIRS OF JAMES BELL.

The bill to amend an act entitled "An act for the relief of the heirs of James Bell, deceased," was read a second time and considered as in Committee of the Whole. It proposes to enact that the proviso to the "Act for the relief of the heirs of James Bell, deceased," approved June 30, 1834, so far as the same prevents the payment to the heirs or legal representatives of the full amount found to be due to them by the proper accounting officers, under the provisions of the act of 1834, be repealed; and that the full amount found to be due on said account, adjusted in the manner prescribed in that act, be paid to the legal representatives of James Bell.

Mr. BAYARD. That bill, if I understand the report—and I have read it very hastily while other cases were being considered—includes the allowance of interest, and defends the principle of allowing interest on all revolutionary claims. I certainly shall discuss that question.

The bill was accordingly passed over.

JOHN MOORE WHITE.

The bill for the relief of John Moore White was read a second time, and considered as in Committee of the Whole. It proposes to direct the Secretary of the Treasury to pay to John Moore White, the son and sole heir of John White, a major in the army of the Revolution, who was slain at the battle of Germantown, the seven years' half pay to which Major White, had he not died, would have been entitled by a resolve of Congress, passed August 4, 1780, together with such interest thereon as would now be due, if a certificate for the said seven years' half pay had been issued under the operation of the funding act, and no payment made thereon.

Mr. ADAMS. I desire to discuss this bill.

Mr. MILLER. I hope the Senator will allow the bill to be considered now.

Mr. ADAMS. If the interest is stricken out, I shall not discuss the bill. I merely propose to discuss the question of allowance of interest.

Mr. MILLER. I have no objection to amendments being offered and acted upon; but I will state that this old gentleman is over eighty years of age, is very poor, and blind, and this bill, to be of any service to him, should be passed immediately.

Mr. ADAMS. I think this whole matter is founded in error.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The rule is very clear, that if debate arises upon a bill, it must be passed over.

Mr. WALKER. A number of bills on the Calendar are of the same character, and I wish to observe to gentlemen who are making these objections, that these claims are all based upon a solemn promise of the Government, under resolutions passed in 1780, 1782, 1783, and 1784, I believe, that interest would be paid. It is a solemn contract of Government, and it does seem to me extraordinary that, at this day, gentlemen should object to fulfilling the promises of Government, made to these old revolutionary soldiers.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The bill, giving rise to discussion, must be laid over.

WILLIAM JONES.

The bill for the relief of the legal representatives of William Jones was read a second time, and considered as in Committee of the Whole. It proposes to direct the Secretary of the Treasury to cause to be paid to the legal representatives of William Jones, late of Massachusetts, the amount which he would have been entitled to receive under the pension act of 1818, had his name continued on the pension roll until June 22, 1829, the day of his death.

Mr. ADAMS called for the reading of the report of the Committee on Revolutionary Claims; and it was accordingly read.

From the report it appears that William Jones was a soldier in the war of the Revolution; that he served as a sergeant for more than eighteen months; that he received no bounty, gratuity, or pension from the General Government on account of his services; that he was entitled to a pension under the act of 18th March, 1818; that his name was inscribed on the pension roll under that act, at the rate of ninety-six dollars per annum, to commence August 16, 1819; that, before any payment was made to him on account of his pension, it was suspended, for some cause unknown. The Committee consider that it is right and proper to allow the representatives of the deceased the pension to which he would have been entitled had his name been kept upon the pension roll, and he received his pension until the day of his death.

Mr. BAYARD. I should like to have an explanation of one fact stated in the report before I can vote for the bill. It appears, from the report, that the name of William Jones was inscribed on the pension roll, at the rate of $96 per annum, to commence on the 16th of August, 1819; but that, before any payment was made to him on account of his pension, his pension was suspended for some cause unknown. I should suppose that the cause might be ascertained from the Department. It is not probable that the pension was suspended without cause; and if there was cause, we should know what it was. It may have been sufficient. I object to the bill unless there is some explanation on that head. It does not appear from the report, that any application was made to the Department to know for what cause the party was stricken off the pension roll. It certainly ought to be known.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The bill giving rise to debate will be laid over.

URIAH JONES.

The bill for the relief of the legal representatives of Uriah Jones was read a second time, and considered as in Committee of the Whole. It proposes to direct the Secretary of the Treasury to pay to the legal representatives of Uriah Jones, late of Providence, Rhode Island, the sum of $1,180, being the amount he would have been entitled to receive had his name been placed upon the pension roll, under the act of 1832, agreeably to his application.

Mr. FELCH called for the reading of the report of the Committee on Revolutionary Claims; and it was accordingly read.

From the report it appears that Uriah Jones enlisted in the Rhode Island continental line, in the company of Captain Humphreys, attached to the regiment under the command of Colonel Angell, in March, 1777, and continued to serve until September 24, 1782, when, in consequence of some misunderstanding with Captain Allen, who at that time commanded the company, he, with several others, left the army, and returned to their homes; that he was in actual service nearly six years; was engaged in several battles, among which were those of Springfield, Red Bank, and Yorktown; that he was several times wounded; and, at the time of his death, had two balls in him; that he never received any gratuity, pension, or bounty from the General Government on account of his services; that he made application to the Commissioner of Pensions to be placed on the pension-roll, under the act of 1832, but his name having appeared on the Rhode Island roll as a deserter, his claim to a pension was rejected. Under the act of June 27, 1832, all privates who served six years during the war of the Revolution, were to be allowed a pension for life, at the rate of $80 per annum. The question as to whether the party was entitled to a pension turned upon the fact as to whether he could be considered a deserter. The committee consider that it is proved by the evidence very clearly that he was not a deserter; that he did not leave the army until long after actual hostilities had ceased; that he left in consequence of a misunderstanding with his captain; and therefore that he ought not to be considered as cut off from the operation of the act of 1832.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, and ordered to be engrossed for a third reading.

THE AMISTAD CASE.

The bill to indemnify the masters and owners of the Spanish schooner Amistad and her cargo was announced to be the next bill in order.

Mr. SEWARD intimating a wish to debate it, it was passed over.

JOHN MCINTOSH.

The Senate proceeded, as in Committee of the Whole, to consider the bill from the House of Representatives for the relief of John McIntosh. It proposes to direct the Secretary of the Interior to place the name of John McIntosh, of Montgomery county, Kentucky, on the roll of invalid pensioners at the rate of eight dollars per month; the pension to commence on the 4th of March, 1848, and continue during his natural life.

Mr. ADAMS called for the reading of the report.

The report of the Committee on Invalid Pensions of the House of Representatives was accordingly read, from which it appears that John McIntosh enlisted as a soldier in 1813 in Captain Henry Daniel's company of infantry; that he marched immediately to Seneca, Ohio, and joined the forces under the command of General William Henry Harrison; that he proceeded from thence with the troops on a forced march to Lower Sandusky, thence to Canada, and thence to the Thames; in which battle he was engaged. At the expiration of twelve months, the time of his enlistment, he was discharged from the service. While in the service in the line of his duty, on the forced march referred to, he received an injury in the right leg, producing a rupture of the muscle, from the effects of which he never recovered, but which continues to grow worse as he advances in life. Two good surgeons, of respectable character, in the State of Kentucky, state that his disability is total. The committee therefore report a bill for his relief.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to a third reading, read a third time, and passed.

SAMUEL W. CHILSON.

The bill for the relief of Samuel W. Chilson was read a second time, and considered as in Committee of the Whole. It proposes to direct the Secretary of the Treasury to pay to Samuel W. Chilson the full amount of three months' pay, at the rate of $600 per annum, as compensation for damage sustained by him in consequence of his being discharged from duty as mail agent on the railroad from Boston to Springfield without any previous notice, or without any charge of misconduct or delinquency preferred against him, in violation of the contract entered into by him with the Postmaster General, dated July 23, 1840, entitling him to such notice.

Mr. ADAMS called for the reading of the report of the Committee on the Post Office and Post Roads, from which it appeared that on the 23d of July, 1840, the Postmaster General entered into a contract in writing with the petitioner, Samuel W. Chilson, whereby the petitioner engaged to serve the Department as mail agent on the railroad from Boston to Springfield, to take charge of the mails, to receive and deliver the mails at the intermediate offices, and to perform other services specified in the contract, for which he was to be paid $600 per annum. The contract was for one year, and it contained a provision that the petitioner should give three months' notice before he quitted the service, and that the Postmaster General should give him like notice before he discharged him, providing, however, that he might be discharged at any time for palpable delinquency in the discharge of his duties. The contract was continued by consent of both parties, and the petitioner remained in the service of the Department until February 28, 1842, when he was discharged without any previous notice, or any charge or claim of misconduct or delinquency; but it appears by the statement of the Department that the Postmaster General and the railroad company, not being able to agree on the terms for the transportation of the mail over the railroad, the mail was withdrawn from that company, and transported for a short time in some other way. This was assigned as a reason for discharging the petitioner. This was a contingency that was not foreseen or provided for in the contract, and in the opinion of the committee it does not take away the right of the petitioner under the contract. He was not a public officer, but merely performing a service under a contract, and has the same claim for breach of contract as he would have had if the contract had been with an individual. The committee, therefore, report a bill for his relief.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, and ordered to be engrossed for a third reading.

CREW OF THE MISSOURI.

The bill for the relief of the petty officers and seamen of the late United States frigate Missouri, was read a second time and considered as in Committee of the Whole. It proposes to direct the proper accounting officers of the Treasury to pay to each of the petty officers, seamen, marines, and others composing the crew of the United States frigate Missouri, at the time that ship was burned in the harbor of Gibraltar, in August, 1843, the sum of $75, in consideration of the loss of clothing and other personal effects, sustained by them in consequence of their exertions in endeavoring to preserve the property of the United States.

Mr. BORLAND. Within the last three or four years several cases have been before the Senate, not precisely like this, but involving the same principle, and my impression is, that they have been invariably rejected. There is now pending a claim of the officers of the brig Somers, which was lost at Vera Cruz. I must object to the consideration of this bill.

The bill was passed over.

THOMAS J. PAGE.

The bill for the relief of Thomas J. Page was read a second time, and considered as in Committee of the Whole.

It proposes to require the proper accounting officers of the Treasury to audit and adjust the account of Lieutenant Thomas J. Page, of the United States Navy, for his expenses in preparing his accounts as acting purser of the United States brig Dolphin, and to pay the same, provided the amount to be thus paid shall not exceed $75.

Mr. DAVIS called for the reading of the report of the Committee on Naval Affairs; and it was accordingly read.

From that report it appears that the memorialist alleged that in October, 1849, while on the East India station, he was appointed to command the brig Dolphin, and with the command was connected the appointment of purser; that he performed the duty of purser on board the vessel, and adjusted accounts for the Government as acting purser, and submits an account of the time he was employed, for which he claims compensation at the rate of $1,500 per annum, making the sum of $3,037 92. The report of the committee, which was made by Mr. MALLORY, goes into the whole question of allowances to naval officers, and comes to the conclusion that the memorialist is not entitled to pay as purser for performing the duties of purser while acting in command of the brig Dolphin; but, inasmuch as he was subjected to some expenses in preparing statements of accounts beyond the sphere of his ordinary and legitimate duty, the committee report a bill for his relief to that extent.

Mr. DAVIS. I do not know that I have any objection to the bill. I believe, from hearing the report read, that the committee arrived at a very correct conclusion in regard to the general principle. That is, that a person commanding a small vessel is not entitled to the pay of a purser because he performs the duties of purser. The committee propose, however, to make some allowance in consequence of some extra expenses to which the officer was put on account of preparing books and matters of that sort. To that I have no objection.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, and ordered to be engrossed for a third reading. It was subsequently read a third time and passed.

HEIRS OF BENJAMIN O. MOOERS.

The bill for the relief of Benjamin O. Mooers, deceased, late a lieutenant in Colonel Hazen's regiment of the revolutionary army, was announced as the next bill in order.

Mr. BAYARD gave notice that he should discuss the bill, and it was accordingly passed over.

MATTHEWS, WOOD, AND HALL.

The bill from the House of Representatives for the relief of Charles S. Matthews, Charles Wood, and James Hall, was announced to be the next bill in order.

Mr. BRODHEAD intimated a desire to discuss it, and it was laid over.

JOHN DEVLIN.

The Senate proceeded to consider, as in Committee of the Whole, the bill for the relief of John Devlin. It proposes to direct the Secretary of the Treasury to cause to be audited and settled, by the proper accounting officers, the account of John Devlin for services rendered as temporary clerk in the office of the Fifth Auditor, in the years 1837 and 1838, and to pay him such sum as may be found equitably due for such service, not exceeding $1,366.

Mr. SHIELDS: As the Senator from Indiana, [Mr. WHITCOMB,] who introduced the bill is not present, I wish to state that it has passed the Senate already three times, I believe, but failed in the House. Mr. Devlin was employed as clerk under Mr. Pleasanton, in the Fifth Auditor's Bureau, under the promise that when the usual appropriation for that Bureau should be made, he would receive a salary at the rate of $1,000 per year. He was employed for sixteen months, but by misapprehension, when the appropriation was made, it was not sufficient to cover his case. The service was performed at the request of the head of the Bureau. The committee in their report refer to former cases, and conclude with the recommendation that the petitioner, having rendered valuable and faithful services for which he has not received compensation, ought to be paid.

Mr. DAWSON. I perceive that the Senator from Delaware reported the bill this year.

Mr. E. YARD. I did report the bill at this session; I examined the facts of the case, and think they are very clear. I did not think it necessary to make any written report, because there were previous reports made in favor of the claim.

Mr. HALE. I do not object to this bill, but I do not know but that it will be obnoxious to some of the arguments which the Senator from Arkansas [Mr. BORLAND] made against the deficiency bill. [Laughter.]

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, and ordered to be engrossed for a third reading.

JOHN McAVOY.

The bill for the relief of John McAvoy was read a second time, and considered as in Committee of the Whole. It proposes to direct the Secretary of War to cause to be paid to John McAvoy, late a private in company H, of the 8th regiment of United States infantry, the sum of $20, which sum was paid, by McAvoy for transportation from Brazos de Santiago, to New Orleans, while in the service of the United States.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, and ordered to be engrossed for a third reading.

NATHAN WESTON.

The bill for the relief of Nathan Weston, jr., late additional paymaster in the Army of the United States, was read a second time, and considered as in Committee of the Whole. It proposes to direct the accounting officers to pay to Nathan Weston, jr., the full amount of three months' extra pay, in conformity with the fifth section of the act of July 19, 1848.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, and ordered to be engrossed for a third reading.

BOUTON, WRIGHT, AND FISHER.

The bill for the relief of Richard M. Bouton, George Wright, and the widow of Marvin W. Fisher, was read a second time, and considered as in Committee of the Whole. It proposes to direct the Secretary of the Treasury to pay to Richard M. Bouton, George Wright, and Harriet F. Fisher, widow of Marvin W. Fisher, the sum of $5,000 each, as a full compensation for the past use of their machines for making and charging percussion caps in the arsenals of the United States; and also for the future free and undisputed use by the Government of those machines, together with the patent rights thereof.

Mr. HALE. I do not rise to oppose the bill, but to call attention to the fact that another bill has been reported, which partly covers this case; that there are conflicting claims here.

Mr. BORLAND. A single word will, I think, satisfy the Senator from New Hampshire. The other bill to which he alludes was laid on the table, this having been subsequently reported in order to cover the whole ground, and make an equitable arrangement of the whole matter. The other bill was laid on the table to make way for this.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, and ordered to be engrossed for a third reading.

JAMES W. CAMPBELL.

The Senate proceeded to consider, as in Committee of the Whole, the bill from the House of Representatives for the relief of James W. Campbell, of Pike county, Missouri. It provides that James W. Campbell, of Pike county, Missouri, be authorized to enter, free of charge, any of the public lands subject to private entry, at $1 25 per acre, subject to sale at the land office for the district of Palmyra, in the State of Missouri, not exceeding one hundred and twenty acres, upon making proof to the satisfaction of the register and receiver of that land office, subject to the approval of the Commissioner of the General Land Office, that he is the legal assignee of John J. Jackson; and that two receipts, numbered 19,513 and 19,514, dated June 26, 1838, purporting to be issued by A. Byrd, receiver at Palmyra, in favor of Jackson, one for $50, and one for $100, surrendering the said receipts to the United States, and executing a relinquishment of all his right, title, and interest to the land therein described.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to a third reading, read a third time, and passed.

GIDEON HOTCHKISS.

The bill for the relief of Gideon Hotchkiss was read a second time, and considered as in Committee of the Whole. It proposes to enact that the letters-patent granted to Gideon Hotchkiss, a citizen of the United States, on the 9th of January, 1837, for a new and useful improvement in the construction of reacting water-wheels and other appendages, for the term of fourteen years from November 30, 1836, be renewed, revived, and extended, from and after the date of the passage of the act, for and during the term of seven years: Provided, however, That such renewed and extended patent shall be open to legal inquiry, as if issued under the general law: And provided, also, That all persons now enjoying the lawful use of any water-wheel or improvement prior to the patent of Gideon Hotchkiss, and purchasers of any such water-wheel, or improvement lawfully constructed, may continue to use the same, notwithstanding the provisions of this act.

Mr. BORLAND. I do not propose to offer any amendment to this bill, but I think it ought to be discussed.

Mr. BRODHEAD. If my friend from Arkansas will allow the report to be read, I think he can have no objection to the bill. This man would have the right to have his patent extended at the Patent Office, but there was a misunderstanding, which prevented him from doing so.

Mr. BORLAND. Then I withdraw my objection.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, and ordered to be engrossed for a third reading.

WILLIAM R. NEVINS.

The bill for the relief of William R. Nevins was read a second time, and considered as in Committee of the Whole. It proposes to enact, that so much of the eighteenth section of an act entitled "An act to promote the progress of the useful arts, and to repeal all acts and parts of acts made for that purpose," passed on the 4th of July, 1836, as prevents the extension of a patent after the expiration of the term for which it was originally issued, be suspended so far as shall be necessary to authorize the renewal of the patent of William R. Nevins, of the city of New York, for his invention of what is denominated in his letters-patent, "A certain machine for rolling and cutting crackers and biscuit," dated March 2d, 1836, and reissued May 9th, 1848, subject, however, to all other restrictions and conditions in that act contained.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, and ordered to be engrossed for a third reading.

On motion, the Senate adjourned till Monday.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

FRIDAY, July 16, 1852.

The House met at eleven o'clock, a. m. Prayer by the Rev. C. M. BUTLER.

The Journal of yesterday was read and approved.

The SPEAKER. The business first in order is House bill No. 271, "granting the right of way and a portion of the public lands to the States of Florida and Alabama for the construction of certain railroads in said States."

Mr. SEYMOUR, of New York. I ask the unanimous consent of the House, that the bill which came from the Senate, entitled "An act to amend an act entitled 'An act to provide for the better security of the lives of passengers on board of vessels propelled in whole or in part by steam, and for other purposes,'" be taken from the Speaker's table and referred to the Committee on Commerce. It is a very long bill, containing forty-seven sections. I ask its reference now, that that committee may have time to examine it. [Cries of "Agreed!" "Agreed!"]

The bill was then read a first and second time by its title, referred to the Committee on Commerce, and ordered to be printed.

HOOR OF MEETING.

Mr. CHANDLER. I ask the unanimous consent of the House to introduce the following resolution, which, in my opinion, is of the nature of a privileged question:

Resolved, That on Monday next, and thereafter during the present session of Congress, this House will meet at ten o'clock in the morning, and that there shall be a recess from three to five p. m., each day.

Objection was made, and the resolution was not admitted.

FURNITURE FOR THE HALL.

Mr. SWEETSER. I ask the unanimous consent of the House to introduce the following resolution. I think it is one that should be offered as a privileged question, but whether it be so or not, I am confident it will meet with the approbation of the House:

Resolved, That the Clerk of this House is hereby authorized to purchase new sofas, or settees, and chairs for the hall of the House, and such other necessary furniture as, in his judgment, may be wanted for the convenience of members, with as little delay as possible.

Mr. DUNCAN. Where are they to be placed? Mr. SWEETSER. Instead of the old ones. I hope the old sofas may be removed, for they are a disgrace to the House.

Mr. LETCHER objected.

Mr. SWEETSER. I insist that as this resolution provides for the convenience of members of this House, it is a privileged question.

The SPEAKER. The Chair thinks differently from the gentleman from Ohio, and so decides.

COMPENSATION OF THE CLERKS.

Mr. WELCH. I ask the unanimous consent of the House to submit the following resolution, which I am instructed to report to the House by the Committee on Accounts:

Resolved, That John A. Parker, John Hunnicut, and M. Martin, be allowed the same compensation as assistant clerks of the House of Representatives—say $1,500 per annum—for the present session of Congress.

Mr. BRIGGS. I am in favor of the resolution, but would suggest to the gentleman to modify his resolution to make it extend to this Congress instead of this session.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the introduction of the resolution?

At the request of Mr. FOWLER, the Clerk again read the resolution.

Mr. NABERS. If the resolution be not objected to, I move the resolution I send to the Clerk's desk.

Mr. HOUSTON. If amendments are to be offered, and there is to be discussion on the resolution, I object.

Mr. STANTON, of Tennessee. I rise to a question of order. The question of order I make is this: The resolution was read, and the gentleman from Alabama paid no attention to its reading. The Chair called upon the House to know if there were any objection, and there was no objection, and it was not until the second reading of the resolution that the gentleman objected. I therefore submit that the objection comes too late.

Mr. HOUSTON. The gentleman's own statement shows that he paid no attention to what did take place.

The SPEAKER. The Chair decides the objection was not too late.

So objection being made, the resolution was not admitted.

INDIAN CLAIMS.

Mr. FREEMAN. I ask the unanimous consent of the House to take up Senate resolution No. 39, authorizing the examination of the claims of the Biloxi Bay Indians, for its reference to the Committee on Indian Affairs.

There was no objection, and the joint resolution was read a first and second time by its title, and referred to the Committee on Indian Affairs.

Mr. HAMILTON. I call for the regular order of business.

FLORIDA AND ALABAMA RAILROAD.

The SPEAKER. The business in order is the consideration of House bill No. 271, entitled "A bill granting the right of way and a portion of the public lands to the States of Florida and Alabama, for the construction of certain railroads in said States." The pending question is upon the amendment submitted by the gentleman from Florida, [Mr. CABELL,] in the nature of a substitute.

[The Clerk here read the substitute, which has been published heretofore.]

Mr. CABELL. I will only ask the attention of the House to a statement of the effect of this amendment. It differs from the original bill in this, that it embraces the amendment which was made to the Missouri railroad bill as it came from the Senate, that these companies shall take the lands appropriated by the bill as the road advances by the ten miles. When they construct ten miles of the road they are to take the land granted to them along that distance. It differs also from the original bill in this, that it prevents a collision in the selections of land between this railroad and the one contemplated by the bill of the gentleman from Alabama, which crosses it at right angles. These are the only differences between the original bill and my proposed substitute. If the House is favorable to the bill, I trust it will adopt the substitute.

Mr. COBB. My colleague's [Mr. ABERCROMBIE] road is provided for in the bill, is it not?

Mr. CABELL. The bill provides for no other than the Florida railroad.

Mr. ABERCROMBIE. The amendment of the gentleman from Florida is a proper one. It prevents any conflict hereafter occurring between the Florida road and the one proposed by my bill in the selection of the land granted by the Government to aid in their construction. One crosses the other at right angles.

Mr. CABELL. As the gentleman has stated, my substitute, by this variance from the original bill, is only intended to obviate a collision of interests, which will hereafter occur if the bill for the Alabama railroad pass. There is no other but the Florida railroad provided for.

Mr. AVERETT. It is almost impossible to hear, from the confusion in the Hall, what is read at the Clerk's desk, and in consequence we are voting upon amendments, the contents of which are not known to us. I would inquire of the Chair whether amendments have been received since the call for the previous question has been seconded?

The SPEAKER. None have been received since the call for the previous question was seconded.

Mr. AVERETT. I understood the gentleman had submitted an amendment whilst the House was acting under the operation of the previous question.

The question was put on the substitute, and upon a division there were—ayes 65—

Mr. MOORE, of Pennsylvania, demanded tellers; which were ordered; and Messrs. MOORE of Louisiana, and ORR were appointed.

Mr. ORR. If I am indulged in a remark, I think the House will sustain the amendment.

The SPEAKER. The Chair trusts that the gentleman may be indulged.

Mr. ORR. The remark I desire to submit does not go to the merits of the bill.

Mr. AVERETT. If the House is acting under the operation of the previous question I object, unless the opponents of the measure be also allowed an opportunity to reply.

Mr. ORR. The amendment is all right, and gentlemen may vote for or against it as they choose.

The question was again put, and the substitute was adopted; the tellers having reported—ayes 84, noes 37.

The question then recurred upon ordering the bill to be engrossed and read a third time.

Mr. LETCHER. I demand the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were not ordered, there being upon a division—ayes 27, not a sufficient number.

Mr. SWEETSER. I move to lay the bill upon the table; and upon that motion demand the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

The question was then taken, and the motion to lay upon the table was disagreed to—yeas 73, noes 87; as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Aiken, Allison, Averett, Babcock, Thos. H. Bayly, Beale, Bibb, Bingham, Boccock, John H. Boyd, Buell, Burt, Caskie, Daniel, Dawson, Dean, Dimmick, Edmundson, Floyd, Fowler, Gaylord, Giddings, Goodenow, Grow, Hamilton, Hammond, Isham G. Harris, Hart, Hascall, Holladay, Horsford, Thomas Y. How, Hunter, Ives, Jenkins, Andrew Johnson, Daniel T. Jones, George W. Jones, J. Glancy Jones, Preston King, Letcher, Mann, Martin, Mason, McLanahan, McQueen, Meade, Milson, Morehead, Murray, Andrew Parker, Perkins, Powell, Reed, Riddle, Robbins, Robie, Ross, Russell, Savage, David L. Seymour, Origen S. Seymour, Skelton, Smart, Richard H. Stanton, Sutherland, Sweetser, Thurston, Tuck, Wallace, Washburn, Wildrick, and Woodward—73.

NAYS—Messrs. Abercrombie, Willis Allen, Barrere, Bell, Bowne, Bragg, Brenton, Briggs, George H. Brown, E. Carrington Cabell, Caldwell, L. D. Campbell, Thompson Campbell, Chandler, Churchill, Clingman, Cobb, Conger, John G. Davis, Disney, Doty, Duncan, Dunham, Durkee, Evans, Ficklin, Fitch, Florence, Freeman, Gentry, Goodrich, Gorman, Gray, Harper, Sampson W. Harris, Haws, Hendricks, Henn, Houston, Howard, John W. Howe, Thomas H. Howe, Jackson, James Johnson, John Johnson, Robert W. Johnson, Kuhns, Landry, Lockhart, Mace, Humphrey Marshall, McNair, Miller, Molony, Henry D. Moore, John Moore, Nabers, Olds, Orr, Samuel W. Parker, Penn, Pennington, Phelps, Porter, Price, Richardson, Robinson, Sackett, Schermerhorn, Schoolcraft, Scurry, Smith, Stanly, Benjamin Stanton, Frederick P. Stanton, Abraham P. Stephens, St. Martin, Stuart, Taylor, Walsh, Ward, Watkins, Welch, Wilcox, Williams, and Yates—87.

So the motion to lay upon the table was disagreed to.

Previous to the announcement of the above vote,

Mr. FULLER, of Maine, stated that he had paired off with Mr. STEPHENS, of Georgia.

The question then recurred upon ordering the bill to be engrossed and read a third time.

The question was then taken, and it was decided in the affirmative.

Mr. CABELL, of Florida. I move to reconsider the vote by which the bill was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time, and to lay the motion to reconsider upon the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

The bill was then read the third time.

Mr. CABELL. I move to put the bill upon its passage, and upon that motion demand the previous question.

The previous question was seconded, and the main question was ordered to be put.

The question now being, Shall the bill pass?—

Mr. BUELL demanded the yeas and nays; which were ordered.

The question was then taken, and there were—yeas 77, nays 85; as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Abercrombie, Willis Allen, Barrere, Bell, Bragg, Brenton, Briggs, George H. Brown, E. Carrington Cabell, Lewis D. Campbell, Thompson Campbell, Chandler, Clingman, Cobb, Conger, John G. Davis, Disney, Doty, Duncan, Durkee, Evans, Ficklin, Fitch, Florence, Freeman, Gentry, Goodrich, Gorman, Harper, Sampson W. Harris, Haws, Haven, Hendricks, Henn, Houston, Howard, John W. Howe, James Johnson, John Johnson, Robert W. Johnson, Kuhns, Landry, Lockhart, Mace, Humphrey Marshall, McNair, Miller, Minner, Molony, H. D. Moore, John Moore, Nabers, Olds, Orr, S. W. Parker, Penn, Phelps, Porter, Price, Richardson, Sackett, Schermerhorn, Scurry, Smith, Stanly, Benjamin Stanton, F. P. Stanton, Abraham P. Stephens, Stuart, Taylor, Walsh, Ward, Watkins, Welch, Wells, Wilcox, Williams, and Yates—77.

NAYS—Messrs. Aiken, Allison, Averett, Babcock, Thos. H. Bayly, Beale, Bibb, Bingham, Boccock, John H. Boyd, Buell, Burt, Caldwell, Caskie, Chapman, Churchill, Curtis, Daniel, Dawson, Dean, Dimmick, Dockery, Edmundson, Ewing, Floyd, Fowler, Gamble, Gaylord, Giddings, Goodenow, Grey, Grow, Hamilton, Hammond, I. G. Harris, Hart, Hascall, Holladay, Horsford, Thomas H. Howe, Thomas Y. How, Hunter, Ingersoll, Ives, Jenkins, Andrew Johnson, D. T. Jones, Geo. W. Jones, J. Glancy Jones, Preston King, Letcher, Mann, Martin, Mason, McLanahan, McQueen, Meade, Milson, Morehead, Murray, Newton, Andrew Parker, Peaslee, Perkins, Powell, Reed, Robbins, Robie, Ross, Russell, Savage, David L. Seymour, Origen S. Seymour, Skelton, Smart, Snow, Richard H. Stanton, Thaddeus Stevens, Sutherland, Sweetser, Thurston, Tuck, Wallace, Washburn, Wildrick, and Woodward—85.

So the bill was rejected.

The SPEAKER. The bill next in order is the bill proposing to give the right of way to railroads generally.

Mr. JENKINS. I rise to a privileged question. I move to reconsider the vote by which the bill was just rejected, and to lay the motion to reconsider upon the table.

Mr. CABELL. Upon that motion I demand the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

Mr. CLINGMAN. Is it not in order to move to suspend the rules and go into Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union?

The SPEAKER. The morning hour has not yet expired.

Mr. MILLSON. I rise to a point of order. The point of order I raise is simply this: I do not object, myself, to the motion to reconsider, believing it to be in order, but the House may think differently. At the last Congress this point was raised and settled by an appeal to the House. I understand this question has been already once reconsidered.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman is mistaken. The vote upon the passage of the bill has not been reconsidered. That vote has but this moment been taken.

Mr. ORR. It was the reference to the Committee of the Whole that was reconsidered.

Mr. STUART. I move to proceed to the business upon the Speaker's table.

Mr. KING, of New York. Let us dispose of the motion to reconsider.

The SPEAKER. The morning hour having expired, the regular order of business will be the consideration of private business upon the Speaker's table.

THE REPORT ON PRINTING.

Mr. GORMAN. I ask the unanimous consent of the House to commit the bill, with all the amendments, which was pending yesterday in regard to the public printing, to the Committee on Printing. The chairman of the select committee [Mr. MARSHALL, of Kentucky,] and myself have agreed to have a joint meeting between us this evening, and I desire that the whole business be recommitted to the Committee on Printing with that view.

Mr. KING, of New York. I object to the recommitment. I think that we had better have this matter settled now.

The SPEAKER. This being private bill day, it is competent under the rules, in the opinion of the Chair, to proceed to the consideration of private business upon the Speaker's table.

Mr. ORR. The House can by a vote determine to proceed to other business.

The SPEAKER. The difficulty is, that the gentleman could not get in a motion to proceed to that description of business. It is competent for the House to go into a Committee of the Whole House, or Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union.

Mr. STEVENS, of Pennsylvania. What has become of the motion to lay on the table? Is that passed by, as a matter of course?

The SPEAKER. We have passed from the consideration of that subject, the morning hour having expired. That question is pending when we shall again return to the morning hour.

Mr. HOUSTON. I thought I had the floor, and it was taken from me by the privileged motion of the gentleman from New York, [Mr. JENKINS.]

The SPEAKER. The gentleman has lost no right, however.

Mr. HOUSTON. I wish to ask if it be the pleasure of the House to take up and vote upon the deficiency bill, which has come back from the Senate with two or three disagreements. With the consent of the House, I will explain them, and it will not take but a few minutes.

Mr. COBB. I object. Private business ought to be attended to.

Mr. HOUSTON. I move, then, that the rules of the House be suspended, and that the House resolve itself into the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union. I feel bound to make this motion, from the fact that the Senate is now without work, and have sent us a resolution refusing to receive from us, if we agree to their resolution, any appropriation bills within ten days of the day of adjournment. It is absolutely essential that we should get through with something, and send it to the Senate.

The question was then taken upon Mr. Houston's motion, and it was agreed to.

So the rules of the House were suspended, and the House resolved itself into the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union (Mr. DISNEY in the chair) on the Indian appropriation bill.

Mr. GIDDINGS. It is not my intention to detain the committee at very great length, as I do not know that I am able to make my voice heard through the Hall. I however intend to give a historical relation of the facts, without argument or embellishment. We heard last evening the statement of the official head of the Indian Committee, that during the summer of 1850, from seventy to one hundred persons claiming to be free in the Indian territory, and under protection of our laws, were seized by those Creek Indians, enslaved, and sold into bondage. I distinctly called the attention of that gentleman, and the official head of the Committee of Ways and Means, to the fact, and desired to know by what right or claim of title, these Indians seized and enslaved these people. To that question neither of these gentlemen has responded. They proclaimed their ignorance; but the chairman of the Committee on Indian Affairs, however, said that he had been informed by a member of this House, that these negroes had committed rapes upon the daughters of the Indians. I know not who the gentleman was, but I understood him to be a member of this House, and if he possesses further information, I have no doubt he will come forward at once and give it to us.

Mr. JOHNSON, of Arkansas. What does the gentleman want? I can scarcely hear you.

Mr. GIDDINGS. I was saying that I did not know who the gentleman was that communicated to you this information.

Mr. JOHNSON. I have some further information this morning. Would the gentleman like to hear it? We cannot go anywhere and find a more desperate or lawless band of people in any community within the limits of the United States, or California, or among the balance of mankind.

Mr. GIDDINGS. It would be a strange affair if these people, brought up in a slaveholding community, should not copy some of their masters' examples.

Mr. JOHNSON. It is one of the instances of extraordinary lawlessness of that people. You requested me to furnish you with as many facts as I could this morning in regard to this subject.

Mr. GIDDINGS. I have requested nothing from that gentleman concerning these charges of crime to justify seizing and selling them into bondage. I have not called upon the chairman this morning, but his friend, to whom I always refer in a case of necessity, and never except under necessity. [Laughter.]

Mr. ABERCROMBIE. I gave the information to the chairman of the Committee on Indian Affairs, and I received it from a source which cannot be doubted—the agent of the Indians themselves.

Mr. GIDDINGS. I would like to have the gentleman inform us if the females committed these rapes?

Mr. ABERCROMBIE. I think the gentleman has put an impertinent question, such as ought not to be answered by any gentleman upon this floor.

Mr. GIDDINGS. I wish that gentlemen would not provoke these interrogatories from me. I wish that gentlemen would learn to treat colored people as men. When I speak of the solemn fact of seventy or a hundred persons as being seized and enslaved, and now toiling under the lash, what is the answer by which this outrage is attempted to be justified? Why, that they committed rape.

If that be a fact let them be punished as others are.

Mr. JOHNSON. That was merely an allusion to the lawlessness of the Indians.

Mr. GIDDINGS. It was the only fact by which it is attempted to justify an outrage unequalled in the history of our nation. Why, sir, shall slaveholders justify their crimes by this charge, when that crime is authorized by law in every slave State of the Union, and practiced by a large portion, who, owning the mothers, sell their own children! With such examples before them, it would be extraordinary if negroes should not learn some of the habits of the more genteel portion of community.

Mr. JOHNSON. I must say that I will have nothing more to do with this debate; for it will lead into one of those kind of squabbles which I abhor.

Mr. GIDDINGS. Let the gentleman retire from this unpleasant discussion. He made the charge and I meet it. It is not my intention to detain the committee more than half an hour; but I will say that the history of the people who were thus sold into slavery is one of the most interesting in the annals of the nation. No people on this continent has passed through such scenes, trials, and persecutions. For seventy-six years they have been contending for their freedom—a people who for nearly three generations have been struggling for liberty have been at last seized and sold, and now pine in bondage.

These are not the slaves who fled from Georgia previous to and during the war of our Revolution. Those generations are gone, passed away, and the people now at last enslaved or fled from our nation, are the grandchildren and great grandchildren of the heroic people who fled from the oppression of Georgia slaveholders as early as 1776. Others took advantage of the turbulent times, when the colonists were themselves fighting for freedom, and fled into the further portions of the Creek settlements, in the lower part of Georgia, and there took up their residence. The first treaty for their surrender by the Creek Indians was with Georgia, as a sovereign State, in 1786. The numbers who had thus fled from slaveholding tyranny I am unable to state; but they were strongly attached to freedom; and the Indians undertook to return these people back to their masters, but found themselves unable to do it; and when our present Constitution had been adopted, and Congress assembled under it, at its first session, in 1796, the first treaty entered into by the Government of the United States, was a treaty with these Creek Indians to return these fugitives from slavery in Georgia, for which we, the people of the United States, were to pay them a stipulated annuity, which has to this day been paid, and for which we are still paying them annually, the certain, definite, and distinct sum of $1,500. The first great and principal error was in our Executive at that time, consenting to interfere in this catching of negroes; and although this history has been by me, on two former occasions, briefly alluded to, yet, in order to make the subject understood, it is necessary that I should repeat some of the principal facts, in order to show the outrage which the present Executive has suffered to be committed within our jurisdiction, and under our laws. Again the history of this people may now be fully written. Their connection with this nation has ceased, and instead of bringing their history down to a certain date, as heretofore, I am able now to close the sad tale so far as the people of this nation will ever learn it.

In 1796, the Indians were able to bring in a few of the negroes. But being unable fully to comply with their stipulations, entered into another treaty, called "the treaty of Colerain," and again renewed their contract to bring forward the remaining fugitives. As time passed on the people of Georgia became clamorous for the return of their negroes, and many attempts were made to seize them. They nearly all fled with those Creeks with whom they associated by marriage, &c., and went into Florida, entirely beyond the jurisdiction of this Government, and soon acquired the name of the "Seminole band," the word Seminole meaning runaway. There they lived, intermarried with the Indians, and actually became a part of them. Situated as they were, the Government was unable to constrain the Creeks to bring them back to slavery.

After the war of 1812 had closed, I think some time in 1816, there were found on the banks of the Apalachicola river, some three hundred or four hundred of these negroes, who had assembled there in a fortification, determined to defend and protect their liberty. From 1774 these negroes and their ancestors had been contending for freedom. They had lived with the Seminoles, had acquired an influence with the Indians, and no persuasion could induce them to think of returning to bondage. They therefore resolved to die rather than surrender their freedom. They had, many of them, been born in the everglades of Florida, and their lives spent thus far in efforts to evade the hand of oppression, to evade the power and influence of this Government, which, for an entire generation, had endeavored to enslave them. Yes, sir, while boasting of this as the only free Government upon earth, its powers and influence were exerted to reenslave these miserable outcasts.

But, sir, as I before said, some three or four hundred of them had assembled in a fort, and this Government—pressed by the slaveholders in Georgia—issued an order from yonder Department to our Army and Navy to go there—go there, invade Florida, then a Spanish province, and to seize these people who were then dwelling in peace, and only desiring to live in undisturbed quietude. There they had their plantations and gardens, their flocks and herds, their wives and little ones, living in seclusion from the world, innocent and inoffensive. But, sir, two gun-boats were sent up the river Apalachicola, and opened their fire upon these people, to slay them for no other cause upon earth than their love of liberty. They fired hot shot until the magazine was reached and exploded, and in one instant two hundred and seventy human beings, for no other fault than their dislike of oppression, were sent to their final account. Sir, their blood rests upon us, upon our Government, upon all who wielded its powers and influence. Terrible was that hour, and terrible must be the retribution of those who then bathed their hands in innocent blood. Those who survived the explosion were seized by the troops, manacled, and returned to slavery by our army. In Georgia and Alabama they and their descendants bow to the servile tasks, or sleep in servile graves. Those who were not then in the fort, lived in different towns in the deep recesses of the forest and everglades. They escaped destruction, and we may well imagine had no very friendly feelings towards our Government.

In 1818, it is well known that the first Seminole war occurred. Then again the Army of the United States sought to recapture and reenslave those who remained of this people. They were again found in conflict for their freedom. They rallied to the fight, and in various battles did fatal execution against our Army, and the celebrated Arbuthnot, who was hanged by the orders of General Jackson, whether rightly or wrongly I do not pretend to say, was charged with having counseled these people to the maintenance of their liberty. This was one of the charges brought against him, and of which he was convicted, and for which he was executed. Sir, through a series of years, and a succession of the most extraordinary struggles, these people were found fighting and defending their liberty, in a manner which would have done honor to our most heroic ancestors. And, sir, the harder they strove, the more intense the clamor of the slaveholders became. Every effort was made to induce this Government to get back their bondmen. The Executive appointed commissioners to hold a council, or rather to enter into another treaty with the Indians.

In 1821, at a place called Indian Spring, a final treaty upon this subject was negotiated. By that treaty we extorted from the Creek Indians 5,000,000 acres of land, for which we stipulated to pay $450,000. Two hundred and fifty thousand dollars were retained by this Government, so much of it to be paid over to the slaveholders of Georgia as would compensate them for the negroes who had left there forty years previously. Under an investigation by commissioners appointed by the then Executive of the United States, the whole number of negroes were ascertained, and all of them strictly counted and paid for; and here I will say, that according to the late Attorney General, Mr. Wirt, the slaveholders were allowed from two to three times the real value of each slave, and at this estimated value the whole sum rose only to $109,000, and in this amount was included the very slaves that we ourselves had murdered upon the Appalachicola river. And here let me say, by way of episode, to gentlemen who are so fond of acting in this Hall upon matters with which they are ignorant, that the slaves said to have escaped from the father of Mrs. Irwin, to whom, during the present session, we have granted some $25,000, because her father lost slaves, that these slaves of her father were included in this negotiation, and paid for, as I understand the record; for all who were gone, and all who were proven to have left their masters, were regarded as having taken refuge with the Indians, and were paid for accordingly; and yet there was $141,000 left which the Indians supposed was theirs.

And now I come to an important point in this history. While this claim for the $141,000 was pending, which the Indians hoped to get, there was no hostility, no very apparent uneasiness among them. Yet, strange to say, while this money lay in our hands, and the Indians were calling for it, having paid for the slaves, and claiming that it belonged to them, the slaveholders of Georgia also claimed it as theirs. They insisted that it should be paid over to them, and this contest went on from, perhaps, 1826 to 1834. In the latter year this House and the Senate passed a law to pay over this balance of $141,000 to the owners of the slaves.

Mr. DURKEE. I wish to ask the gentleman a question.

Mr. GIDDINGS. Certainly, if for any information.

Mr. DURKEE. I should like to know why that money was paid over to the slaveholders of Georgia? Upon what authority, and for what object was it paid over?

Mr. GIDDINGS. My friend inquires as to the claim which Georgia made to this money. I can answer in no other language than what they themselves have given through their official agents in this Hall. The claims of the slaveholders of Georgia were referred to a select committee, and the chairman of that committee, if I mistake not, was a gentleman of the name of Gillmore, who was from Georgia. He had the whole subject under consideration; he examined it minutely and carefully, and made a long detailed report, and he came to the conclusion that they had no title whatever to this money, save one, and that was by way of indemnifying the owner of the slave for the offspring which they would have borne to their masters had they remained in bondage. This can be found in the report on the subject made to this House by the select committee in 1832 or 1833. This was the claim, and one upon which I have no disposition to comment.

But I will proceed. The $141,000 was paid over to the owners of the slaves, in addition to the former sum, stated by Mr. Wirt to be at least twice the real value of the slaves, and then the Indians became clamorous at once. The whole amount of $250,000 had been taken from them, and a delegation from the Upper Creek towns started, in 1835, to seize these people residing with the Seminoles in Florida. With the negroes and the Seminoles the Lower Creeks sympathized. And here, sir, early in 1835, commenced the hostilities to which so much attention has been directed in another end of the Capitol during the present session of Congress. Mr. Chairman, if I may be allowed, I will say, that in 1837 the gentleman who was then Secretary of War, (General Cass,) now a member of the Senate, when called on by this House, by way of resolution, to report the causes of these Creek hostilities in Alabama and Georgia, (for you will recollect the discussion in the Senate arose upon a claim of Alabama for losses sustained by these hostilities,) reported to this House and the Senate, that this negro transaction and this paying over the money, was one of the causes which led to those hostilities. But the learned Senator appears to have forgotten that fact, and now, sixteen years subsequently, there were three days spent in the other end of the Capitol discussing the causes of this Creek difficulty in Georgia and Alabama, and it was principally carried on by three distinguished Senators, all of whom had been members of the Executive Cabinet. The whole object of the discussion appeared to be the ascertainment of the cause of these hostilities with the Creeks of the Lower Towns. One honorable Senator ascribed it to the starving condition of the Indians, who were said not to have food to subsist upon; another thought it arose from defrauding them in their lands; and another to bad management of the Executive in hurrying the Indians off to their western country. The disputants exhibited more ingenious tact and ability in avoiding this subject of the negroes than I ever saw by any other statesmen. I presume this was in compliance with the injunctions of the two parties, not to agitate the subject of slavery. But they spoke, I think, of everything else than the real cause of those hostilities.

As I have already stated, immediately after this last money was paid over to the slaveholders, the Creeks from the Upper Towns went in pursuit of the slaves, and the negroes being connected with the Seminoles, the Seminoles and negroes together resisted the Creeks. They resisted the outrages sought to be perpetrated upon them, and immediately hostilities were commenced both by the lower Creeks and Seminoles. Those hostilities were nearly simultaneous, and the battles were fought by the same Indians and the same negroes. And the Seminole or Florida war and the Creek war in Georgia were, in fact, one war, as appears from the documents in our library. The Indians in the upper Creek towns were in favor of seizing the slaves, but the lower Creeks sympathized with the Seminoles and negroes who were in Florida, and they aided and assisted in the early part of the Florida war, and in some instances were the only persons engaged in perpetrating the outrages upon the white settlements.

And in this connection I may say that these facts were officially reported in 1837, by the then Secretary of War. The treaty of Payne's Landing was declared valid. By it the Seminoles had stipulated to emigrate to the Indian country west of the Mississippi. They refused to go there, because the Creeks had possession of the country, and the Seminoles knew the moment they were placed within the power of the Creeks, that moment the Creeks would seize these negroes as their slaves. The negroes had obtained a controlling influence over the Indians and fought with them. They controlled their councils and commanded them in the field. If gentlemen will look at Executive Document 225, first session, Twenty-fifth Congress, they will find the whole history of this transaction. As I have already hinted, many of these people had as it were been born upon the battle-field; educated under the sound of the war whoop; and their whole lives spent in defending and protecting their God-given right to freedom. In this manner generations had risen, fought, and passed from the stage of life, and were succeeded by men able in council and valiant in battle. In this way, during the years 1835, 1836, and 1837, they were fighting continually for the liberties which their fathers had maintained; followed through swamp and everglade; pursued and hunted by our troops; persecuted, tormented, yet they remained firm in their love of liberty, and in their patriotic devotion to their families and friends, determined to die rather than surrender themselves to slavery. Sir, I do not mean any personal detraction, but the distinguished general who now bears aloft the banner of the Whig party went there with his army. He had fought upon the Niagara frontier, and he had conquered the proud hosts of Britain. He had met the enemy in many pitched battles, but when he came in contact with these negroes and Indians his military fame was of no repute. His laurels drooped, his plumes fell, and his colors trailed in the dust; he could not conquer them. With all the energy and all the power, all the influence and all the skill and tact which he possessed, he was quite unable to subdue them. He gave up the contest and left the field.

Sir, it was only by stratagem and by the violation of our most solemnly pledged faith that these persons finally fell victims to the inexorable spirit of slavery. When it was found that no army could conquer them, recourse was had to deception, fraud, and corruption. I do not say it was intended by the officers then in command. Agents were sent to tell them to come in, and that if they would surrender by capitulation they should be secured in their persons and property. I call the serious attention of the House and the country to the fact that General Jesup, acting as our commander in Florida, on the 6th of March, 1837, entered into a solemn compact and article of capitulation with these very identical negroes and their allies, the Florida Indians, securing them in their persons and property, and the faith of the nation was pledged to them in that compact. It is in the fifth article of the capitulation, and is as follows:

"General Jesup, in behalf of the United States, agrees that the Seminoles and their allies (distinctly recognizing these negroes as the allies of the Seminole Indians, and they were recognized as such throughout) who come in and emigrate to the West shall be secure in their lives and property."

That was the pledge of this Government, and the negroes came in and surrendered; they were transported west, and when they arrived at the further boundary of Arkansas, they found that they were not to be protected upon the lands of the Creeks, and they stopped upon the Cherokee territory. They had no territory of their own, and they dared not go within the Creek jurisdiction, because they would be enslaved. The Cherokees were dissatisfied with it, and complained to this Government. The Creeks were dissatisfied because the negroes did not come into the Creek country, in order that they might get their slaves, and hostilities were threatened in that country for four years. In 1845, a treaty was entered into between the Cherokees, the Creeks, the Seminoles, and this Government, and in that treaty it was stipulated that the Seminoles should be permitted to go into the territory, and conduct their own affairs. The Creeks bound themselves not to molest them or their negroes, and this Government agreed to pay a certain sum to each, and to the Cherokees, as compensation for the stipulations mentioned. All questions of property, including the question of the freedom of these negroes, were, by mutual consent, to be referred to the President of the United States. This question of the freedom of the negroes was in issue there, and it was settled by the solemn stipulation of the Creek Indians, that they would submit it to the Executive of the United States. In obedience to that stipulation, the Seminoles and these negroes went into and settled in the Creek territory.

As was stated yesterday by the gentleman from Arkansas, [Mr. JOHNSON,] the colored people had their settlements there by themselves, and continued in the enjoyment of all the comforts of civilized life for five or six years. In 1847-'48, the Creeks sent forward their claim against this Government for the $141,000. You will recollect, Mr. Chairman, that that money had been paid over to the slaveholders of Georgia, in 1834. Well, sir, the Creeks renewed their claim. In 1847, I refused to vote for a Whig Speaker, and in consequence of that I was removed from the post of chairman of the Committee on Claims, which I had held under prior Whig rule, and was transferred to the seventh or eighth member on the Committee on Indian Affairs, where, I believe, I had the pleasure of serving with the gentleman from Arkansas, [Mr. JOHNSON,] This identical claim of the Creek Indians was referred to myself, and therefore I know something about it. I found that the Indians had a clear and indisputable right to the $141,000, and I therefore made a report in favor of the claim; this House and the Senate passed it, and the Indians received their money. After they had received that money, in 1852, in violation of their compact, in violation of all the solemnities of their treaty, and of all the dictates of humanity, they, with armed force and violence, seized from seventy to one hundred of these negroes, enslaved them, sold them into bondage, and there they now remain. They attempted to seize upon the others, and there was fighting, and bloodshed, and civil war, in order that they might obtain possession of these persons and send them to eternal servitude. And there, sir, was the Executive of this nation looking on with folded arms and seeing these outrages perpetrated, and the pledged faith of this Government to secure these people in their lives and property violated and trampled under foot. Sir, had we thus violated our solemn compacts with any other people or nation on earth, as we have that which we entered into with these negroes, we would have cast upon our history a stain which no time could erase. A portion of these negroes attempted to flee to Mexico under the celebrated chief Wild Cat, but they were pursued, a battle was fought, and many were slain on both sides, but the gallantry of these heroic negroes was too powerful for negro-catchers. They escaped, and are now safe in Mexico, and we shall hear from them and their children to the third and fourth generation. Another portion is said to have gone northward and found a resting-place in Canada.

Sir, I believe that of the five or six hundred of these persons who went west, not one now remains in that Territory. They are no longer under our jurisdiction, their story is told, and their history may now be written. A more romantic history does not exist upon the records of this or any other nation. For nearly three generations these people have been fighting and contending for the rights which God had given them. During that whole time the arm of this Government has been raised to enslave them. Our money has been poured out by way of appeasing their oppressors. The very men who murdered these negroes in 1816 received, during the last session of the Twenty-fifth Congress, a bonus—a gratuity of more than $15,000 for thus murdering and massacring their fellow-men. Our Treasury has been drained to enslave these people; but, sir, the arms of this civilized Government were unable to effect it. And until we violated our faith—until we disregarded our compact, and sent them within the power of the Creeks, and there left them to become victims of those savages, they maintained their liberty.

Now, Mr. Chairman, I have accomplished what I intended. I intended to give the country these facts without embellishment, and without going into particulars more than was necessary. The President should have informed us. Indeed, we ought to have been permitted to introduce resolutions calling for official information on this subject; but efforts to suppress agitation has cut off all chance for obtaining information in this mode. I have had a resolution calling for this information in my desk since the commencement of the session.

Mr. Chairman, I may have mistaken some of the facts in this history which I have given, but I think I have not. I believe I have given them correctly, in dates, names, and places. If I have mistaken any point, I trust others will set me right.

Mr. SWEETSER. Mr. Chairman, my design in rising this morning is to present a few considerations to the committee, touching the appropriation that is asked for the Menomonee Indians of Wisconsin. It will be recollected by those members who were present last evening, that I made a point touching the conduct of the recent Commissioner of Indian Affairs, (Colonel Medill.) It was well known to you and the House at the time, that it was without examination and without consultation in relation to the facts upon which it was predicated. I have the satisfaction this morning of informing the committee and the country, that upon examination of the report which is submitted to the House by the present Commissioner of Indian Affairs, I am fully sustained in the construction that I put upon the conduct of the late Commissioner, Colonel Medill. And, without attempting to go into anything like the controversy that seems to exist between the late Commissioner and the honorable gentleman from Indiana, [Mr. Fitch,] who made, as I conceive, an attack upon him yesterday, I desire now, in the few moments that are allowed me, to place a correct statement of the facts connected with the case before this committee and before the country.

The substance of the charge made yesterday was, that Colonel Medill had, in negotiating the treaty with the Menomonee Indians of Wisconsin, in 1848, practiced a fraud upon that tribe; and the inference to be drawn from the manner in which the charge was made is, that he acted knowingly and wantonly in the perpetration of a fraud. In the defense of the Commissioner, I then stated that the data upon which he acted, was a proper one, and that the appropriation which was now asked in this bill, did not depend upon the truth or falsehood of the charge which was made by the honorable gentleman from Indiana [Mr. Fitch] against Colonel Medill. But, in order to be explicit with regard to the point to which I rose this morning, I will read so much of the report of the present Commissioner of Indian Affairs as relates to this particular item—the conduct of the late Commissioner, Medill, in relation to this treaty. I ask the attention of the committee, and of all those gentlemen who feel an interest in this subject, to the point which I here present. I will not take up the time of the committee by reading the whole report, but only such portions of it as refer to the matter I am now noticing. After going on to state that, prior to the time of Mr. Medill's going to Wisconsin to make a treaty with these Indians, the Attorney General was called upon to examine the several treaties made with the various tribes of Indians in the country contiguous to the Menomonees, to ascertain the data upon which they were founded, and to report; which report was to furnish the precise data upon which Mr. Medill was authorized to act, and to which the instructions of the Executive Department of the Government was attached, the present Commissioner says:

"After this opinion of the Attorney General was given, the Secretary of War issued his instructions to the commissioner who was appointed to negotiate the treaty. These instructions were dated September 14th, 1848, and contained the following directions, to wit:

"In consequence of the conflict and confusion as to the true boundaries of the Menomonee country within the limits of the State of Wisconsin, I have taken the opinion of the Attorney General of the United States on the subject, and inclose to you a copy for your information. The President is disposed to treat the Indians with kindness and liberality; and while the extreme claims of the Menomonees to territory already purchased by the United States from the Chippewas and Winnebagoes cannot be recognized, you may, if a treaty can be effected at a cost per acre of the estimated quantity of land within the limits suggested by the Attorney General, not exceeding that paid by the United States under the treaty with the Menomonees of September 3, 1836, provide in the treaty for the purchase of all their claims to lands in Wisconsin, and stipulate for the payment of a sum not exceeding the same 'valuable price as in the same treaty above referred to; the quantity of land estimated to be within these limits, and to form the basis of your calculation of price, is three millions twenty-three thousand and eight hundred acres.'"

"Accompanying these instructions there was a map, prepared at the Topographical Bureau under the direction of this office, in accordance with the foregoing opinion of the Attorney General. The area marked out on the map as the Menomonee tract, was estimated to contain the number of acres mentioned in the instructions, to wit, 3,023,800 acres.

"On the 12th of December, 1848, the commissioner of the United States reported to the Secretary of War that he had consummated the treaty. He said:

"You will perceive that the Menomonees cede to the United States all their lands in the State of Wisconsin, without any reservation whatever; and that the resolution of the Senate of the 3d of March, 1843, has, in all other respects, been strictly observed."

"The second article is in these words, to wit: 'The said Menomonee tribe of Indians agree to cede, and do hereby agree to cede, sell, and to relinquish, to the United States, all their lands in the State of Wisconsin, wherever situated.'

"As preliminary to the making of this treaty, the question was submitted to the Attorney General of the United States, to determine the extent and quantity of the lands owned by these Indians. He gave an opinion on the 13th of September, 1848, in which he examined the several treaties previously made with the Menomonees, and the agreement between them and other tribes in relation to their boundaries."

This treaty was submitted to the Senate of the United States, and at a subsequent session it was ratified. Up to that time there had not been a whisper against the conduct of Colonel Medill, or a charge made of fraud in connection with the treaty I have referred to.

A MEMBER. Up to what time?

Mr. SWEETSER. Up to the subsequent session of 1848 and 1849.

A MEMBER. Was that immediately after the treaty?

Mr. SWEETSER. It was. Now, sir, I am here to-day for the purpose of asserting, without fear of contradiction, that the Executive branch of the Government, with the present intelligent Commissioner of Indian Affairs, do not appeal to this House to make this appropriation predicated upon the ground assumed by my honorable friend from Indiana, [Mr. Fitch,] yesterday. They put it officially upon the ground which I assumed yesterday—that the data upon which the commissioner acted was imperfect—that there was a conflict of opinion in relation to the extent of land which the Menomonees held in Wisconsin. But he was instructed to purchase that territory at a sum not exceeding the sum paid to them by a prior treaty made in 1836. These facts are all fully sustained by the evidence on file.

Now, sir, when we come to the charge made by the honorable gentleman from Indiana, I will admit that there is a conflict of testimony; that individuals had attempted to set aside this testimony; and have sought to avoid it altogether, and that it is predicated upon the testimony to which the honorable gentleman from Missouri [Mr. Phelps] adverted on yesterday. I will not take up the time of the committee to read all this report, because I do not deem it important. But I will read, before I sit down, a section of the report made by the present Commissioner of Indian Affairs, in order to show the true grounds upon which this appropriation is sought by the Department. My purpose is not to go further into the defense of Colonel Medill than to say this: he is a gentleman not unknown to fame. For a considerable time—I think three or four Congresses—he held a seat upon this floor. He was subsequently transferred, during the Administration of Mr. Polk, to the position of Commissioner of Indian Affairs. In the opinion of a large portion of the public men of the country who knew him, a better officer never existed under the Government; and his integrity, so far as I know, has never been impeached.

Subsequently, he was elected a member of the convention to remodel the constitution of Ohio. He was called to the presidency of that convention, and was, afterwards, almost unanimously nominated for Lieutenant Governor of the State, which position he now occupies. Sir, I should be false to the duty I owe to the constituents I represent upon this floor, to whom Mr. Medill has been so long and so favorably known, if I did not rise in my place and state to this House and to the country, what I know to be the facts upon the acts of Mr. Medill, as Commissioner of Indian Affairs, were predicated.

In this connection I will state, what this report well says, that, with a feeble tribe of Indians like the Menomonees, situated as this Government is in relation to the Indians of the country, if this charge is sustained, it is one of no ordinary import, and it being of that great and important character, I feel it my duty. I feel called upon by every consideration of public duty, so far as the facts would justify me, to repel the charge. I will not take up the time of the committee by reading more than what the present Commissioner says of the conflicting testimony. I beg leave to call the particular attention of the committee to it:

"By the treaty of 1831, provision was made for the manner in which the lands set apart as the future home of the tribe should be subsequently acquired by the United States. The provision to this effect was as follows:

"The boundary, as stated and defined in this agreement, of the Menomonee country, with the exception of the cessions hereinbefore made to the United States, the Menomonees 'claim, as their country,' that part of it, adjoining the farming country, on the west side of the Fox river, will remain to them, as heretofore, for a hunting-ground, until the President of the United States shall deem it expedient to extinguish their title. In that case, the Menomonee tribe promised to surrender it immediately, upon being notified of the desire of the Government to possess it. The additional annuity then to be paid to the Menomonee tribe, to be fixed by the President of the United States."

"Subsequent treaties did not abrogate the foregoing provision, and by it ample power is given to the President to do full justice to these Indians. It is respectfully suggested, that the clear meaning of this provision is, that the President should have power to extinguish the title without a treaty, and by mere notice; for it says, 'In that case,'—that is, when the President shall deem it expedient to extinguish the title—'the Menomonee tribe promise to surrender it immediately, upon being notified of the desire of the Government to possess it.' And it further provides for the mode of compensation, or the sum to be paid, when the title is extinguished. This is also to be fixed by the President. It says, 'the additional annuity then to be paid to the Menomonee tribe, to be fixed by the President of the United States.' By this it was evidently intended to leave the whole question in the hands, and subject to the will, of the President.

"Should the President decide to exercise the discretionary power vested in him by the treaty of 1831, the amount of the 'additional annuity,' the manner of payment, whether in money or goods, and the several dates at which payments shall be made, will have to be determined.

"In fixing the amount, it may be well to refer to the instructions which preceded the negotiation of the treaty of 1848, and to the report of the Commissioner after it was consummated.

"The Secretary of War, in his instructions to Mr. Medill, after informing him of the disposition of President Polk to treat the Indians with kindness and liberality, directed him to effect a treaty, at a cost, per acre, of the estimated quantity of land, 'not exceeding that paid by the United States under treaty with the Menomonees of September 3d, 1836,' and estimated the quantity to form the basis of his calculation of price, at 3,023,800 acres.

"By the treaty of September 3d, 1836, it appears, from the report of the Commissioner, that 4,184,320 acres were ceded to the United States, for which the Menomonees were to receive the sum of $791,510 50. A similar rate of payment would, as stated by the Commissioner, make the 3,023,800 acres amount to $571,840. He, however, negotiated the treaty, which acquired for the United States all the lands claimed by the Menomonees in Wisconsin, for the sum of $350,000, a sum far short of the maximum which he was authorized to offer. The number of acres, it appears from the same report, exceeded the estimate of the Secretary of War, being about 4,000,000; and this latter quantity, at a rate similar to that paid in the treaty of 1836, would amount to $756,453.

"It appears, then, by the treaty of 1836, the price paid for the 4,184,320 acres was 18 9-10th cents per acre; at the same rate, only 1,851,851 acres would have been acquired for the $350,000, paid under the treaty of 1848. It is alleged, however, by the Indians, that Mr. Medill stated that they owned only 1,600,000 acres, and that he was paying or offering them more for their lands than he was authorized by the President to offer. When, therefore, it is considered that 1,600,000 acres, at the maximum which the Commissioner was authorized to offer, amounts to $302,400, and that it is alleged that he told the Indians he was agreeing to pay more than he was authorized to pay, there is reason to believe, and it is in evidence, that such a statement was made to them; and although it does not appear that they were deceived by it in regard to the quantity which they owned or claimed, yet it may be worthy of consideration, in connection with the other facts and circumstances, in determining the additional compensation proper to be allowed them.

"It is known that these people are helpless and dependent. Great dissatisfaction exists among them by reason of the treaty of 1848. The impression which generally prevails among our own citizens in their vicinity is, that they have been hardly dealt with, and that the terms of their contract bear heavily upon them. The lands which, by the treaty of 1848, they had surrendered, are exceedingly valuable, and in extent, as computed at the General Land Office, exceed five millions of acres. To pay them now, what the Government under the administration of President Polk was willing to pay, is the least, taking all the circumstances into consideration, which, in the opinion of this office, it should do. The quantity then estimated to form the basis of Mr. Medill's calculation of price was 3,023,800 acres. This, at the maximum which he was authorized to pay, would amount to $571,840; and this is the least sum, after deducting the $350,000 already paid, which, in my opinion, the Government ought to pay, or which would satisfy the Indians. With this amount of additional annuity, properly applied, it is believed they would be content; it will satisfy them that the Government designs to do them justice, and will so impress them with a sense of gratitude, as to make them more obedient to those instrumentalities which may in future be employed to bring them under the influence of civilization and Christianity.

"Indistinctly connected, too, with the settlement of this question is the fact, that the period is rapidly approaching when these Indians will have to remove from their present residence to the one provided for them west of the Mississippi. The expenses of their removal they will themselves have to defray, and this is an additional reason why the most favorable consideration should be given to their petition for relief. Besides affording them the means of removing, a knowledge that an additional annuity had been granted to them would, no doubt, have a most beneficial effect in conciliating their good will, and leading them to a more ready acquiescence in the policy and measures of the Government in regard to their future management.

"The papers submitted by you are herewith returned, together with the memorial of the 'Christian party' of the Menomonees, and the statements in answer thereto, to which reference has been made in the foregoing.

"Very respectfully, your obedient servant,

"L. L. LEA, Commissioner."

Now, Mr. Chairman, the question is presented to this House, who hold the equitable conscience of the nation, upon the ground that it is not only free from objection, so far as the charge of fraud is concerned, but it appeals to the equitable conscience of this House and the country, whether, after this mistake has been made—a mistake which, between man and man in the ordinary tribunals of the country, would authorize a court of competent jurisdiction to decree a relief—they will give the relief which is asked for; whether they will make the appropriation which the Executive branch of the Government, after three or four years examination, have determined is just and equitable towards this defenseless and inoffensive people. I hope, sir, the appeal is not made in vain. I will not hesitate to render all the aid I can give, in the discussion of this question; and if I were permitted to remain here, would give my vote cheerfully for this appropriation. But I say in my place here, it is not necessary to make a charge against any person in connection with this treaty. Here has been an obvious mistake, as subsequent examination has demonstrated, and all that is now asked for is, to do what the Government designed to do in the origin of this transaction—to make this people whole for the territory which they have conveyed to the United States. I hope it will be done, as a matter of right and justice.

Mr. FITCH. I will not consume the time of the House in answering the gentleman from Ohio, [Mr. SWEETSER.] I made no attack upon his constituent, Mr. Medill. I gave simply a history mostly from the official record, and all sustained by that record, of his treaty with the Menomonees and its results. If that is to be construed into an attack, the gentleman [Mr. SWEETSER] had better direct his efforts to procuring a change in the record, or limit his defense to a denial of its correctness or authenticity. The gentleman himself has quoted from the record matter which will not much benefit his constituent. He speaks of a mistake which is to exonerate Mr. Medill from blame. The idea of a mistake originated with Mr. Bruce, the sub-agent. He is the witness I mentioned yesterday who made a written statement designed to defend Mr. Medill. In that statement he says if a mistake was made by Mr. Medill, it was owing to the maps before him. This was said for the purpose of defending Mr. Medill from a charge of having attempted to deceive the Indians. But Mr. Bruce said too much for a successful defense of his friend, for, by calling our attention to a mistake, he leads us to inquire what kind of a mistake it was. We find Mr. Medill admitting, that while he was on the ground, he discovered a mistake which increased the possessions of the Indians from 3,023,800 acres to 4,000,000 acres. But did he give them the benefit of this mistake? On the contrary, he told them they had but 1,600,000, and refused to pay them for more than that! If the gentleman [Mr. SWEETSER] can make for him no better defense than a mistake, silence would be a mercy to him. But mistake has nothing to do with the case before us. We are dealing with a result which is not denied.

The CHAIRMAN. The time has arrived at which this debate is to terminate. No further discussion will be allowed, except under the rule in relation to amendments.

Mr. COBB. It is suggested to me that I did wrong in my action this morning in reference to the deficiency bill. And whenever I am satisfied that I am wrong, or have done wrong, I am willing to make proper reparation. I objected this morning to the consideration of the deficiency bill, from my anxiety to proceed with the private business we then had under consideration.

Now, sir, from the urgent necessity for the passage of that bill—and for the reason, as the gentleman from Alabama [Mr. HUSTON] says, that the Senate have nothing before them—I am going to move that the committee rise, that we may go back to the House, in order that the chairman may propose to take up that bill, and that the House may consider it. We then can come back into committee upon this bill, or we can proceed to the consideration of business on the Private Calendar, as the House may think best.

I move that the committee rise.

The question was then taken, and the motion was agreed to.

The committee accordingly rose, and the Speaker having resumed the chair, the chairman reported that the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union had had the state of the Union generally under consideration, and particularly House bill No. 43, "making appropriations for the Indian Department for the year ending 30th of June, 1853," and had made progress, but come to no conclusion thereon.

DEFICIENCY BILL.

Mr. HUSTON. With the consent of the House, I wish to take up the deficiency bill which has been returned from the Senate. There are a few matters of difference between the two Houses, which I will explain in a very few words, and then ask the House to vote upon them.

The first subject of disagreement between the two Houses I will read. It is this:

"For presents and provisions for Indians visiting superintendents on official business, $1,000."

Also,

"For traveling expenses of the superintendent and the necessary attendants, $2,500."

These two items were among the original amendments of the Senate, but were stricken out by the House. The Senate did not concur in the action of the House in striking them out. The explanation which I heard made in the Senate on yesterday, in reference to them, appeared satisfactory to me. A large number of treaties have been made with the California Indians, which have been rejected by the Senate. The next steamer for California carries out the news of the rejection of those treaties, and the Department is exceedingly anxious that it should have this amount of money, for the purpose of sending the superintendent, along with the news, with presents, to pacify the Indians upon the receipt of that intelligence.

The second disagreement between the two Houses is this: The Senate amended the original bill of the House in the section relating to the Texas Indians, by an amendment which directed the $25,000 to be appropriated to the removal of such Indians in Texas as "have intruded themselves into that State from the territories of the United States." The House amended that provision by striking out these words, so that the $25,000 would have been applicable to the negotiation and removal of all the Indians in Texas. The Senate insist upon a concurrence with their original proposition, and I heard the argument there yesterday, and I was satisfied that that proposition was right. The argument was this: that if we now make this appropriation to commence a negotiation with the Indians of Texas, who really belong to Texas, and with whom the Government of the United States have nothing to do, we will thereby assume jurisdiction and involve ourselves in interminable trouble and expense in regard to them. The Senate, therefore, insist upon their amendment.

The next item, Mr. Speaker, is in regard to the Louisville custom-house. The House amended the original amendment of the Senate by appropriating $43,700 for the completion of the Louisville custom-house. The Senate reduces that appropriation to $16,000; and they did it, as I understand, upon this ground. I did not get the opportunity, when this subject was under discussion in the House, of having the letter of the Secretary of the Treasury read, because my friend from Kentucky [Mr. MARSHALL] objected to it. When we were in committee the Chair decided that I had no right to debate the subject, because the gentleman who preceded me had debated it.

The Secretary of the Treasury recommended, in regard to all these custom-houses at Pittsburg, Cincinnati, St. Louis, Bath, Mobile, Bangor, and Norfolk, that in each case Congress should appropriate, in addition to the amount already appropriated, a sum sufficient to pay what had been expended in purchasing the sites. All the other custom-houses have received that appropriation. We have appropriated for the Pittsburg and Cincinnati custom-houses what the lots have cost; and at all the other places we have appropriated what the estimates of the Department called for, except to the custom-house at Louisville, and there we have appropriated $43,700. As I understand, the letter of the Secretary, which was referred to the Committee of Ways and Means, proposed this appropriation of $16,000 for the Louisville custom-house. Since that time the Secretary has written a letter to the honorable member who represents the Louisville district, [Mr. MARSHALL], in which he adopts a plan the estimate of which requires $43,700. That estimate never reached the Committee of Ways and Means, and it never reached the House, except by reference made to it by my friend, [Mr. MARSHALL.] I think the Senate have done right in their action, and that is the unanimous opinion of the Committee of Ways and Means, as far as we have had a committee this morning.

It is true that the lot in Louisville cost only $16,000, while at Cincinnati the lot cost, I understand, more than $50,000. The lot cost $58,000, but the citizens made up the $8,000; which reduced the cost to $50,000, and in that case the appropriation is $50,000. If this appropriation of $16,000 is agreed to in regard to the Louisville custom-house, then the custom-houses at that place, at Cincinnati and Pittsburg, will stand precisely upon the same footing, each one having $75,000 for building the house.

There are two other amendments. The Senate have added this new amendment:

"For per diem compensation and mileage of Senators, members of the House of Representatives, and Delegates, $50,000."

It is proper for me to say to the House, that this $50,000, added by the Senate, is for the purpose of supplying a deficiency by the abstraction—by the taking of that amount from the original appropriation for constructive mileage. But what can this House do? Is it possible for us to control a coordinate branch of the Legislature? The money is gone, and it may be proper enough for us to discuss it, and, if we choose, to condemn the act, as I do, as an improper act upon the part of the Senate; and, although it may be proper enough to condemn it, and say we disapprove of it, yet can we control the Senate? If the Senate see fit to stand up for its present pay, as a matter of course this bill will fail. And if this bill should be lost, it would be put in some other bill. The constructive mileage has already been taken by Senators who intend to take it, and it is gone. This appropriation is for the pay of mileage and per diem for this session.

Mr. STEVENS, of Pennsylvania. If this is allowed, cannot they claim a credit this year, upon what they have abstracted, as the gentleman calls it, the last?

Mr. HOUSTON. I do not think that is a proper expression.

Mr. STEVENS. I think it is a proper word. I think it was abstracted, subtracted, and extracted wrongly. I do not think it ought to be allowed. I think the House ought to insist upon disagreeing to it.

Mr. HOUSTON. It is for the House to do as it sees fit upon the subject. I wish to lay the statement as fairly as I can before the House; but it is proper for me to say that it is impossible for us to defeat that appropriation.

The next amendment upon which the Senate insist, is the amendment which you remember was discussed in committee, and is this:

"Provided, That hereafter no expenses incurred by a Territorial Legislature, shall be paid out of the Treasury of the United States, unless previously sanctioned by law."

The House defeated that proviso upon the ground that the law of 1842 covered it. It is true, that law does remedy the difficulty which existed before that day, and, as was well remarked by the Delegate from Minnesota, [Mr. SIBLEY,] whom I do not now see in his seat, we have allowed a departure from that law; we have allowed a misconstruction of that law, and we are ourselves responsible for the loose course of proceeding in regard to those Territories. It was well argued, in the Senate yesterday, that something else must be done besides notifying them we intend to adhere to the provisions of the law of 1842. The amendment can do no harm, if it does no good. I have now stated the disagreements.

Mr. STUART. I want to call the gentleman's attention to the fact, as I understand it, that each House takes mileage for itself. The Committee on Mileage reports, and each House for itself determines this question, and determines it conclusively. Now, sir, whatever opinion may be entertained here in regard to paying constructive mileage of Senators, it is a matter this House has no control over, and a matter for which this House is in nowise responsible—not in the least degree. And I should be very sorry to have this House act upon a suggestion which has fallen from the gentleman from Pennsylvania, [Mr. STEVENS,] to refuse to concur in this amendment of the Senate for any such reason as he assigns.

Mr. STEVENS, of Pennsylvania. If the gentleman will allow me, I will inquire of the chairman of the Committee of Ways and Means whether we did not insert a clause in some bill last year making it a law to prevent constructive mileage?

Mr. JOHNSON, of Arkansas. This does not come into conflict with it.

Mr. STUART. No doubt we may with the concurrence of the other House and the President—covering the whole legislative department of the country—change a law; but, sir, when that law is changed, each House again determines for itself what the law is.

Mr. JOHNSON. My recollection of the passage of that law is this: The Senate itself introduced the clause which cut off the constructive mileage last Congress. This case is not affected by that law at all—it is for constructive mileage anterior to the time of the passage of the law.

Mr. STEVENS. It is for constructive mileage of last March.

Mr. JOHNSON. After the law has passed?

Mr. STEVENS. Yes, sir.

Mr. JOHNSON. Well; I am unable to say anything in regard to that.

Mr. FITCH. Happening last Congress to be on the Mileage Committee, this matter fell under my observation, and I now rise merely for the purpose of giving information correctly with regard to this subject. A provision was introduced by the Senate into some bill cutting off constructive mileage for the sessions of the Senate that may be called on the 4th of March, 1853, and on the 4th day of March in every fourth year thereafter. The design was to prevent Senators from drawing constructive mileage for that usual Executive session called after the inauguration of a new President. Last year's session of the Senate was not one of that character, and therefore does not come under this provision of law. Senators chose to avail themselves of the old law and drew their constructive mileage.

Mr. STUART. I did not rise for the purpose of discussing the propriety of any law, but simply to state the fact, which I believe is, that this House cannot control this question, and that this House is not responsible for the pay of mileage to members of the Senate. Each House determines that question for itself.

Mr. GENTRY. This House can determine the principle.

Mr. FITCH. So far as the existing law will permit them, they can. But there is another thing in relation to this question of mileage which it may be as well to state. It is perfectly immaterial whether we admit or cut off the constructive mileage of the Senators for their last session; for even if we had it within our power to prevent them receiving the money now, their names are upon the record, and if they choose to, they may at any time hereafter draw the amount to which they are entitled should the regular appropriation for mileage cover the amount. Instances have occurred where it has been drawn years subsequently, and they will occur.

Mr. HOUSTON. I am satisfied the positions assumed by the gentleman from Michigan, [Mr. STUART,] and the explanation of the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. FITCH] of the law of 1851, are correct. The law of the 3d of March, 1851, reads as follows:

"Be it enacted by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled, That from and after the passage of this act, no member of the Senate shall be entitled to receive compensation for his attendance at the Senate, in the recess of Congress, during such meeting of the Senate as may be called on the 4th day of March, 1853, and on the 4th day of March in every fourth year thereafter, other than the eight dollars per diem for attendance, now allowed by law: Provided, That this act shall not apply to a Senator, not a member of either House of Congress at the expiration of the Congress preceding such called session of the Senate."

The law makes the question plain.

Mr. FOWLER. I rise to a question of order. If I understand the chairman, the Senate have added an appropriation of $50,000 to the bill. My question of order is this: Whether the House, there being a new appropriation added by the Senate, can proceed to discuss and act upon it until it shall have been first referred to the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union? I make the question with great deference, but it seems to be one worthy of consideration.

Mr. HOUSTON. That is the rule of the House very clearly, but unanimous consent was given to consider the proposition.

Mr. FOWLER. I understood the consent of the House was, that we might hear from the chairman the propositions that have been submitted by the Senate, and not that we should proceed to consider and act upon them.

The SPEAKER. The Chair's recollection of the proceedings is, that the House gave its unanimous consent to the consideration of the amendments proposed by the Senate. The House and Chair have been acting upon that understanding.

Mr. FOWLER. If that is the understanding, I waive my question of order. I did not so understand; certainly.

Mr. HOUSTON. I will again call the attention of the House to a line in the law of March 3d, 1851:

"No member of the Senate shall be entitled to receive compensation for his attendance at the Senate, in the recess of Congress, during such meeting of the Senate as may be called on the 4th day of March, 1853, and on the 4th day of March in every fourth year thereafter."

This session of 1851 was a called session, and held before the law took effect according to its conditions; so there can be no doubt about the law authorizing Senators to take the mileage provided for by the amendment.

Mr. STEVENS, of Pennsylvania. This question of constructive mileage is a mere construction. The law allows them actual mileage, and is it not competent for us at any time to refuse to make an appropriation to any branch of this Legislature for a demand for services never rendered?

Mr. HOUSTON. This House has power to do a great many things which I think it improper for them to exercise. Now, the Committee of Ways and Means this morning, although the bill was not referred to them in terms, sent for and acted upon these amendments. Their action, to be sure, was informal; but that committee unanimously agreed to recommend a concurrence in the action of the Senate, and therefore the passage of the bill.

Mr. JONES. The Senate's amendment, with reference to the constructive mileage, was not unanimously agreed to in the committee.

Mr. HOUSTON. I may be mistaken about that. Probably the gentleman voted against that, but the other recommendations were unanimous. Under the instructions of the committee, I shall move to agree in the three instances, and to recede in two instances.

The SPEAKER. The pending question is the motion to refer to the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union.

Mr. HOUSTON. I withdraw that motion, and propose concurrence in the Senate's action, and upon that motion demand the previous question.

Mr. MARSHALL, of Kentucky. Mr. Speaker—

Mr. HOUSTON. I will yield to the gentleman to make an explanation, still holding my right to the floor, however.

Mr. MARSHALL. I will not accept the liberty the chairman of the Committee of Ways and Means proposes to extend to me, as a member of this House, and I throw myself upon the pleasure of the House, that he shall not call the previous question upon me.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Alabama is still upon the floor.

Mr. MARSHALL. I understood the gentleman to tender to withdraw his call for the previous question, for the purpose of allowing me to make an explanation. I desire to reply that I want to make some remarks with regard to the appropriation for the Louisville custom-house. I want to be heard upon that; and I want the House to disagree to the amendment of the Senate in that particular.

Mr. HOUSTON. I do not know what the gentleman means. I do not want, of course, to preclude him from making his explanation. I want, however, to retain the floor for the purpose of getting this bill through.

Mr. MARSHALL. The Senate has become suddenly economical, and, for the first time since I have been in the public service, has reduced an appropriation made by the House of Representatives. We are told by the honorable chairman of the Ways and Means, that in effecting this reduction in the case of the Louisville custom-house, the Senate has merely cut down the appropriation to the point recommended by the Secretary of the Treasury, and to the original intent of the law—that the amount remaining for the erection of the building at Louisville reimburses all that was expended from the original appropriation for the lot, and that the amount cut off was an extravagance into which I have led the House.

Mr. Speaker, the law ordered custom-houses, &c., to be built at Louisville, St. Louis, Cincinnati, Pittsburg, Mobile in Alabama, and Norfolk in Virginia. To each of the five points first named, the sum of $75,000 were appropriated. I understood at the time, it was designed that the ground should be purchased, and the building erected with the sum appropriated. But in the case of Cincinnati, the Secretary so construed the law as to allow $75,000 to be appropriated for the building alone, regardless of the cost of the ground, while at the other points the law was construed that $75,000 was to cover the total expenditure, both for the ground and building. The appropriation for Mobile was $100,000, for Norfolk $50,000, with a clear and explicit declaration that in each case the appropriation should purchase the site and erect the building. If the idea which guided the committees of Congress was to restore merely the expenditure which has been made for a site, I should like to know from the honorable chairman of the Ways and Means, who is a member from Alabama, why the rule was not applied in the case of Mobile? The expenditure for a site in that town was only $12,500, but the appropriation this year is $100,000 for the custom-house in addition to $100,000 last year. I should like to know why the rule was not applied by the chairman of the Committee on Finance in the Senate to the case of Norfolk in Virginia, where nothing of the appropriation of last year ($50,000) was spent and no site has been purchased—no plan of building adopted, and for which $50,000 are now appropriated additionally without starting a question in the committee of either House?

Mr. Speaker, to this suggestion it will be replied by the gentleman from Alabama, [Mr. Houston,] that the Secretary of the Treasury recommended both the appropriations in the cases of Mobile and Norfolk which have been voted. Yes, he did, and I rejoice that he did so, expressly in the case of Louisville, as will appear by the letter which I now send to the Clerk's table to be read to this House, which letter was before the Senate committee when the reduction of the appropriation to $16,000 was voted, and which letter had been exhibited to the gentleman from Alabama and other members of the Committee of Ways and Means, before they agreed to the reduction as made in the Senate. The following is the letter:

TREASURY DEPARTMENT, June 4, 1852.

SIR: In reply to your verbal inquiries, with reference to the progress that has been made towards the erection of a building, in the city of Louisville, for a custom-house, a post office, and other public offices, I have to state:

1st. That commissioners were promptly appointed, to select a site for the building, in order that the intentions of the Government might be carried out without unnecessary delay.

2d. That these commissioners selected a lot, for which the Government has paid the sum of $16,000.

3d. That architects were publicly invited to submit plans for the building; and that two plans were received, one of which I was willing to adopt, if the building could be erected in accordance with it, durable and fire-proof, for the balance of the appropriation, (viz: $59,000); and

4th. That specifications and estimates were called for, from the architect by whom this plan was submitted, which specifications and estimates have just been received.

According to those, the building can be erected of brick and wood for the residue of the appropriation on hand; but for a structure of stone and iron, substantial and fire-proof from bottom to top, an expenditure of $102,700 is shown to be necessary. As a safe and durable building is desired, I would respectfully recommend an additional appropriation by Congress of the sum of $43,700, for the purpose of constructing the same according to the plans and specifications above referred to.

I am, very respectfully, your obedient servant,
THOS. CORWIN, Secretary of the Treasury.
Hon. HUMPHREY MARSHALL, House of Representatives.

I came to this House with that letter in my possession, and asked for an appropriation of $43,700 for the custom-house at Louisville, as the Secretary recommended, and then the chairman of the Ways and Means opposed me, but this House, acting upon the recommendation of the Department, unhesitatingly voted the sum demanded, and thereupon Cincinnati, Pittsburg, St. Louis, and Norfolk came forward through their Representatives on this floor, and asked the appropriations which were granted them. Do you not know that had this House refused the appropriation to the Louisville custom-house which was asked by me, it would also have refused the rest? Could Mobile have received $100,000, or Norfolk $50,000, had the appropriation to Louisville of $43,700 been voted down in this House? Why, then, has the Louisville appropriation alone been selected as a mark by these committees? Why has the recommendation of Mr. Corwin been followed in every other case than that of my district?

The gentleman from Alabama [Mr. Houston] attempts an explanation by referring to the remarks of the Secretary of the Treasury, in submitting his "annual estimates," in which he says:

"The Department has plans for the custom-houses at Pittsburg and Louisville, which can probably be completed for the above sum of fifty thousand dollars each; but it is a matter of great doubt whether it is either economy, or in other respects good policy, to erect such buildings as can be constructed within that limit. It is to be recollected, that in these buildings, it is intended to accommodate not only the business of the custom-house, but also the post office, United States courts, the land offices, independent treasury, and any other of the Federal officers who may be located in these places respectively.

"These cities are increasing so rapidly, that what might be considered sufficient accommodations for the above purposes at this time, will probably be entirely inadequate in the course of a comparatively very few years, and will then require to be extended or entirely rebuilt. It should also be an indispensable requisite in all public buildings to be hereafter erected, that they should be perfectly fire-proof, both from the interior and exterior; and it is but right and proper that such structures should be not only well and substantially built, but should, within reasonable limits, be finished to a hand-some and ornamental manner, both inside and out. That all these requisites cannot be obtained in a building of the necessary size, the cost of which is limited to a few thousand dollars, is very apparent. That limit would oblige the Department to the use of brick as a material, and to adopt plans which, though called fire-proof, are not so completely such as should be the case with all public structures. Buildings for the above purpose, in every way suitable and proper, and with accommodations not only sufficient for the present, but for the probable future wants of the Government for a long period, can be erected and furnished for seventy-five thousand dollars; and it is earnestly recommended that such increased appropriations should be made. Another reason for granting this sum is, that it would prevent what might be considered as an invidious distinction between these two cities and those of Cincinnati and St. Louis, where a larger amount has been appropriated.

"If Congress, however, should not think it advisable to grant that sum for Pittsburg and Louisville, contracts can be made for the buildings to cost not more than $50,000 each, but for less than that amount the Department is convinced that it would be inexpedient and injudicious to attempt the erection of them. On this footing an additional appropriation of $16,000 would only be required for Pittsburg, as the balance remaining of the appropriation for Louisville exceeds $50,000."

Mr. Speaker, you will perceive, by reading this communication from the Secretary, that only $16,000 is asked for Pittsburg, and nothing for Louisville—if it is the intention to erect houses costing only $50,000; but it is advised that the appropriations shall be expended in each case to $75,000, because the Department then supposed this sum would be sufficient to complete the plan which the Secretary had in view, and which was adopted for the Louisville custom-house. Subsequently, however, the Secretary received the working estimates from the architect whose design was approved, and that person informed him that $102,700 would be necessary to finish the house upon the plan proposed. The Secretary then addressed the letter to me which has been read by the Clerk, and recommended the appropriation necessary to build the house upon the plan properly.

I believe no plan for the custom-house at Cincinnati or St. Louis has been adopted, and I venture the assertion that no plan will be executed in either city for $75,000. The gentleman from Alabama pursues the suggestion of the Secretary, that $75,000 for the building will make all of our western cities exactly equal in the favors received from Government, and therefore the additional appropriation asked for the Louisville custom-house should be reduced from $43,700 to $16,000. He goes on the principle that "equality is equity," and proposes, I presume, to divide fairly among us. Now, sir, I eschew that principle and repudiate it as a test of proper legislation. There is no reason why the custom-houses in the several cities named should be built upon the same plan, or should cost exactly the same amount of money. We should look at the wants of Government, at the probable future of your business at these several localities; and in arranging the buildings to be erected, we should act with enlightened forecast to meet the public wants, without regard to the particular amount spent here or there. But, if the idea of preserving equality, which the Secretary of the Treasury suggested, and the chairman of the Committee of Ways and Means repeated, is to be our guide, it imports, necessarily, that the buildings shall be on the same plan in each locality.

There remains a more difficult condition to be met with in this view. We must equalize the wages of labor and the prices of materials in each, in order that an equal sum of money may accomplish the same amount of work in each. The mere suggestion of the idea exhibits the absurdity of pursuing any such rule. But, sir, if it is to be pursued, then be pleased to remember that $125,000 have already been appropriated for the custom-house in Cincinnati, $100,000 for that at St. Louis, $105,000 for that at Pittsburg; and if the appropriation I ask shall be granted, only $118,000 will have been appropriated at Louisville. If the commissioners at Cincinnati paid $50,000 for the site, and those at Louisville only $16,000, surely our economy of the fund which was placed at our disposal should not operate against us. If Cincinnatians have paid a high price for ground, in order to erect their custom-house and post office in the most conspicuous place, and the Louisville people have taken an obscurer site, in order to erect the finer house with the fund at their disposal, each have exhibited the peculiarity of their taste, and both should be indulged. If you mean to treat them alike, when you now appropriate $50,000 for Cincinnati, you should bestow upon Louisville the same amount. That is essential upon the idea of "equality, in order to avoid invidious distinctions." But, sir, as I before remarked, there is nothing worthy of the American Congress in that idea of equality, as applied to these appropriations, and if there be, the committees have violated it by making an invidious distinction against the commercial city in my district. They have disregarded, also, the recommendation of the Secretary, as exhibited in the letter read at the Clerk's table. Can it be that gentlemen will apply to these buildings, which are intended for post offices and court-rooms, as well as custom-houses, their old rule that, because Cincinnati and Louisville are in the interior, the appropriations there should not be more than half as great to accomplish the purpose as they would be if the cities were situated on the sea-board? I have shown you the facility with which the committees appropriate for Mobile and Norfolk, and how they justify under the Secretary's recommendation. I show you how stringent they suddenly become when the appropriation is in the interior, and how they trample on the recommendation from the Treasury in the case. Upon what principle do these committees act?

Mr. HUNTER. What is the difference in the whole amount proposed to be appropriated between Mobile and Louisville?

Mr. MARSHALL. The whole amount appropriated to Mobile is $200,000. The whole amount appropriated to Louisville will be $118,000. I imagine that my district collects three or four times as much revenue as the port of Mobile. We collect $78,000 a year in duties at the port of Louisville, and yet we are here higgling upon the question whether you shall expend an additional $27,000 upon the public buildings in Louisville. I am as much in favor of economy as any man, but I desire to see it dispensed with a proper hand, and in a proper manner. I trust that this House, under the circumstances, will not commence in their economy upon my city, but will disagree to this amendment at least, and give me the benefit of a committee of conference with the Senate.

Mr. HOUSTON. The gentleman from Louisville [Mr. MARSHALL] has argued his case as if it were the Committee of Ways and Means who had made the discrimination of which he complains. In that he mistakes. This amendment originated in the Senate, and was intended not only to destroy a discrimination in his favor, but also to reduce the appropriation to the estimate of the Secretary of the Treasury. The gentleman very well knows that I have been endeavoring to get for him the $16,000 which he and the Secretary both said would be ample to build a suitable custom-house in Louisville. I was in favor of giving it to him, because, from the attention and investigation I had given the subject, I thought it necessary and proper. The Secretary of the Treasury says it is necessary to appropriate this additional $16,000, in order to build and properly furnish a custom-house that shall be perfectly fire-proof, both from the interior and exterior. I believe the appropriation ought to be made, and endeavored to get the Committee of Ways and Means to come to the same conclusion. But while this matter (of these custom-houses) was under examination by the Committee of Ways and Means, the Senate saw fit to act upon it, by providing for three, and leaving out the others. I have a right to speak of my own action in committee. My course has been equally fair towards all the custom-houses proposed at the various points; and if the gentleman from Kentucky thinks otherwise, he can confer with any member of that committee on the subject. I stated, in the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union, a few days since, that these custom-houses should be completed; and, while I believed it was improper to put any of them in this bill, yet, if any of the appropriations for custom-houses were to be retained, that they all stood substantially upon the same footing, and should all be rejected or retained. I do not say they are all equally necessary as custom-houses, for I do not so regard them; but, as they have all had partial appropriations, they should now have enough to finish them. I remain of that opinion, but it seems the gentleman has changed his mind. The Senate, as well as the Committee of Ways and Means, in this instance, have kept within the recommendation of the Secretary of the Treasury; and the document which has been read by the gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. MARSHALL] was never seen in the committee room. It is a recommendation sent to the gentleman himself, and, I presume, at his own instance. It is true, it has been shown to me, within the last few days, by the gentleman from Kentucky; but it never has been before the committee.

Mr. MARSHALL. I showed it to you as chairman of the committee.

Mr. HOUSTON. I am unable to say in what capacity the gentlemen intended me to see it. I do not, however, regard it as a recommendation of the Secretary of the Treasury to this House, or to the Committee of Ways and Means. But my friend from Kentucky says they collect more revenue at Louisville than at the port of Mobile. Mr. Speaker, I fear he has not looked into the matter. Why did he not state how, and under what circumstances, the revenue is collected at Louisville and Mobile respectively, and the difference in the duties of the collectors at each point? Where are the duties performed—I mean to ask, where are the services rendered upon which the revenue is collected at Louisville? Is it at Louisville? Not at all; all that is done by the collector at Louisville is to receive the money. Louisville is a port of delivery, and not a port of entry; and every box or package of goods that goes to Louisville, Cincinnati, Pittsburg, St. Louis, or any other port above New Orleans, is entered at New Orleans, inspected there, and every particle of the work necessary to clear them through the custom-house is performed in New Orleans, except the mere collection of the money; and the money is received by the surveyor at Louisville on a statement or certificate from the collector at New Orleans. The surveyor of the customs at Louisville then takes the certificate of the collector at New Orleans and examines whether the packages and certificates correspond, receives the money, and issues his permit for the delivery of the goods.

Mr. MARSHALL. Suppose a thousand bags of coffee are imported direct to Louisville, or any other interior port, I ask the gentleman what sort of handling and what sort of inspection they undergo at New Orleans, or any other exterior port at which they may be introduced into the country; and whether they cannot be warehoused, under the law, after they reach the city of Louisville?

Mr. HOUSTON. Just precisely the same sort of handling, inspection, and labor they would undergo if there were no port at Louisville, or such interior point; the only thing from which the collector at the exterior port would be relieved would be the handling of the money. The gentleman says that the goods may be stored at Louisville; but does he maintain that that would devolve labor to any amount upon the surveyor there? Besides, this provision does not provide at all for a warehouse at Louisville.

Mr. MARSHALL. I state to the gentleman from Alabama, that nothing is more needed at Louisville than a warehouse.

Mr. HOUSTON. That may be; but I say, and the fact is beyond controversy, that this amendment does not propose to erect a warehouse for goods.

Mr. DISNEY. I hope the gentleman will allow me to state, that the very buildings now proposed to be erected by the Secretary of the Treasury at each of these ports, are all to have provision made for the storage of goods. It is the practice now at each of them, to receive and store goods.

Mr. HOUSTON. The gentleman is mistaken; the very reverse of what he says is correct. The plans and estimates which are before the Committee of Ways and Means show no such thing.

Mr. MARSHALL. I state to the House, with the gentleman's permission, that the plan and estimate for the building at the city of Louisville, do provide for rooms in that building for the purpose of storing goods under the public warehousing system.

Mr. HOUSTON. I have not seen the plan and estimate for the custom-house at Louisville, because it was passed at the last Congress, and therefore the plans were not called for by us. But the Committee of Ways and Means have called for plans of several that were before them this session, and I have seen others at the Treasury Department, and not one of those plans contains any provision for the storage of goods, and I feel very confident that the gentleman is mistaken. As I said before, the whole of this labor is performed at New Orleans, with the exception of the mere receiving of the money and retaining it or paying it over, according to orders.

Now, sir, in Norfolk and Mobile it is very different; they are ports of entry as well as delivery, and goods are brought to those ports from foreign countries direct, are entered, inspected, and all the labor is performed there just as it is at New York, Boston, or New Orleans. There is therefore some reason why the buildings should be larger, and necessarily more costly at those ports. You have at Mobile a collector, a deputy collector, several clerks, weighers, gaugers, measurers, thirteen inspectors, and all the other officers necessary to execute the revenue laws of the country.

But, sir, I must hasten on. I will show you that the Secretary of the Treasury says he can build a house at Louisville that will answer the purpose very well, for $59,000. Here is his recommendation, and it is the only one that is before Congress, except the letter which the gentleman from Kentucky has read, and which he drew out of his pocket—I will not say his breeches pocket, for I believe letters come from coat pockets now-a-days. [A laugh.] I will read what the Secretary of the Treasury says in regard to the custom-houses at Louisville and Pittsburg:

"The Department has plans for the custom-houses at Pittsburg and Louisville, which can probably be completed for the above sum of $50,000 each; but it is a matter of great doubt whether it is either economy, or in other respects good policy, to erect such buildings as can be constructed within that limit. It is to be recollected that, in these buildings, it is intended to accommodate not only the business of the custom-house, but also the post office, United States courts, the land offices, independent treasury, and any other of the Federal officers who may be located in these places respectively.

"These cities are increasing so rapidly, that what might be considered sufficient accommodations for the above purposes at this time, will probably be entirely inadequate in the course of a comparatively very few years, and will then require either to be extended or entirely rebuilt."

He is arguing now against the $50,000:

"It should also be an indispensable requisite in all public buildings to be hereafter erected, that they should be perfectly fire-proof, both from the interior and exterior; and it is but right and proper that such structures should be not only well and substantially built, but should, within reasonable limits, be finished in a handsome and ornamental manner, both inside and out. That all these requisites cannot be obtained in a building of the necessary size, the cost of which is limited to $50,000, is very apparent. That limit would oblige the Department to the use of brick as a material, and to adopt plans which, though called fire-proof, are not so completely such as should be the case with all public structures."

Now listen to what follows:

"Buildings for the above purpose, in every way suitable and proper, and with accommodations not only sufficient for the present, but for the probable future wants of the Government for a long period, can be erected and furnished for $75,000; and it is earnestly recommended that such increased appropriations should be made. Another reason for granting this sum is, that it would prevent what might be considered as an invidious distinction between these two cities and those of Cincinnati and St. Louis, where a larger amount has been appropriated."

It seems that the Secretary of the Treasury does not want to make an invidious distinction between Cincinnati, St. Louis, Pittsburg, and Louisville, which are all in the interior, and some of them, as it were, in the same neighborhood, and he gives that as a reason for granting $75,000 to Louisville. He thinks that as $75,000 was to be expended on the building at Cincinnati and St. Louis, it would be an invidious and improper distinction to say that the buildings at Pittsburg and Louisville should not have $75,000 also. Well, sir, I am willing to give them $75,000 each, and this $16,000 to Louisville will make it up to $75,000. I think the Government should make all its buildings hereafter erected fully and perfectly fire-proof, both from the interior and exterior. He says he cannot erect a complete fire-proof building for $59,000, but he can for $75,000, and he therefore asks the appropriation of that sum. I am willing to give no more.

Mr. MARSHALL here made a remark which the Reporters could not hear.

Mr. HOUSTON. I am treating the subject fairly, and when I have discharged my duty I shall have nothing further to say upon it. But I want to bring the facts before the House. I should not have gone into this so extensively if the gentleman had read the whole of the Secretary's recommendation on this point.

Mr. MARSHALL. I did read it.

Mr. HOUSTON. Not what I now propose to read. I will add a little to what the gentleman read. The Secretary of the Treasury, says:

"If Congress, however, should not think it advisable to grant that sum ($75,000) for Pittsburg and Louisville, contracts can be made for the buildings to cost not more than $50,000 each, but for less than that amount the Department is convinced that it would be inexpedient and injudicious to attempt the erection of them. On this footing an additional appropriation of $16,000 would only be required for Pittsburg, as the balance remaining of the appropriation for Louisville exceeds $50,000."

That is to say, he can make a contract for the building of a custom-house at Louisville for $50,000 or $59,000, which will answer all the purposes of the Government at present, but he thinks we ought to have a building fire-proof, both interior and exterior, and well and handsomely finished, to suit the fashionable notions of the people of Louisville. He seems to be struggling hard to convince Congress that Louisville is entitled to $75,000, and I agree with him.

Mr. MARSHALL, of Kentucky, made a remark, which was not heard by the Reporter.

Mr. HOUSTON. I have read what the Secretary says, and I am satisfied he is right. There is no necessity of giving this large amount to Louisville, and only $75,000 to Cincinnati and Pittsburg. The house can be built for about the same cost in either of these cities, and every man here will concur with me in that opinion. It requires substantially the same character of building, and about the same amount of cost, to build a custom-house in either of those cities. Why should you build a finer house in Louisville than anywhere else? Why should you make the invidious distinction between Louisville and other cities in the same region of country?

I am now going to speak of the gentleman's estimates. We all know how estimates sometimes get in here.

Mr. MARSHALL. These are the estimates of the architect.

Mr. HOUSTON. I wish to say, that when I was struggling to obtain this $16,000 to Louisville, the Secretary of the Treasury told me that he had plans and estimates in his hands for building a fire-proof building for $75,000. That is what he told me, and that is what is written down here. These estimates were made without any solicitation or interference on my part. He gave these estimates without consultation with me, or any one else, so far as I know. And it is now for us to determine whether we shall send this bill back again to the Senate, or whether we shall terminate the matter now. It seems to me, that the amount involved is not enough to make it worth while to send the bill back to the Senate. I will say to gentlemen, that if we disagree to this amendment, and appoint a committee of conference, it may even endanger the passage of the bill itself. It stands, at least, a chance to be defeated entirely. The superintendent is now ready to start for Oregon, if he had the money to pay expenses. It is very important that he should be there. I call the previous question.

Mr. FITCH. I desire to know what will be the effect of the previous question?

The SPEAKER. Each amendment will be acted upon separately, as distinct propositions.

The previous question was then seconded, and the main question was ordered to be put.

Mr. MARSHALL. I ask for a separate vote upon the Louisville custom-house amendment.

Mr. STEVENS, of Pennsylvania. I ask for a separate vote upon the amendment relative to constructive mileage.

Mr. JONES, of Tennessee. So do I, and the yeas and nays upon that.

The SPEAKER. It is competent for the House to take the question upon receding from its amendments, or upon insisting upon them, whichever it be the pleasure of the House to do. If the question is taken upon receding from its amendments it will save one vote, which would otherwise have to be taken upon concurring.

The first amendment was to strike out or disagree to the following amendment, proposed by the Senate to the original bill:

"For presents and provisions to the Indians, and for a visit of the superintendent, upon official business, $1,000. For traveling expenses of the superintendent, and other necessary expenses, $2,500."

Mr. HOUSTON. My motion is to recede from the disagreement of the House to that amendment.

The question was put, and the motion was agreed to; and the House receded.

The next amendment was the following, which was made by the Senate to the original bill:

"For the purchase of presents, and to negotiate, under instructions from the Secretary of the Interior, with the Indians in Texas, who have intruded themselves into that State from the territories of the United States, for their removal from that State, $25,000."

And the amendment of the House of Representatives was to strike out the following words:
"Who have intruded themselves into that State from the territories of the United States."

The question was on receding from the House amendment.

Mr. HOWARD. I hope the House will not recede from its amendment.

Mr. FITCH. I call the yeas and nays.

Mr. JONES, of Tennessee. If the House will permit me to say five words, I think I can make that matter clear.

Mr. FITCH. I object, unless some one can have an opportunity to speak upon the opposite side.

Mr. JONES. I have no objection to that.

Several MEMBERS objected.

The yeas and nays were not ordered; only four members rising.

Mr. HART demanded tellers; which were ordered; and Messrs. JOHNSON of Arkansas, and HOUSTON were appointed.

Mr. JONES, of Tennessee. May I ask the chairman of the Committee on Indian Affairs one question?

The SPEAKER. Only by unanimous consent.

Mr. JONES. I desire to ask that gentleman if the gentlemen from Texas in the House did not favor this amendment?

Mr. JOHNSON. The Texas men are opposed to it.

Mr. HOWARD. The amendment defeats the whole object.

Mr. JONES. I think it carries out the precise object.

Mr. HOWARD. It is exactly the reverse.

The question was then taken, and the tellers reported—ayes 87, noes 34.

So the House agreed to recede from its amendment.

The SPEAKER. The Senate have made an amendment to the amendment made by the House to the original amendment of the Senate, which will be reported to the House.

The amendment of the Senate was to "strike out $43,700 and insert $16,000."

The section thus amended would read as follows:

"For the completion of the custom-house at Louisville, Kentucky, the additional sum of $16,000."

Mr. MARSHALL. I want the House to insist upon the amendment of the House to the Senate amendment. I make that motion.

Mr. HOUSTON. The motion, I suppose, will be to recede. That is the motion I made when I was up.

The SPEAKER. It is neither the one nor the other. The question is upon agreeing to the amendments of the Senate.

Mr. MARSHALL. I understood the Speaker, upon a former occasion, to say to the House that we might take either form of the question.

The SPEAKER. This is an amendment by the Senate to our amendment.

Mr. MARSHALL. I hope we shall disagree to the amendment of the Senate. I demand tellers.

Mr. JONES, of Tennessee. I call for the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were not ordered.

Tellers were ordered, and Messrs. MARSHALL of Kentucky, and HOUSTON were appointed.

The question was then taken, and the tellers reported—ayes 42, and, before the noes were taken, the tellers disagreed as to the number, and

Mr. HOUSTON reported that there had been a miscount.

The SPEAKER. The tellers report that they cannot count. [Laughter.]

Mr. MARSHALL. I was about nine ahead, when he closed the game upon me. [Laughter.]

Mr. HOUSTON. The last half dozen that passed through, he counted in one way and I another.

The SPEAKER. The tellers will again resume their places, and a recount will be had.

The tellers accordingly resumed their places, and a count was had, when

Mr. HOUSTON reported: Another miscount, Mr. Speaker. It is impossible for the gentleman

[Mr. MARSHALL] and myself to take the count. [Laughter.]

Mr. FAULKNER. I call for the yeas and nays.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman will recollect that the yeas and nays were demanded but refused.

Mr. STANTON, of Tennessee. I was about to say there was a quorum voting, for I recollect that there were sixty odd in the affirmative, and forty-six in the negative, and ten or a dozen went through afterwards.

The SPEAKER. There is no question about a quorum.

Mr. HOUSTON. I know about as much as the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. STANTON] on the subject. I say there was no quorum voting.

Mr. PHELPS. I hope, by general consent, there will be a recount.

The SPEAKER appointed Messrs. PHELPS and CHANDLER to act as tellers, (Messrs. MARSHALL and HOUSTON having been excused,) when the question was again taken, and the tellers reported—ayes 71, noes 62.

So the House concurred in the amendment of the Senate.

The next amendment of the Senate was then read, as follows:

"For per diem compensation and mileage of Senators, Members of the House of Representatives, and Delegates, $50,000."

Mr. STANTON, of Ohio, called for the yeas and nays; which were ordered.

Mr. STEVENS, of Pennsylvania. Did the Senate propose that as an amendment to the custom-house appropriation?

The question was then taken on agreeing to the Senate amendment, and it was decided in the negative—yeas 42, nays 97; as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Barrere, Briggs, George H. Brown, Burt, Chandler, Conger, Dawson, Dockery, Duncan, Fitch, Florence, Freeman, Gamble, Goodrich, Gorman, Sampson W. Harris, Hart, Hendricks, Holladay, Houston, Jackson, Robert W. Johnson, J. Glancy Jones, Kuhns, Lockhart, Miller, Henry D. Moore, Nabers, Orr, Phelps, Porter, Price, Schermerhorn, Snow, Stanley, Frederick P. Stanton, Richard H. Stanton, Stuart, Taylor, Thurston, Walsh, and Welch—42.

NAYS—Messrs. Abernethy, Aiken, Averett, David J. Bailey, Bell, Bocoock, J. H. Boyd, Bragg, Brenton, Albert G. Brown, Buell, Burrows, E. Carrington Cabell, Joseph Cable, Caldwell, Lewis D. Campbell, Carter, Caskey, Chapman, Churchwell, Clingman, Cobb, Curtis, Daniel, George T. Davis, John G. Davis, Dimmick, Disney, Eastman, Ewing, Faulkner, Ficklin, Floyd, Fowler, Thomas J. D. Fuller, Gaylord, Giddings, Grey, Grow, Hamilton, Hammond, Harper, Hascall, Henn, Horsford, John W. Howe, Thomas M. Howe, Thomas Y. How, Hunter, Ingersoll, Ives, Andrew Johnson, John Johnson, George W. Jones, Preston King, Landry, Mace, Humphrey Marshall, Martin, McLanahan, McMullin, McNair, McQueen, Meade, Millson, Miner, Molony, J. Moore, Murphy, Murray, Newton, Andrew Parker, Samuel W. Parker, Penslee, Penniman, Perkins, Powell, Rantoul, Reed, Robbins, Robie, Schoolcraft, David L. Seymour, Origen S. Seymour, Smart, Benjamin Stanton, Abraham P. Stephens, Thaddeus Stevens, Venable, Walbridge, Wallace, Ward, Washburn, Watkins, Wilcox, Wildrick, and Woodward—97.

So the amendment was not agreed to.

Mr. HOUSTON. There is one further amendment, to which I suppose there will be no objection, and I move that the House recede from its amendment.

The amendment referred to was then read, as follows:

"Provided, That hereafter no expense incurred by a Territorial Legislature shall be paid out of the Treasury of the United States, unless previously sanctioned by law."

The SPEAKER. This was an original amendment of the Senate, to which the House disagreed. The Senate insists upon its amendment.

Mr. HOUSTON. I move that the House recede from its disagreement.

The question was taken, and the motion was agreed to.

So the House receded from its disagreement.

The amendments were all disposed of.

Mr. STANTON, of Tennessee. I ask the unanimous consent of the House to take up a bill upon the Speaker's table, for furnishing arms to the juveniles. Every one knows what that means, I suppose. It is a bill to authorize the Secretary of War to furnish arms for a company of boys.

A Voice. I object, I object.

Mr. DANIEL. I have made several efforts to get the House to dispose of several bills lying upon the Speaker's table for months. It is very necessary that they should be disposed of, and I do hope they will be disposed of now. It will consume but very little time. It is a reproach to the House to permit bills, involving so large interests as they do in regard to private individuals, to remain so long undisposed of. They ought to be disposed of at once.

The SPEAKER. The first business in order before this body, is the consideration of business upon the Speaker's table.

Mr. CARTTER. I move that the House adjourn.

The question was taken, and the motion was agreed to.

So the House adjourned until eleven o'clock tomorrow morning.

PETITIONS, &c.

The following petitions, memorials, &c., were presented under the rule, and referred to the appropriate committees:

By Mr. BOYD, of New York: The petitions of citizens of New York, in favor of extending Uri Emmons's patent for a planing machine, dated 25th of April, 1829.

By Mr. IVES: The petition of Captain John Hoover, of Leroy, Jefferson county, New York, for an invalid pension.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

SATURDAY, July 17, 1852.

The House met at eleven o'clock, a. m. Prayer by the Rev. C. M. BUTLER.

The Journal of yesterday was read and approved.

The SPEAKER. The first business in order is a motion to lay upon the table a motion to reconsider the vote by which the Florida railroad bill was rejected.

LAND DISTRICTS IN IOWA.

Mr. HENN. I ask the unanimous consent of the House to take from the Speaker's table Senate bill No. 438, entitled "An act to create additional land districts in Iowa," with a view of having it put upon its passage. I hope my request may be granted. It is the same bill that the House committee reported.

Mr. COBB. That is a large State, and it should have additional land offices. There ought not to be any objection to the bill being taken up.

Mr. HUNTER. If it is proposed to put the bill upon its passage, I object.

RAILROAD IRON FREE OF DUTY.

Mr. MACE. I ask the unanimous consent of the House to introduce a bill of which I have given previous notice, with a view of having it referred to the Committee of Ways and Means.

There was no objection, and the bill was read a first and second time by its title, as follows:

"A bill to admit railroad iron free of duty."

Mr. ROBBINS. I object to that bill.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman's objection comes too late.

Mr. JONES, of Tennessee. I move to lay the bill upon the table.

Mr. MACE. I demand the yeas and nays upon that motion.

Mr. ORR. I hope my friend from Tennessee will withdraw his motion, and let the bill be referred.

Mr. JONES. I decline to do so.

The yeas and nays were then ordered.

Mr. STANTON, of Tennessee. I question whether the motion of the gentleman from Tennessee be in order at this stage of the proceedings. The only motion that could be made upon the first reading of a bill would be to reject it.

The SPEAKER. It has passed its second reading, and is now open for engrossment, amendments, commitment, or to be laid upon the table.

[A message was here received from the Senate, through ASBURY DICKINS, Esq., its Secretary, notifying the House of the passage by that body of certain bills.]

The question was then put upon the motion to lay the bill upon the table, and there were—yeas 51, nays 64; no quorum voting.

The SPEAKER. There is not a quorum voting. As the Chair is satisfied there is one present he trusts those who have not will cast their votes.

Messrs. JOHNSON of Georgia, BATLY of Virginia, HAMILTON, BEALE, and FREEMAN asked the unanimous consent of the House to be allowed to vote, they having been outside of the bar when their names were called.

Mr. CLINGMAN. I hope the unanimous consent of the House may be accorded, so that we may have a quorum.

Mr. FOWLER. I object.

The SPEAKER. There are 51 in the affirmative and 64 in the negative—no quorum.

Mr. SEYMOUR, of New York. There is undoubtedly a quorum in the House, several members having come in since the vote has been taken; and I will inquire of the Chair whether it be not in order, by unanimous consent, to move that the bill be referred to the Committee of Ways and Means?

The SPEAKER. That motion is not now in order.

Mr. STUART. I move that there be a call of the House.

Mr. HAMILTON. I move, by unanimous consent, that the vote be retaken on the motion to lay on the table the bill introduced by the gentleman from Indiana.

The SPEAKER. The motion of the gentleman from Michigan would seem to be an objection to all propositions except that for the regular order of proceeding.

Mr. JONES, of Tennessee. I wish to inquire whether a quorum voted on the motion to lay the bill upon the table?

The SPEAKER. A quorum did not vote.

Mr. JONES. Then I submit this question: That there being no quorum upon that vote, it is clear, beyond all sort of question, there was no quorum present when this bill was introduced and read the first and second time.

Mr. CLINGMAN. That does not follow.

Mr. JONES. I ask if the admission of the bill can be taken as the action of the House?

The SPEAKER. To the question raised by the gentleman from Tennessee the Chair has to reply, that, although the House did not divide, it is to be presumed there was a quorum present. The Chair overrules the point of order, for the reason that we are a quorum for all legislative purposes until the contrary has been shown. The question is now upon a motion for a call of the House.

Mr. BAYLY, of Virginia. I rise to a question of order. My point of order is this: That when the House is found without a quorum upon any vote, members coming in have a right to vote, notwithstanding the rule that is usually appealed to; and such must be the case if you are ever to have a quorum. If members who are brought in by a call of the House are not permitted to vote you never will have a quorum.

The SPEAKER. The Chair overrules the question of order raised by the gentleman from Virginia. One of the plainest rules of this body is, that no gentleman can vote without unanimous consent, who was outside of the bar when his name was called.

Mr. STANTON, of Tennessee. I rise to another question of order. If the question whether there be a quorum or not, or whether there has been a quorum or not, is involved, I maintain the point that it is apparent to the Speaker, from facts which he is obliged to notice, there is a quorum; for the vote shows there was within one of a quorum, and before that vote was announced various gentlemen asked to be permitted to vote.

The SPEAKER. If the gentleman will allow the Chair. Whatever might be the power of the Chair upon the point presented, the question is not now before the body, it being superseded by a motion which is clearly in order, that there be a call of the House. That is the only business now in order, except a motion for an adjournment.

Mr. HOUSTON. I call for tellers upon the motion for a call of the House.

Tellers were ordered; and Messrs. MACE and CLINGMAN were appointed.

The question was then taken, and the House refused to order a call—the tellers having reported—ayes 38, noes 89.

The SPEAKER. There being a quorum present the Clerk will again call the roll. The question is upon the motion of the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. JONES] to lay the bill introduced by the gentleman from Indiana, [Mr. MACE], entitled "A bill to admit railroad iron free of duty," upon the table. The bill was introduced by unanimous consent this morning, underwent its first and second reading, and a motion was made to refer it to the Committee of Ways and Means, when a motion was submitted that the bill be laid upon the table, upon which motion the question is now to be taken.

The question was again put, and the motion to lay upon the table was disagreed to—yeas 74, nays 79.

So the motion to lay the bill upon the table was disagreed to.

The SPEAKER. The question now recurs upon the motion to refer the bill to the Committee of Ways and Means.

Mr. MACE. Inasmuch as several members of the Committee of Ways and Means do not like the reference to that committee, I withdraw that motion, and move that the bill be referred to the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union, and ordered to be printed; and upon which motion I call for the previous question.

Mr. KING, of New York. I ask that the gentleman will withdraw his call for the previous question until I shall offer an amendment.

Mr. MACE. The bill is perfect in itself.

Mr. KING. As the gentleman objects, I trust the call for the previous question will not be seconded. I ask that my amendment be read for information.

Mr. ORR. I object.

Mr. DEAN. I move to lay the bill upon the table.

Mr. FLORENCE. I demand the yeas and nays upon that motion.

The SPEAKER. That proposition has just been voted upon, and the Chair thinks the motion cannot be repeated at this time.

Mr. DEAN. Action has been had since. The gentleman has withdrawn his motion to refer the bill to the Committee of Ways and Means, and he now proposes to refer it to the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union.

The SPEAKER. As there may be a reason, from the change of the proposition, to induce the House to lay the bill upon the table now, that did not operate before, the Chair entertains the motion.

Mr. HOUSTON. I hope the gentleman from New York [Mr. DEAN] will withdraw that motion, and the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. MACE] will let this bill go to the Committee of Ways and Means. I think it is better for those who are opposed to the bill to let it go to that committee, so that we can go on with other work. It is useless to spend time caviling about this matter. If there is a majority in favor of the passage of this bill, in God's name let them carry it. If it be referred to the Committee of Ways and Means, I can only say, that so far as I am concerned, it shall be promptly acted upon, and reported back to the House.

Mr. CLINGMAN. By unanimous consent I wish to ask a question of the chairman of the Committee of Ways and Means.

[Cries of "I object!" "I object!"]

The SPEAKER. It is objected to, and debate is out of order.

Mr. CLINGMAN. If he desires to reconsider it, why did he vote to reject the bill in the first instance?

[Cries of "Order!" "Order!"]

Mr. ROBBINS. Is it competent for the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. MACE] to withdraw his motion, if any gentleman objects to it?

The SPEAKER. It is competent for the gentleman from Indiana to withdraw his motion. The motion made by him is, to refer the bill to the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union, and that the bill be printed. The gentleman from New York [Mr. DEAN] moves, again, to lay the bill upon the table.

Mr. VENABLE. If this motion prevails, it takes the bill with it upon the table.

The SPEAKER. The motion is to lay the bill upon the table.

Mr. HOUSTON. Let me ask the House if they will not—

[Cries of "Order!" "Order!"]

The SPEAKER. Is it the pleasure of the House that the gentleman from Alabama [Mr. HOUSTON] should be heard?

[Cries of "I object!" "I object!"]

Mr. HOUSTON. I am aware that discussion is out of order, but I wished to ask the House to refer the bill.

The question being upon the motion to lay the bill upon the table,

Mr. DEAN demanded the yeas and nays; which were ordered.

Mr. MOORE, of Louisiana. I would most respectfully ask the Chair, if this motion to lay upon the table is in order? We have had that motion already, and the House have refused to lay the bill upon the table.

The SPEAKER. The Chair decides that, inasmuch as action has taken place since, by the withdrawal of the motion to commit the bill to the Committee of Ways and Means, and a substitution of the motion to refer it to the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union and print, it is in order.

Mr. CAMPBELL, of Illinois. I rise to a question of order. When the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. MACE] asked leave to introduce this bill, he was permitted to do so with the understanding that he would refer it to the Committee of Ways and Means. After he was permitted to do so without objection, he makes the motion to refer it to another committee.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Indiana [Mr. MACE] indicated his purpose to refer the bill. The House gave its unanimous consent to the introduction of the bill, but after the bill was introduced it is competent for the House to dispose of it as it may see fit under the rules. That is the opinion of the Chair.

The question was then taken upon Mr. DEAN's motion, and there were—yeas 88, nays 69; as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Abercrombie, Allison, Averett, Babcock, Barrere, Beale, Bell, Bibb, Bingham, John H. Boyd, Briggs, George H. Brown, Buell, Burrows, E. Carrington Cabell, Lewis D. Campbell, Chandler, Chapman, Curtis, Dawson, Dean, Dimmick, Disney, Duncan, Florence, Floyd, Fowler, Gamble, Gaylord, Giddings, Hamilton, Harper, Isham G. Harris, Hascall, Haven, Holladay, Horsford, Houston, John W. Howe, Thomas M. Howe, Thomas Y. How, Ives, Jackson, Jenkins, Andrew Johnson, Daniel T. Jones, George W. Jones, J. Glancy Jones, George G. King, Preston King, Kuhns, Kurtz, Landry, Letcher, Mann, Martin, Mason, McLanahan, McNair, Meade, Millson, John Moore, Murphy, Murray, Newton, Andrew Parker, Peaslee, Penn, Pennington, Perkins, Price, Reed, Riddle, Robbins, Robie, Russell, Sackett, Savage, Schermerhorn, Scudder, David L. Seymour, Richard H. Stanton, Thaddeus Stevens, Taylor, Thurston, Tuck, Walbridge, Washburn, and Wildrick—88.

NAYS—Messrs. Aiken, Willis Allen, David J. Bailey, Thomas H. Bayly, Bissell, Bocoock, Bowie, Bragg, Brenton, Albert G. Brown, Joseph Cable, Caldwell, Thompson Campbell, Chastain, Churchwell, Clingman, Cobb, Conger, Daniel, J. G. Davis, Doty, Eastman, Edmundson, Ewing, Ficklin, Fitch, Freeman, Gentry, Gorman, Green, Grey, Hendricks, Henn, James Johnson, Robert W. Johnson, Lockhart, Mace, Humphrey Marshall, McMullin, McQueen, Miller, Molony, Morehead, Nahers, Orr, Samuel W. Parker, Phelps, Porter, Powell, Robinson, Scurry, Smart, Smith, Stanley, Benjamin Stanton, Frederick P. Stanton, Abram P. Stephens, Stone, St. Martin, Strother, Stuart, Townsend, Venable, Wallace, Ward, Watkins, Alexander White, Williams, and Yates—69.

So the House agreed to lay the bill upon the table.

Mr. HOUSTON. Has the morning hour expired?

The SPEAKER. It has.

Mr. HOUSTON. Then I move that the rules be suspended, and that the House resolve itself into Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union.

Mr. BUELL. I move to reconsider the vote by which the bill was laid upon the table, and to lay that motion upon the table.

Mr. BISSELL. Upon that question I call for the yeas and nays.

The SPEAKER. If there is controversy about it, the question of reconsidering the vote goes over for the present.

Mr. DANIEL. If it is in order, I move to proceed to the consideration of private bills upon the Speaker's table.

The SPEAKER. That motion is in order.

Mr. CABELL, of Florida. I ask if the morning hour has yet commenced?

The SPEAKER. The morning hour has expired by some twenty minutes.

Mr. OLDS. I would like to know when it commenced. The morning hour is devoted to reports from committees.

The SPEAKER. The Chair will state how the morning hour commenced, if gentlemen will allow him to do so. The morning hour commenced by the presentation of business within the morning hour to the consideration of the House. The gentleman from Indiana [Mr. MACE] rose and asked the unanimous consent of the House to allow him to report a bill. The Chair decides that as the morning hour was not reserved, it had expired.

Mr. OLDS. I ask if the Chair has not announced the same order of business morning after morning?

The SPEAKER. That is very true, but in every case where the morning hour has not been interfered with, it has been reserved by express motion before proceeding to the business of the morning hour. That is the shape in which unanimous consent has been heretofore asked. It was totally neglected this morning, and in the opinion of the Chair the morning hour has expired.

Mr. OLDS. I do not wish to appeal from the decision of the Chair, but I am sure the understanding was, that when leave was granted to introduce the bill, that it should not interfere with the morning hour. If I had not been of that opinion, I certainly should not have given leave.

Mr. CABELL. I ask if that was not the nature of the motion of the gentleman from Indiana, [Mr. MACE?]

The SPEAKER. The Chair has already stated that the regular business of the morning hour was reported at the Clerk's desk. The gentleman from Indiana, [Mr. MACE,] at that stage of the proceedings obtained the unanimous consent of the House to introduce his bill. Inasmuch as the morning hour has expired, a motion is now made that the House proceed to the consideration of business upon the Speaker's table. The private business upon the Speaker's table will be reported by the Clerk.

Mr. GORMAN. I do not know in what state the report made by the Committee on Printing is, if we go on with this motion. I ask if it is in order to move to postpone the report until Monday next.

The SPEAKER. It being private bill day, the private business on the Speaker's table is first in order, to the exclusion of the report of the gentleman from Indiana, [Mr. GORMAN.] By unanimous consent alone the gentleman can get in a motion with reference to that matter.

Mr. GORMAN. I then ask the unanimous consent of the House to allow me to make such motion.

The SPEAKER. If no motion is made at all with reference to the report of the Committee on Printing, it will come up in order on some future day, when not interfered with by some more privileged motion.

Mr. GORMAN. So that it does not go upon the Speaker's table, I am satisfied.

Mr. HOUSTON. Some gentlemen have misunderstood the decision of the Chair, and have insisted that the Chair did not decide that the motion of the gentleman from North Carolina [Mr. DANIEL] takes precedence over my motion to go into the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union.

The SPEAKER. The motion of the gentleman from North Carolina does take precedence. Indeed, there is no necessity for any motion such as that made by the gentleman from North Carolina, [Mr. DANIEL.] The first business in order is Senate bill No. 185—An act for the relief of the Raleigh and Gaston Railroad Company.

Mr. JOHNSON, of Arkansas. Is it now in order to move to suspend the rules to go into the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union upon a general appropriation bill?

The SPEAKER. It is in order.

Mr. JOHNSON. I then submit that motion.

Mr. DANIEL. Upon that motion I demand the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were not ordered.

Mr. STANTON, of Tennessee. Are there not some private bills upon the Speaker's table which passed without objection through the Committee of the Whole upon objection day? I think that we ought to pass those bills. They have been for months upon the Speaker's table.

Mr. SACKETT. Does the motion to go into a Committee of the Whole upon the Private Calendar take precedence of the motion to go into the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union?

The SPEAKER. It does take precedence.

Mr. SACKETT. I then make that motion.

Mr. LETCHER. Is it in order for the gentleman to submit that motion while the House is dividing upon the other motion?

The SPEAKER. The House was not precisely in the act of dividing. Suppose tellers had been ordered: the gentleman from New York [Mr. SACK-ETT] would then have had it in his power, before the question itself was put—tellers having been ordered—to make the motion he now submits.

The question was then taken upon Mr. SACKETT's motion, and, upon a division, there were—ayes 40, noes not counted.

So the House refused to go into a Committee of the Whole House on the Private Calendar.

The question was then taken upon Mr. JOHNSON's motion, and it was decided in the affirmative.

The House accordingly resolved itself into the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union, (Mr. DISNEY in the chair.)

INDIAN APPROPRIATION BILL.

The CHAIRMAN. The business first in order is the consideration of House bill No. 43, making appropriations for the expenses of the Indian Department for the year ending the 30th of June, 1853. The time agreed upon for discussion by the House having expired, the bill is now open for amendment.

Mr. HOUSTON. I have a right, under the rules, to address the Committee of the Whole on the State of the Union for one hour. There are many things I would like to say, connected with this subject; especially upon the amendments proposed to the bill, of which notice has been given. But, as I am exceedingly desirous of expediting the public business, I will endeavor, in one instance at least, to set a good example, and I will, therefore, decline to address the committee this morning, for the purpose, if possible, of getting through with this bill.

The bill was then read by clauses.

Mr. JOHNSON, of Arkansas, moved to amend the item which reads "for repairs of buildings at agencies, $2,000," by increasing the amount to $15,000.

Mr. J. said: Mr. Chairman, I submit to the House, and to the gentlemen of the Ways and Means Committee, that the original recommendation of the Department was $15,000, and that that sum is extremely moderate for the purposes for which it is asked. The policy of this Government, and the laws now in existence in regard to Indian tribes, require that the agents of the Government shall live at or among the tribes. It is found that they cannot so effectually perform their duties if they are not convenient to the tribes; nor can they exercise such a supervision as is for the best interests of the Government, for the peace of the frontiers, and of the Indian settlements themselves, when they are not among the Indians, as when they are among them. It is utter folly to expect an agent to go and live among the distant Indian tribes, where there is no dwelling for him to inhabit, and, at best, nothing but an Indian hut where his papers, office, and records must be kept. Consequently, where there is no place of residence within a tribe that lies distant from the frontier, we find that the agent, under the law which requires them to live "at or near" the tribe over which he is appointed, is often located at considerable distances, and most inconveniently. The interest of the Government, and the prosperity of the tribe, are the victims of this error.

It will readily be seen, then, when we consider the great number of these Indian tribes, that we must have some means—and Congress has heretofore always provided these means—to support the agents, and enable them to live at least in log-cabin comfort. We cannot expect them to go and camp in the woods throughout the whole period of their service as Indian agents, nor can we, considering the amount of pay which we give them, expect them to build houses for themselves, which must afterwards revert to the Government as Government agencies. A sum of $15,000 is all that is asked for the repairs of agencies, although we have a great number of old agencies, and have taken under our control the supervision of many new tribes, where there are no agencies or houses at all; $15,000 is all that is asked for the repair of all the old agencies that already exist. I have no question in my own mind that $30,000 could be well appropriated among the various tribes for the purpose of establishing residences for these agents. We cannot expect Indian agents, men of intelligence and character, such as will be competent to exercise the requisite beneficial influence over these tribes, to go out themselves, mount a hunting shirt and leggings, camp in the woods, and sleep beneath the trees upon the bare ground; nor can we expect them, under the limited and economical system which we have adopted in paying them so small an amount—in most instances no more than $750—and losing the benefits of civilized society, living among tribes of savages, that out of this sum they should build houses for themselves, and when turned out of office by the succeeding Administration, have to abandon them, and receive nothing of this Government for them. This is not the way business is done, and I trust and believe that the Committee of Ways and Means were not fully informed of the necessities in regard to these matters. I do not believe they would have stricken out so moderate an appropriation as $13,000 out of $15,000.

I shall make no more remarks upon this subject, believing that what I have already said will show the necessity to the House, that the Government of the United States should provide some means by which the agents of the Government shall live among the tribes where their duties are to be discharged, and where they have to exercise that influence over the Indians which will preserve peace and good order upon our frontiers.

Mr. PHELPS. Mr. Chairman, the Committee of Ways and Means fully appreciate the necessities existing for erecting buildings at the various Indian agencies in this country. They were not, however, prepared at this time to authorize the expenditure of money for the erection of additional buildings for Indian agents. At the present time it is not determined at what point the Indian agencies are to be located. For years past money has been expended for the erection of buildings for the use of the agents in various tribes situated directly upon our frontiers; and there are at this time buildings at which the agents are now residing, and where they have been residing for several years past. At the last session of Congress, it will be remembered by those members who were in that Congress, the number of Indian agents was reduced by an amendment proposed by the gentleman from Arkansas, [Mr. JOHNSON,] the chairman of the Committee on Indian Affairs. The number of Indian agents was then reduced. At this time there are upon the frontiers houses in which the Indian agents reside, and when you come to the Territory of New Mexico and Utah, I am bound to concede that there are no buildings there for the agents to occupy, and it is a matter of uncertainty where these agents are to be stationed.

The Commissioner of Indian Affairs and the Secretary of the Interior have not yet determined what tribes are to be placed under the supervision of the Indian agent now stationed in New Mexico. Certain I am that one of these agents has been here during the last winter, thus showing that there is hardly any necessity for the number of Indian agents that has been given to the Territory of New Mexico. The Committee of Ways and Means were desirous of affording to the Indian department all the money which was needed for the purpose of repairing the buildings at the residences already erected within the Indian country, and hitherto the appropriation for that purpose has been limited to a sum of $2,000 per annum. The Commissioner of Indian Affairs himself tells you that the estimate he now submits exceeds the estimate of past years $13,000, and the Committee of Ways and Means made the amount proposed to be appropriated by this bill correspond with the amount that has hitherto been appropriated for that purpose.

I believe the custom hitherto has been, whenever it was thought advisable to erect a building for an Indian agent in any particular tribe, that the Commissioner of Indian Affairs, or the Secretary of the Interior, has submitted a special estimate for the erection of buildings to be occupied by such agent stationed at such point. When we have estimates of that kind sent to us, that we may know ourselves where the buildings are to be erected, that we may have all the information upon the subject, by which we may judge of the necessity of continuing agents, then will Congress be able to judge of the necessity of making such appropriations. But I am unwilling to place this sum of money at the disposal of the Commissioner of Indian Affairs, or the Secretary of the Interior, to be expended perhaps injudiciously, for Congress may determine to extinguish the title to the lands which the Indians now occupy, and then your expenditure of money for the buildings of the agents would be useless and thrown away. Again, there is another objection to this amendment. If you appropriate $15,000 for the erection of new agency buildings, I desire to know how many new agency buildings will be erected?

In the Indian country, the expense of building is much greater than it is in the States. For instance, in the Territory of Oregon, it is probably five, if not ten times greater in some portions of that Territory than it is in the States, and almost every agency building erected on the frontier of Missouri or Arkansas, designed for the use and accommodation of an agent, has cost from $1,500 to $3,000. Let, then, the Commissioner of Indian Affairs designate where he wishes to erect these buildings, but not ask for the money to be appropriated in this manner, by which he may commence some half dozen or more buildings with an appropriation insufficient to finish them, and afterwards he will come to Congress and demand additional sums of money to be appropriated for the buildings which he has commenced in order to complete them. These are the reasons which induced the Committee of Ways and Means to make an estimate in this particular for the repairs of these buildings corresponding with the estimates of preceding years.

Mr. SIBLEY. Is it in order to offer an amendment to an amendment?

The CHAIRMAN. It is in order.

Mr. SIBLEY. I propose, then, sir, to offer the amendment which I introduced a few days ago.

Mr. JOHNSON, of Arkansas. I submit that the gentleman is not in order in offering a new amendment, unless it applies to this amendment. The question has not yet been taken upon my amendment. There has been no vote upon it yet. The question was then taken on Mr. JOHNSON'S amendment, and it was not agreed to.

Mr. HOUSTON. I desire to offer the following amendment, under the instruction of the Committee of Ways and Means, to come in after line thirty-one, on page three, viz:

For contingencies of the Indian Department, $36,500.

Mr. Chairman, I have but a word to say in relation to that amendment. That is the usual appropriation for contingencies. The Committee of Ways and Means, pursuing the course pursued towards all the Departments, addressed a letter to the head of the Indian Bureau for a detail, or as near a detailed estimate of the expenditure contemplated by that appropriation as he could give. We desired to know for what objects the money was to be appropriated, as nearly as he could give it. He declined, for a considerable time to furnish it, and the committee, therefore, struck it out. Subsequently he furnished the information, and the committee have instructed me to request the House to insert this amendment. I hope it will be adopted.

Mr. JOHNSON. I am in favor of that amendment, and am not going to speak against it; but I desire to say, that there has been some strange misunderstanding between the Ways and Means Committee and the Department. Now, his letter bears date on the 5th of January, 1852, and the reply, dated 5th of January, 1852, was sent the same evening.

Mr. HOUSTON. I do not suppose the gentleman from Arkansas desires to question the veracity of my statement.

Mr. JOHNSON. I do not; but I am stating this to show that the Commissioner of Indian Affairs replied directly.

Mr. HOUSTON. The gentleman is misinformed. I have no doubt, as every member of the Committee of Ways and Means will state who is upon this floor—and I have not conferred upon the subject with any member of that committee—that these are the facts. We waited for a very long time, and the information was not sent to us. The letter we received does not bear date the 5th of January.

Mr. JOHNSON. Here is the letter.

Mr. FOWLER. I wish to make an inquiry.

I understood the chairman of the Committee of Ways and Means to say that he asked for information from the Commissioner of Indian Affairs as to the objects for which this money was to be appropriated, and that the Commissioner furnished the information. Will the chairman let the committee know what those objects are? Let us have the information.

Mr. HOUSTON. It is impossible for me to state them all. It is all of the contingencies that attend the administration of all the laws in regard to the various Indian tribes at the several Indian agencies all over the country.

Mr. FOWLER. Is the letter of the Commissioner short?

Mr. HOUSTON. The detailed statement of the items is in the committee-room. I can send and get it, if the gentleman wishes it, but it is long.

Mr. JOHNSON. I have it somewhat in my power to answer the gentleman from Massachusetts, [Mr. FOWLER,] having devoted much attention to this particular branch of business. It is this: There has been, from the time as far back as I am acquainted with the history of our legislation upon Indian affairs, a contingency necessary to be provided for, and actually provided for. That contingency for many years has stood at $36,500, which is the precise amount that the chairman of the Ways and Means Committee now offers. That contingency, which was estimated for, was thrown out of the appropriation bill in consequence of some misunderstanding between the Committee of Ways and Means and the Indian Bureau or the Department of the Interior.

Mr. PHELPS. There was no misunderstanding. The Commissioner failed to answer the letter.

Mr. JOHNSON. He failed to answer the letter according to the understanding of the committee, but he answered it according to his understanding. If that be no misunderstanding, then there was none. But the appropriation itself is for contingencies. It is one that always has been made, and should be made again, and the Ways and Means Committee offer it themselves, and it is right. But I will state the objects of the appropriation.

Mr. FOWLER. That is what I want to know.

Mr. JOHNSON. The objects are to pay for the transportation of goods and money due to the various Indian tribes in every direction throughout the broad expanse of this Union. That is one of the heaviest items. The transport of goods and supplies of bacon and salt, and every other article that can be named, throughout the whole expanse of territory where our Indian relations extend, covering, I believe, a greater area, or at least as great, as that covered by our white population. That is, as I before said, one of the heaviest items which creates the necessity for this appropriation.

The various expenses of traveling incidental to the movements of the agents under the orders of the Department is another item of expenditure. There are others which I cannot go into and give you the amount of. I have examined them, and you will see how reasonable is the amount of appropriation for all the contingencies incident to the administration of this branch of the Indian department, when you consider that the amount is not increased, although during the present fiscal year our Indian relations have been most extraordinarily extended. There is no doubt of the propriety of the appropriation.

Mr. SIBLEY. Is it in order now to offer an amendment to the amendment?

The CHAIRMAN. It is.

Mr. SIBLEY. Then I offer the following amendment, of which I gave notice the day before yesterday:

For the sub-sistence of the Indians of any tribe residing within the limits of the United States who may hereafter be suffering for want of food and proper clothing, to be expended under the direction of the Secretary of the Interior, $100,000: Provided, That in no case shall any portion of said sum be paid out unless a reliable statement shall be made to the Secretary of the Interior of the existence of such a state of suffering amongst the Indians as is contemplated in this clause.

Mr. PHELPS. I rise to a question of order. In the first place, that is not an amendment to the pending amendment; and in the second place, it proposes an expenditure which is unauthorized by any existing law.

Mr. SIBLEY. I withdraw the amendment for the present, and will offer it when the amendment now pending is disposed of.

The amendment was accordingly withdrawn.

The question recurred upon the amendment submitted by Mr. HOUSTON.

Mr. PHELPS. I move to amend the amendment by reducing the amount of the appropriation $1,000. For the information of the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. FOWLER,] I will furthermore explain that there are other expenditures besides those stated by the gentleman from Arkansas, although, perhaps, they come under the general heads which he has mentioned. The manner in which the annuities are disbursed to the Indian tribes is as follows: It will be recollected that the Indians are divided into different superintendencies, and the money which is to be expended within each superintendency is placed under the control and direction of that superintendent, and he then portions it out according to the law, to the various agents who have the disbursement of the money.

Mr. FOWLER. I desire to ask one question. I am entirely satisfied with the explanation of the chairman of the Committee on Indian Affairs, as far as regards the objects for which these contingencies are to be expended. This matter of contingencies, however, ought to be understood, because it is a matter of discretion. I desire, therefore, to know from the gentleman from Missouri, who has the discretionary control over the disbursement of these contingent expenses?

Mr. PHELPS. It is under the control of the Secretary of the Interior. The traveling expenses of the Indian agents are paid out of this fund. It is necessary they should have guards when going to the Indian country.

Mr. JOHNSON, of Georgia. I rise to a question of order. I object to this discussion about superintendencies, and the amount of money to be placed at the disposal of the different agents. It is not relevant to the amendment now before the committee.

Mr. PHELPS. With the permission of the committee, I will withdraw the amendment. I merely offered it that I might have an opportunity of answering the inquiry of the gentleman from Massachusetts.

There being no objection, the amendment was withdrawn.

The question recurred upon the amendment offered by Mr. HOUSTON, and being put, it was decided in the affirmative.

So the amendment was agreed to.

Mr. SIBLEY. I now propose to offer the amendment which I before submitted, but withdrew.

The amendment was again read.

Mr. DUNHAM. I rise to a question of order. That appropriation has not been estimated for, nor is it authorized by any existing law.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair feels compelled to overrule the point of order presented by the gentleman from Indiana. It appears, without further examination, from the very face of the bill, that an appropriation is made, in lines twenty-nine and thirty, "for provisions for Indians."

Mr. PHELPS. That appropriation is provided for by express law.

Mr. DUNHAM. The appropriations provided for in the bill, to which the Chair alludes, are provided for by express treaties, which are a part of the laws of the land.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair will remark, that in the allusion which he made to the appropriation in lines twenty-nine and thirty, he supposed that that appropriation was made under some general provision of law, authorizing the Secretary of the Interior to purchase provisions for the Indians perhaps in some particular and specified cases. If the existing law does authorize the Secretary to purchase provisions for the use of Indians, in general terms—if there be no limitation upon such appropriations, then the amendment offered by the gentleman from Minnesota, being of the same general character, would come within the operation of the law, although larger in amount.

Mr. DUNHAM. There is no law in existence that authorizes the purchase of provisions for Indians.

Mr. SIBLEY. I will state that there is a law authorizing the expenditure of $10,000 per annum as a civilization fund, and has been ever since 1819.

Mr. DUNHAM. For what purpose?

Mr. JONES, of Tennessee. To civilize the Indians.

Mr. DUNHAM. That is for another purpose entirely. But there is no existing law that I ever heard of that authorizes appropriations for the purpose which the amendment of the gentleman from Minnesota seems to contemplate.

Mr. SIBLEY. I rise to a question of order. Has not the point of order raised by the gentleman from Indiana been overruled by the Chair? If so, all these remarks are irregular and out of order.

The CHAIRMAN. There is a question of order already pending. The gentleman from Indiana will perceive that the whole point turns on a question of fact—whether the existing laws do or do not authorize the expenditure of money for the purchase of provisions for the use and benefit of Indians. The Chair cannot determine that question of fact without seeing the laws.

Mr. JOHNSON, of Arkansas. I rise to a question of order.

The CHAIRMAN. The question of order now pending must be determined before another one can be raised.

Mr. DUNHAM. It seems to me that the gentleman from Minnesota must first submit the authority of law by which such an appropriation can be made, as his amendment proposes.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair will remark again that he finds in the bill a provision to the following effect:

"For provisions for Indians, $11,800."

The Chair is therefore compelled from the face of the document to assume that such appropriations are warranted by the existing laws. If the existing laws do warrant an appropriation for such a purpose, the amendment of the gentleman from Minnesota being for that purpose, although larger in amount, is within the range of the rules of order. It all turns, as the Chair before remarked, upon the question of fact, do or do not the existing laws authorize such appropriations? The Chair infers from the face of this bill that they do.

Mr. SIBLEY. I believe that when I have explained to the committee, in the few minutes that are allotted to me under the rules, the necessity of making an appropriation of this kind, there will not be a solitary vote against the amendment. I stated in my remarks, the day before yesterday, that a state of facts had come to my knowledge within a short time which showed that in my own Territory there had, within the last few months, perished from actual starvation, some fifty or more individuals of the tribes within it. Now, I know that there is no fund at the disposal of the Department which can be used for relieving the Indians when they are reduced to extremity for want of food. I state, upon my own knowledge of the fact, that this suffering among the Indians is increasing from year to year. I myself have seen within the last few months whole bands of Indians reduced to such a state of exhaustion as to render locomotion almost impossible, and they were only enabled to live through the season by aid from the Government agents, or by individuals.

In this state of things, and with these facts staring us in the face, the question is, whether this Congress is not willing to put into the hands of the proper authorities, with all the restrictions which may be necessary to guard the expenditure of the money, such a sum as may make it possible for the Department to succor the Indians when they are found in a starving condition.

I propose, before I sit down, to modify my amendment. I find that some gentlemen around me think the appropriation too large. I am willing to reduce it to $50,000, and to guard it by all the limitations as to discretionary power in the Secretary which can be thrown around it, so that it shall be disbursed in no case except when the Indians are found to be actually in a condition bordering on starvation. I do not propose that whenever it is understood that an Indian tribe are somewhat straitened in their means of subsistence, and that they have not an abundance of supplies on hand, that a probable failure shall be anticipated and provided for; but when Indians are reduced to such an extremity as contemplated and expressed in the amendment, then, I think, there ought to be no doubt in the mind of any gentleman of this committee of the propriety of placing a fund at the disposal of the Secretary of the Interior, to be applied to their immediate relief.

I now modify my amendment so as to read as follows:

"For the subsistence of Indians of any tribe residing within the limits of the United States, who may hereafter be in a starving condition; to be expended under the direction of the Secretary of the Interior, $50,000: Provided, That in no case shall any portion of said sum be paid out unless reliable statements shall be made to the Secretary of the Interior of the existence of such a state of suffering among the Indians as is contemplated by this clause.

Mr. PHELPS. I am under the necessity of opposing the amendment proposed by the gentleman from Minnesota. By treaty stipulation, and by law, we appropriate, in round numbers, $800,000 to be expended for the benefit of Indians. I mean that that is the amount which we are bound by treaty to disburse to the Indians for their support and subsistence. The gentleman from Minnesota now proposes to increase the amount $50,000, without any recommendation or estimate from the Department or from the Commissioner of Indian Affairs, but upon his own mere motion, and upon information which he has obtained by his residence in the Territory of Minnesota, relative to the suffering condition of Indians in that Territory. Now, if you make this appropriation in this instance, you will have to follow it up by appropriations hereafter, and you cannot estimate the extent to which expenditures will increase and grow upon us. Those wild tribes of Indians, which support themselves by robbing our emigrants to California and Oregon—by plundering the emigrant trains crossing the plains—are sometimes found in a state of starvation, and you would have to disburse money to keep them alive to scalp defenseless men, women, and children. Away with such philanthropy!

Mr. SIBLEY. I wish to correct the statement of the gentleman as to a matter of fact. I do not propose that this money shall be expended for the benefit of any particular tribes of Indians that now receive annuities from the Government, but among all the tribes in the United States—those who do or do not receive annuities, wherever they may be found in a suffering condition.

Mr. PHELPS. Then it is a proposition to support the wild Indians, and pay them for murdering white men.

It is proposed to extend it now, not to those civilized Indians upon our frontiers who may be starving or suffering, but you are to extend it to those wild Indians, and thus to give them a premium to plunder, scalp, and tomahawk our defenseless women and children. I can never consent to such an expenditure. There is a provision existing for an appropriation of $10,000, or not to exceed that, to be expended under the direction of the Secretary of War, and is usually expended under the direction of the officers of the Army in the Commissary's Department, amongst the Indians who visit the military stations and forts upon our frontiers, if they are found to be in a destitute or starving condition. You will find that appropriation embraced in the Army appropriation bill. I have no objection to that appropriation.

Mr. SACKETT. Suppose the amendment were adopted, I ask the gentleman if there is any general provision of law which prescribes the manner in which this appropriation is to be expended?

Mr. PHELPS. None whatever. There is no legislation upon the subject. This provision be adopted, it will be the first and only provision upon your statute-book directing money to be expended in this manner. There is no regulation for this disbursement of this money if it is appropriated. There is no law regulating the conduct of the officers who may be charged with its disbursement.

Mr. SIBLEY. I will state to the gentleman that there is a provision appropriating $10,000 for the civilization of the Indians, without any restriction whatever so far as the Department is concerned.

Mr. PHELPS. So far as this civilization fund is concerned, there is a standing appropriation of $10,000, for civilizing the Indians; but that money is expended for paying missionaries to go among them, for establishing and supporting schools, and for civilizing the Indians. I know of some schools which are supported and kept up out of these $10,000. It is not expended for purchasing clothes and provisions, but, as I said, for paying missionaries and for the support of schools. The money is expended for an altogether different purpose from that contemplated by the proposition of the gentleman from Minnesota.

Mr. JOHNSON, of Arkansas. I move to amend the amendment by striking out "$50,000," and inserting "$1,000."

I offer that amendment for the purpose of saying that I do not concur in the amendment of the gentleman from Minnesota, [Mr. SIBLEY,] for reasons which I will give to the committee. I do not concur in the reasons given by my friend from Missouri [Mr. PHELPS] for opposing it, but there are, in my opinion, good reasons for opposing it. My friend from Missouri says this is offered as a premium to these wild Indians for scalping and destroying our people.

Mr. PHELPS. If the gentleman will allow me, I will explain. I understood the gentleman from Minnesota to say that he did not desire this money to be expended among the civilized Indians, but among the wild Indians with whom we have no treaties—those who scalp and tomahawk our defenseless women and children on the frontiers.

Mr. JOHNSON. The object of my friend from Minnesota is this: There are large numbers of Indians within the limits of his own Territory whom I have no doubt, as he states, suffer extremely. Well, I am not afraid, if we were to give to them to preserve them from starvation, that it would prove a fruitful motive to destroy our people at all. The only objection I have to it is, that it would take something from the Treasury, and it would furnish a precedent which would grow into a system, so that all the tribes of Indians with whom we have made no treaties would be fastened upon the Government of the United States for support. But, aside from that, if I supposed that the cause of humanity required us to afford these Indians relief—if I supposed they were really suffering, so that help was seriously demanded from our hands, from the whole history of this country connected with these Indians, I should feel bound to come forward, temporarily at least, and save their lives.

But, sir, I have not that species of evidence which would authorize me to come forward and vote to expend $100,000 or even $50,000 for this purpose. Not at all. I do not find that the honorable gentleman from Minnesota has presented here the recommendation of any Department of this Government for this appropriation. The Department which has especial charge of these Indians has sent no message here upon the subject. He comes here and asks for the appropriation upon information which he has received from home. But is that a source of information sufficiently authoritative to be relied upon by us when we know nothing of it? We must be permitted to judge of the testimony of which he judges himself. We might not perhaps judge of it so partially as the gentleman feels bound to judge. This consideration has more especial weight when we know that the Government has agents amongst these tribes, and if serious want existed amongst them to the extent represented by the gentleman from Minnesota, the Indian agents there would report it here to the Indian Department of this Government and call for relief; and if the circumstances of the case were such as to justify it, the Department would commend it to our consideration if they did not recommend an appropriation. But they have not brought it to our notice. Now, shall we step aside here without any authoritative showing from any quarter, when we have a department of the Government expressly to attend to and investigate these matters, and appropriate $100,000 for what we do not know to exist, or for what we do not know in that authoritative manner which we are required to know before we act? It is setting an example or precedent the end and extent of which no man can foresee. I cannot, then, when I know that no committee of this House, and no committee of the Senate has had this matter under consideration—when no Department of the Government which have these Indian agents amongst all these various tribes of Indians, has recommended it to our consideration—when they are all silent upon the subject—agree to make the appropriation.

Mr. JONES, of Tennessee. I am opposed to the amendment to the amendment, not because I am in favor of the amendment of the gentleman from Minnesota, but I want both voted down because there are no recommendations or estimates from any Department of Government for them, and because there has been no investigation by any committee.

Mr. SIBLEY. Will the gentleman from Tennessee allow me to explain?

Mr. JONES. I cannot. I have but five minutes to speak. I wish to make a remark or two upon this bill. These entire estimates when referred to the committee by the Department amounted to $928,890, all based upon acts of Congress and treaties with the various tribes of Indians. The Committee of Ways and Means, in reporting this bill, reported in favor of all these items except $49,800. Thirteen thousand dollars of the sum they rejected was for the repair of buildings at the agencies, and which this committee refused to reinstate upon the motion of the gentleman from Arkansas, [Mr. JOHNSON.] Another item which the committee of Ways and Means did not report, of $36,500, for contingencies, this committee, upon motion of the gentleman from Alabama, [Mr. HOUSTON,] the chairman of the Committee of Ways and Means, have restored. There is another item of $300 which is not reported or estimated for. This bill includes the entire amount estimated for by the Department except the $13,300; and of that, $13,000 the Committee of the Whole have refused to insert in the bill. Then we come within $300 of the amount originally estimated; and it is believed this $300 may be accounted for by a clerical error; so that the bill, as it now stands, embraces the original estimates of the Department to us for the support of the Indian Department.

The question was then put, and the amendment to the amendment was not agreed to.

Mr. SIBLEY. Is it in order for me to amend my amendment?

The CHAIRMAN. It is in order to amend the amendment.

Mr. HOUSTON. I think it is not in order for the gentleman to amend his own amendment.

Mr. SIBLEY. If it is in order I move to reduce the sum $20,000.

Mr. HOUSTON. I have no objection to the gentleman adopting that course; but if it is adopted it will render this debate interminable, and, with the design of getting along with this business, I object. I must do so, for if we go on allowing members to amend their own amendments we shall never get through.

Mr. SIBLEY. I ask the Chair to decide whether it is in order for me to amend my amendment?

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair decides that it is in order.

Mr. JOHNSON, of Arkansas. To avoid all difficulty, I move, in order to give the gentleman from Minnesota a chance to speak in opposition to the amendment, to reduce the amount to $100.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair would remark that the amendment is open to amendment, and he knows of no parliamentary rule which would prohibit the mover of an amendment from the privilege extended to every other member upon the floor. The Chair will make no remark upon the symmetry of such a proceeding. He can only decide upon the right; and he decides that the gentleman from Minnesota has the right to make the amendment.

Mr. JOHNSON. I will offer the amendment which I a moment ago indicated, and the gentleman from Minnesota can speak against it. I move to strike out all but $100.

Mr. SIBLEY. I thank the gentleman for his courtesy. I am opposed to that amendment. I do not wish to be placed in a wrong position upon this subject by the remarks of the gentleman from Missouri, [Mr. PHELPS,] and the gentleman from Tennessee, [Mr. JONES,] with regard to my object in offering the amendment. It has been stated that there has been no estimate furnished from the Department for this appropriation. Now, I will venture to say that there is no officer connected with the Indian Department of this Government, be he a superintendent or commissioner, who would not heartily assent to the proposition I have introduced, and declare such a provision to be indispensable. There is no official document, so far as I know, at the Indian Office showing the state of things I have exhibited. But I have here letters from reliable sources upon which I have based my statement to this committee. And I do not hesitate to reaffirm that within the last six months many Indians in the Northwest have perished for want of proper food and clothing.

The gentleman from Missouri [Mr. PHELPS] has stated that this amendment was offering a sort of premium to those wild Indians to scalp and tomahawk the defenseless emigrants. Sir, I say to that gentleman, and he must be aware of the fact, that the very reason why those Indians have become so desperate in their attacks upon the lives and property of the whites who are passing to California and Oregon is, because the action, or rather non-action, of the Government has reduced them to the necessity of providing themselves with the means of subsistence by the commission of these outrages. Has not their country been made a thoroughfare for all the people who choose to pass through it with or without their consent? Has not the game which furnished the principal food of these poor wretches been destroyed or driven off, and the Indians thereby rendered desperate? And has the Government provided against the inevitable result of such a state of things? Sir, the gentleman has made a great mistake in asserting that the passage of this amendment will be virtually offering these Indians a premium to commit depredations. It will be attended with precisely the contrary effect.

Mr. JONES. I would inquire of the gentleman from Minnesota if the Indians of any tribe with whom we have treaties, and with whom we have an agent, has been reduced to a state of starvation?

Mr. SIBLEY. I was just coming to that point.

The CHAIRMAN. Under the rules of the House, allowing five minutes' discussion, it is provided that a member offering an amendment shall be allowed five minutes to explain his amendment, and show why it should be adopted; and another shall be allowed five minutes to show why it should not be adopted. This general debate is hardly allowable, except it is under a liberal construction of the rule. The amendment is to reduce the appropriation, and the gentleman must confine himself to showing reasons why the appropriation should not be reduced.

Mr. SIBLEY. I was endeavoring to show why this amendment of the gentleman from Arkansas, [Mr. JOHNSON,] proposing to reduce the appropriation, should not be adopted. Now, sir, with regard to the question of the gentleman from Tennessee, [Mr. JONES,] I wish all the facts to be before the House when a vote is taken upon my amendment. I will state, that some of the Indians in our country are removed hundreds of miles from the agency within whose jurisdiction they are considered to be; and it is impossible for the agents to be cognizant of everything that passes amongst Indians at that distance. They must necessarily depend upon the reports of the missionaries and traders, who live near the Indians. I am not aware that any among the bands who receive annuities have died of starvation. They are, of course, far better off than others who must hunt for a subsistence. But I have before explained that, in offering the amendment, I have not reference particularly to the state of things existing in this or that part of the country. I know that much suffering is endured by the Indians in the Northwest, but to what extent no one can tell. I presume the same scarcity of food to exist elsewhere; perhaps in California, Oregon, New Mexico, or among the root diggers of the Rocky Mountains; and that the proper authorities may have the means at command to relieve any such extremity of distress, wherever it is to be found within the limits of our great country, I have been induced to present my amendment for the consideration of the committee. Having thus discharged what I conceived to be my duty, the fate of the proposition must be decided by the House. The facts are before you; and, meager as the information is, the bare possibility of starvation being endured by any within the boundaries of this Republic, should be guarded against without delay. If the Indians do not need relief, the money will remain in the Treasury; if they should need it, God knows that this Congress ought not to withhold it from them.

But, sir, my amendment does not profess to do more than to place a fund in the hands of the Executive, to be used in succoring those poor Indians who are in a starving condition, whenever it may be known, or can be proved, to the satisfaction of the Secretary of the Interior, that the Indians are in a state of starvation. I want the Secretary to have some means at his disposal to feed them, and keep them from starvation.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is upon agreeing to the amendment to the amendment.

Mr. JOHNSON, of Arkansas. I withdraw the amendment, if there is no objection.

No objection was made, and the amendment was withdrawn.

The question then recurring upon agreeing with the original amendment,

Mr. FOWLER requested that it might be read again.

It was accordingly again read, as above inserted.

Mr. DURKEE. I propose to amend the amendment by adding $5,000.

Mr. Chairman, I am in favor of this amendment of the gentleman from Minnesota, because it is wise, humane, and just. We all know, sir, that the Indian lives by the chase, and that his means of subsistence are precarious and uncertain—that frequently during the severe winters of the last few years, many of the Indians in the Northwest have died of starvation in consequence of deep snows, which prevented the digging of roots. Many of them, also, have suffered much from immense herds of cattle driven through their country to California, and from loss of their game killed by emigrants.

The Omahas, residing on the Missouri river, and directly on the California route, sent a delegation to this city last winter, to represent to their "Great Father" their wrongs and grievances. I accompanied this delegation to the Executive mansion, and witnessed their interview with the President. My sympathies were deeply touched as I heard these unsophisticated children of the forest relate their tale of hardship and suffering. The chief orator said to the President, "The Omaha tribe wish to maintain friendly relations with their white brethren, and are in favor of exhausting all pacific means for a proper adjustment before resorting to measures of war." The President made them presents, and promised further relief. Sir, were there a fair exposition made of the dealings and conduct of this Government towards the Indians, I fear we should find a tremendous balance against us. We may pass over these things lightly now, but it would be well for us to remember that there must come a day of reckoning. I noticed a few days since, in examining the report of the Commissioner of Public Lands, that we had realized already for those purchased of the Indians, over sixty millions of dollars profit, after paying all expenses incident to survey and sale. On a large portion of these lands may now be seen densely populated cities and highly cultivated farms worth from ten to one hundred dollars per acre; and for these lands we paid the poor Indians only about ten cents per acre. Now, while our red brethren are crowded by white settlements on all sides, and their whole country overrun by the immense travel to the Pacific, to refuse this small tribute to the cause of justice, appears to me an act of great inhumanity. This amendment you see, sir, only provides relief where there is danger of actual starvation, and shall we refuse them even this slight act of reparation? We hear much of the cruelty of slavery, and alas! justly, too, but I have never yet heard that the master in any case allowed the slave to perish with hunger. Sir, for our Government, which boasts so much of its civilization and liberality, to deny this relief to the hitherto uncared-for Indian, would be as oppressive as the conduct of the English Government towards Ireland in her infamous system of absenteeism and taxation. We all remember that only a few years since, fifty thousand people in Ireland died for want of food, and that, too, in a year when the Island produced more than enough for the people of that ill-fated country.

Mr. JOHNSON, of Georgia. I am opposed to the amendment offered by the gentleman from Minnesota, [Mr. SIBLEY.] I am opposed to it because it involves a wrong principle. We are appealed to here, as a Government, to extend our hand for the purpose of protecting these Indians from starvation on the ground of humanity. Humanity is the cry. Why, sir, are not we appealed to as a Government by the people of this District to support the poor of this District? Why do we not appropriate sums of money for the support of the poor in all our territories, of our race, our own kindred, and our own people? Humanity would require this. This principle of humanity is far too cheap. When Kossuth arrived upon our shores, the principle of humanity required that we should declare ourselves in favor of the principle of intervention in the affairs of Europe, and to protect and regulate her affairs.

Now we are appealed to to make an appropriation to prevent the Indians from starving, and every person in distress must be recognized by this Government; everybody must be encouraged to look to the Government for provision and protection. Labor they may throw aside, may wander and roam through the woods, and refuse to work at all, and thereby be reduced to a state of starvation, and humanity and hospitality require that we should appropriate the funds of our own people to protect them!

I say, sir, it is wrong in principle. This Government has not the power and the resources to protect mankind from misery and from starvation, if they do not protect themselves by labor. Let them labor—let them till the earth. If they do not they will suffer. It is not our business, and humanity does not require that we should interfere for the purpose of regulating the affairs of Europe, or for the purpose of protecting these Indian tribes.

The question was then taken on the amendment offered by Mr. DURKEE to the amendment, and it was not agreed to.

Mr. GIDDINGS. I move to amend the amendment by inserting $54,000 in the place of $50,000.

I move an amendment, sir, simply for the purpose of expressing the feelings which I entertain upon this subject. I know there is no opportunity now, in a five minutes speech, of explaining in regard to the system of our intercourse with these savage tribes. I expressed the hope, a few days since, that the Committee on Indian Affairs would take this whole system into consideration and change it; and that instead of appropriating our funds now to send troops to maintain our army, and to furnish arms and munitions to butcher these poor savages, we should send them food, which is a far more efficient and powerful defense to our frontier, than all the arms we can raise. As a matter of policy, I say let us feed those who are starving. As was well alluded to by the gentleman opposite me, [Mr. DURKEE,] it is a duty due from us to those whose lands we inhabit, and whom we have driven from their soil. If there is anything due from one people to another upon the face of the earth, it is due from this nation to the savage tribes upon our western frontiers.

Sir, I was a little astonished to hear the gentleman here [Mr. JOHNSON, of Georgia] deny that this was a matter of humanity, and over which we have no control. A few days since we could vote to pay $33,000 a trip to splendid steamships, for show, for glory, and for the purposes of commerce—and in the course of one year, we can spend a million of dollars in that way—but now when it is proposed to expend $50,000 for the purposes of humanity, gentlemen shudder and revolt at it. Now, I beg gentlemen here, if there are any such principles and feelings as humanity, and propriety, instead of bestowing the wealth of this nation upon these corporations, upon men of wealth, upon millionaires, and ten or fifteen millions annually upon your Army and Navy—in the name of Heaven, let us feed our enemies and make them our best friends. My heart responded to every sentiment which fell from the lips of the gentleman from Minnesota, [Mr. SIBLEY,] and I know the feelings of the gentleman from Arkansas, [Mr. JOHNSON.] He is right about this matter, but I would extend it so as to induce the belief to which he alludes. Put it under the control of proper agents, and there is no difficulty or danger of that.

Mr. Chairman, I have no more to say at this time. I ought not to have spoken at all, on account of the condition of my throat, but I merely rose to say a word in behalf of these poor Indians.

Mr. DUNHAM. Mr. Chairman, I know that upon all occasions where appeals are made to humanity, we are very apt to be carried away; but it strikes me that the principles of true humanity require that we should pursue a different course from that proposed by this amendment. We must adopt one of two lines of policy towards the Indian tribes upon our frontiers: We must either civilize them, or they must be exterminated. The idea of keeping up the present relations in our different States and Territories is preposterous. What, then, is to be the effect of this amendment? It is twofold. If you introduce this system, by appropriating this $50,000, you will be obliged to do it again and again, until you will have to open the public Treasury to all the Indians of the country. It must result in this. Here it is now in Minnesota; perhaps, next, it will be in Arkansas; next, in the Territory beyond; and so it will go on until the Indians of all your Territories will come upon the public Treasury for support. If you put them upon the Treasury for support, you take from them the inducement to transfer their lands to the Government for the purpose of settlement. One of the great objects now accomplished by the Indians, in making their treaties with the Government for transferring their lands to the Government, is that they may have permanent means of support from the Government by receiving pay for their lands. If you adopt the practice which is to be established by this amendment, you take away all that object. And again, I ask, what inducement there will be for the Indian tribes to become civilized if you pursue this policy of supporting them in this manner? I confess I do not see any charity in this Government in supporting a single Indian by way of an annuity upon the public Treasury.

I say this is a most ruinous policy to the Indians themselves. We must either pension them upon the Treasury of the Government, and give them enough to support themselves entirely, or else we must withhold all support and compel them to become civilized, and to adopt industrial pursuits for their own sustenance. I submit to the committee whether this must not be the case? If you give the $50,000 asked for this Territory, I will inquire whether you do not thereby take away the stimulants to their either conveying the territory to the General Government, or becoming civilized and supporting themselves by their own labor upon their own soil. I submit to the committee that it becomes them to weigh well, before they adopt this principle of gratuities to the various Indian tribes. I tell you, if you adopt this principle, by adopting the amendment, you will never see the end of it; but it will go on increasing and increasing until every Indian from the Mississippi river to the Pacific ocean, shall be put upon the public Treasury for support, to be kept, as the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. PHELPS] said, in a sort of half state of starvation, with just enough to live upon, in addition with what you give them, what they may steal and plunder from your own citizens.

Mr. DURKEE. I would like to ask the gentleman the question, whether Congress have not provided for the poor of this District; and whether, if that be so, we should not as well provide for the wants of suffering Indians as for the poor in this place?

Mr. DUNHAM. There is a very great difference in the policy. The poor of this District, if they are supported out of the public Treasury—and it may be a question whether they should or should not be thus supported—are civilized men who have been overtaken and reduced by misfortune, and therefore we are bound to support them as a portion of the community. There is nothing to be gained by throwing them back upon their own resources as will be in the case of the Indians.

Mr. GIDDINGS. With the consent of the committee, I will now withdraw the amendment proposed by me.

There was no objection, and the amendment was withdrawn.

Mr. VENABLE moved to increase the amount to $56,000.

Mr. Chairman, we have been admonished that enough has been said about the claims of humanity, in relation to this band of starving Indians. I hope that I shall never be unwilling to hear those claims as long as they are unsatisfied. As long as I am a member of this House, the claims of the widow, the orphan, or the wronged and suffering Indian, shall never be passed by without an effort on my part to satisfy them. I mean to do my duty, and to be found ready to acknowledge those obligations which originate in my relations to suffering humanity. The gentleman from Indiana [Mr. DUNHAM] presented one of the coolest propositions to which I have ever listened—that the Indian race must be either civilized or exterminated. Who authorized us to go on a crusade to press civilization by force upon a race of our fellow-men, or to destroy them in one general massacre? Who commissioned us, as a Christian people, to destroy a whole race of men, whose offense is, that they decline to adopt our institutions, and refuse to surrender their lands? For the gentleman from Indiana declares that, should this amendment pass, the inducement for the Indians to sell the lands will be removed—a policy which presses the sword as the first argument; and, when that fails, the horrors of starvation brought on by our own cupidity. We have invaded their territory, destroyed their game, despoiled them of their lands by the mockery of treaties wrested by force; and now, when a perishing, broken-down band of savages, reduced to extremities, is presented to us for our favorable consideration, we are told that sound policy dictates that we turn a deaf ear to their complaints. A people reduced to poverty by our policy lift up their hands to us for bread; a poor band of Indians, the victims of hunger, that direst plague which waylays and besets the path of man, cry to us for food in their extremities. In reply, gentlemen cipher and calculate. With such ciphering and calculation I have no sympathy. I mean to wash my hands of any share in the responsibility in such a system. The starving Irish were heard over the ocean—their cries reached us; the victims of an earthquake in Central America have received bread at our hands; but the owners of this broad land, who have been driven from their homes, the graves of their ancestors, and all that was dear to them, may perish, and we look to that event as one of the alternatives of the policy of civilization or extermination. I do not wonder that civilization is declined by them, when all that they know of it is derived from the policy pursued by this Republic towards them and their red brethren. We can pour out millions upon the Collins steam lines and rich corporations. The Treasury can be depleted at every call of dictatorial wealth; but the faint cry of the perishing, plundered savage is drowned in the clamors which are always heard around this Hall, raised in behalf of the demands of rich cupidity. Sir, God punishes crimes in that state of society in which they do the greatest mischief; He therefore leaves to Governments and nations to be his ministers in punishing crimes which war against social organization, reserving to himself the regulation of that punishment hereafter. But, as nations do not exist hereafter, history teaches us that they are the subjects of chastisement here. Ammon and Moab, Edom and Amalek, have been swept away in His wrath; other nations have experienced the same fate, and the agitations of the civilized world indicate the progress of similar dealings on the part of Heaven. I desire, if possible, to avoid the cup of wrath which I fear is in store for us as a people, for the wrongs inflicted on this unhappy race. I do not blame them for declining civilization at the hands of their enemies and oppressors. I have never been surprised that the persecuted Aztec of Mexico, about to be executed, when the priest proposed to Christianize him in order that he might go to heaven, asked, "Are there any Spaniards there?" Being told that there were, declared that he did not wish to go to such a place. Sir, the civilization which leaves the perishing Indian to die, and withholds bread, deserves to be rejected by them. I shall vote for bread for these Indians. I feel in doing so that I have done my duty.

Mr. DUNHAM. I wish to make a single remark, as the gentleman from North Carolina has placed my argument in a false light, unintentionally, of course. I did not say that our policy must result in their extermination, but that the natural tendency of things must result in their extermination, unless they become civilized.

Mr. STANTON, of Ohio. I am opposed to the amendment of the gentleman. I do not think the original amount is any too much. The proposition of the gentleman from Minnesota [Mr. SIBLEY] will not prevail here. It is not large enough. It does not hold out inducements enough, and therefore it cannot succeed. [Laughter.] I confess myself a little shocked at some of the sentiments I have heard advanced upon this floor. One reason that is urged against granting this in the shape of what is called a gratuity, is, that they have now annuities.

Mr. JOHNSON, of Arkansas. I rise to a question of order, regretting very much to be compelled to interrupt the gentleman. The gentleman from North Carolina [Mr. VENABLE] presented an amendment, the adoption of which he advocated for five minutes. The honorable gentleman from Ohio, now occupying the floor, is speaking in favor of the same amendment. It is inconsistent with the rules that two speeches shall be made in favor of the same amendment. I wish to speak in opposition to the amendment, if I am permitted.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair's attention was called to the precise point made by the gentleman from Arkansas; but in scrutinizing the language of the gentleman, failed to discover, so far as he had proceeded, any positive exhibition of a position in violation of his right, under the rule, to speak in opposition to the pending amendment. The original amendment, as the Chair is advised, is for the sum of $50,000. The present proposition is to increase that amount, and the remarks of the gentleman from Ohio must be in opposition to that increase. The Chairman will here remark, that he too fully appreciates the importance of free, untrammelled discussion, to limit it unnecessarily; but it is obvious to every gentleman of the committee, that the strong tendency on the part of gentlemen is to extend this into a miscellaneous debate, which will be a violation, substantially, of the order of the House; and the Chair resolves that no further discussion upon the general merits of the bill shall be had, and that gentlemen shall be allowed only the privilege established by the rule of five minutes in explanation, either in favor or opposition of the pending amendment. The gentleman from Ohio will limit himself, as the Chair trusts every gentleman will, to the privilege accorded by the rules. The gentleman will therefore speak in opposition to the amendment.

Mr. STANTON. I was about to remark, if I am at liberty to proceed, that I understood gentlemen to have urged here as a reason why we ought not to grant this in the shape of a gratuity, that we are now paying some $800,000 in the shape of annuities to these Indians. That is no gratuity. We have received three times over the amount proposed by the amendment. If they had the first principle of justice done them they would have this amount many times over. What is the original proposition? It is that you shall set apart a poor fund to save these Indians from starvation. It is nothing more nor nothing less. It is not that they shall be supported—that they shall be exempted from exertion. The inducement to labor will not be taken away. It is that when they come to the door of starvation—when they have no means of securing anything to sustain nature that they shall be supported. It is nothing more nor less. Now I assert that one dollar spent for bread is worth one hundred dollars expended for powder to preserve the peace of the frontier. Gentlemen want estimates from the Department. Did you have an estimate to appropriate $5,000,000 to Ireland? I want to know that. It is well known you had no estimate from the Treasury for that. Did you have an estimate for the appropriation to the Collins line of steamers? Some gentlemen on the Committee of Ways and Means, who are now so distressed about precedents with regard to gratuities, have favored, without estimates being had from the Department, the appropriation of millions to the Collins line, which is big with consequences as a precedent. They are opposed to the poor fund for fear of its being made a precedent. I should like to see the distinction between the two appropriations demonstrated.

The best way, Mr. Chairman, to preserve peace with the Indian tribes is to deal justly, kindly, and generously by them. You have taken from them their lands, you have destroyed their game, you have taken away the means of their subsistence, and starvation is the necessary consequence.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair will have to interrupt the gentleman and decide that his course of remark is out of order. He must confine himself to opposition to the amendment.

Mr. JOHNSON, of Arkansas, I rise to speak in opposition to the amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The presumption is that the gentleman from Ohio was speaking in opposition to the amendment, and the gentleman from Arkansas will remember that the rule of the House permits but one speech in the opposition.

Mr. JOHNSON. I raised a point of order on the gentleman from Ohio. The Chair decided that the remarks of the gentleman were not in opposition to the amendment, and called him to order.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair intimated to the gentleman that he must limit his remarks to the question.

Mr. JOHNSON. My object simply was to stop the debate.

The question was then put, and the amendment to the amendment was disagreed to.

The question then being put upon Mr. SIBLEY's amendment.

Mr. JOHNSON, of Arkansas, demanded tellers; which were ordered; and Messrs. HOUSTON and CHANDLER were appointed.

The question was then taken, and there were—ayes 41, noes 76.

So the amendment was rejected.

The following clause of the bill was read:

"For interest on the amounts awarded Choctaw claimants under the fourteenth article of the treaty of Dancing Rabbit Creek, of the 27th September, 1830, for lands on which they resided, but what it is impossible to give them, and in lieu of these scrip has been awarded under the act of the 23d of August, 1843, not deliverable east by the third section of said law, $43,600."

Mr. JONES, of Tennessee. Under the direction of the Committee of Ways and Means, I propose to strike out all after the word "thirty," in the eighty-fourth line, to the word "dollars," inclusive, in the eighty-ninth line, and insert the following:

From the 1st of July, 1852, to the date of the passage of an act entitled "An act to supply deficiencies in the appropriation for the fiscal year ending the 30th June, 1852," a sum not exceeding $2,000.

Mr. J. This provision of $43,600, originally reported in this bill by the Committee of Ways and Means, was to pay the five per cent. interest upon the $872,000 which is owing by the United States to the Choctaw Indians under the treaty of Dancing Rabbit Creek. It will be recollected that in the deficiency bill we have appropriated $872,000 for the payment of the principal, and also for the payment of the interest up to the first of this month. We now propose to strike out this appropriation for the interest upon that debt for the current fiscal year, and appropriate this $2,000, which is to cover the interest from the commencement of this fiscal year up to the time this debt shall be paid to the Choctaw Indians.

Mr. HUNTER. I am opposed to this amendment, because it is only three days since we have passed a law by which we provide expressly that no interest shall be paid after the first day of this month. It is a law reported from that same committee, which provides for the payment of this claim, and one of its sections declares that no interest shall be paid after the 30th day of June, 1852.

Mr. JONES. We have not paid the money upon the first of the month, and we cannot pay it until the deficiency bill shall be approved by the President. I ask the gentleman if he is opposed to paying the interest upon that debt from the first day of July until the money shall be appropriated to pay the interest?

Mr. HUNTER. I will answer the gentleman very briefly. I directed the attention of the committee to that very section at the time it was under consideration. While the bill was under consideration, I asked why it was in that shape, as there was a clause in it which provided in express terms that no interest should be paid after that day? I was opposed to the bill then, for I thought there was something in it which ought not to be there.

I am opposed to paying interest in that way, as if it were paid upon that day, and no later.

The question was then taken upon Mr. JONES's amendment, and it was agreed to.

Mr. JOHNSON, of Arkansas. I offer the following amendment, to come in after the 92d line, constituting a new clause:

"For payment to the Chickasaw Indians for the amount of defalcation of Captain R. D. C. Collins, United States disbursing agent, together with the interest thereon, at the rate of six per cent. per annum from March, 1839, until paid, $24,982 28."

This is an amount of money which was placed in the hands of the United States disbursing agent, during a period running somewhere between 1834 and 1839, R. D. C. Collins, captain in the United States Army. That agent became a defaulter, and among the other sums of money with which he defrauded, was the amount of twenty-four thousand nine hundred and odd dollars of the funds of the Chickasaw nation. By express treaty with that tribe of Indians, we were bound to invest the whole of their funds in such a manner as should bring them an interest to be paid to them in the shape of an annuity. Their accounts remained unsettled until they themselves produced them. They have appointed a delegation of their own number, who are now in this city. They have come here to examine before the Commissioner of Indian Affairs into their accounts.

The amount was placed by the Government of the United States in the hands of their own disbursing agent, and when he broke up as a defaulter, this remaining amount had never been accounted for. This it is proposed to place to the credit of the Indians, on the books.

I will now read letters from the Treasury Department, from the Secretary of the Interior, and from the Commissioner of Indian Affairs. This letter is from the Treasury Department, and is addressed to Colonel Lea, the Commissioner of Indian Affairs.

I will ask gentlemen who wish to understand this case, to give their attention to the written statements of the Departments, rather than to anything I could say:

THE TREASURY DEPARTMENT,
SECOND AUDITOR'S OFFICE, June 16, 1852.
SIR: In answer to yours of the 15th instant, requesting to be informed of the amount unaccounted for, by the late Captain R. D. C. Collins, for "carrying into effect treaties with the Chickasaws, per act 20th April, 1836"—
The amount standing against Captain Collins, on the books of this office, unaccounted for, is $24,982 28.
Very respectfully, your obedient servant,
P. CLAYTON,
Second Auditor.

Colonel L. LEA, Commissioner of Indian Affairs.

The report from the Commissioner of Indian Affairs, is to the following effect:

DEPARTMENT OF THE INTERIOR,
OFFICE INDIAN AFFAIRS, July 14, 1852.
SIR: I have the honor to transmit herewith, copy of a letter addressed to this office on the 17th of May last, by S. Folsom, a Chickasaw, duly authorized by his people to attend to their business at Washington, in which he calls my attention to an alleged balance of $24,982 28 due the Chickasaws, by reason of a failure on the part of the late Captain R. D. C. Collins, United States Army, a disbursing agent, to account to the Government for the same.
Upon receipt of the letter referred to, I addressed a communication to the Second Auditor of the Treasury, asking to be informed of the sum unaccounted for by the late Captain Collins, on Chickasaw account, and was advised by that officer that it amounted to $24,982 28, the sum alleged to be due the tribe by Mr. Folsom, as stated above. A copy of the Auditor's letter, dated 16th ultimo, advising me of this fact, is also herewith transmitted to you.

Additional evidence of the default of Captain Collins may be had on reference to report No. 453, from the Committee on Public Expenditures of the House of Representatives.—See Vol. II., Reports of Committees 27th Congress, 2d session.

There is no doubt that the sum claimed by Mr. Folsom forms a balance of the fund which, from time to time, was placed in the hands of Captain Collins to be disbursed on account of the Chickasaws, and that he failed to do so, or to account for the same at the office of the Second Auditor. It is but just, therefore, that the claim should be allowed, and that arrangements be made for its final settlement.

With regard to the payment of interest on this demand of the Chickasaws, the only question, in my opinion, which should be considered is the period at which its computation should commence; and as it appears that the last remittance to Captain Collins was made in March, 1839, at which time $19,500 were remitted to him, their claim to interest from that period I deem reasonable and just.

The foregoing is therefore respectfully submitted, with the recommendation that the same, and copies of the accompanying papers, be transmitted to the several Committees on Indian Affairs of the Senate and House of Representatives, to the end that an amendment be made to the general Indian appropriation bill, by which the Chickasaws may be reimbursed the sum of $24,982 28, the amount in the hands of the late Captain Collins at the time of his death, with interest thereon at six per cent. per annum from March, 1839.

Very respectfully your obedient servant,
L. LEA, Commissioner.

Hon. A. H. H. STUART,
Secretary of the Interior.

I will now read the letter from the Secretary of the Interior, inclosing the communication which I have read, and upon which the Committee on Indian Affairs have been acting. It is as follows:

DEPARTMENT OF THE INTERIOR,
WASHINGTON, July 15, 1852.

SIR: I have the honor to transmit, herewith, a communication of the present date, from the Commissioner of Indian Affairs, with accompanying papers, showing a balance of $24,982 28 to be due the Chickasaw Indians, in consequence of the failure of Captain R. D. Collins, of the United States Army, a disbursing agent, to account to the Government for the same.

These papers are transmitted to the committee with a recommendation, that provision be made in the general appropriation bill for the reimbursement to the Chickasaws of the aforesaid sum, with interest thereon, at six per cent. per annum from March, 1839, the period when the defalcation occurred.

I am, sir, with much respect, your obedient servant,
ALEX. H. H. STUART, Secretary.

Hon. R. W. JOHNSON,
*Chairman Committee on Indian Affairs,
House of Representatives.*

The proposition, sir, is to place this account to the credit of the Indians, as a nation, upon the books of the Treasury.

Mr. JOHNSON, of Georgia. I desire to ask one question. I should like to be informed by the mover of this amendment at what time this sum of money—$24,000—was placed in the hands of this agent? and under what law, and for what objects it was placed in his hands?

[Here the hammer fell.]

Mr. JOHNSON, of Arkansas. The gentleman from Georgia can claim the floor to speak in opposition to the amendment, and then permit me to answer his questions.

Mr. JOHNSON, of Georgia. Very well, sir; I claim the floor to speak against the amendment.

Mr. JOHNSON, of Arkansas. In reply to the gentleman from Georgia, I will state that the money was placed in the hands of the regular disbursing agent, under the authority of the Government always to use their own disbursing agents for the purpose of disbursing money, in the manner in which it is ordered by law.

Mr. JOHNSON, of Georgia. Was it compulsory on the agent to pay the money over, or was it left to his discretion?

Mr. JOHNSON, of Arkansas. The gentleman will perceive that this money of the Chickasaws was in the Treasury of the United States, placed in our hands in trust; and suppose there was no authority of law for the Secretary of the Treasury, or any other Department, to place that money in the hands of one of the disbursing agents of the Government, does that release us from our liability for having abused the trust that was placed in our hands?

Mr. PHELPS. With the permission of the gentleman from Georgia, [Mr. JOHNSON,] I desire to make a remark or two with reference to this amendment, as I presume other amendments of a similar nature will be brought forward. The Committee of Ways and Means have no information in relation to this matter. Examine the estimates which have been presented here by the Secretary of the Treasury, and by the Secretary of the Interior, and you will find no estimate for any claim of this kind. I am aware that a practice has grown up of late for the Department to send an estimate for some claim which an individual Indian, or, perhaps, a tribe, may have against the Government, to the Committee on Indian Affairs, either of the House or of the Senate, and it has been customary—and more recently that custom has grown into general practice—to recommend favorable action upon that claim to the committee. The Committee on Finance of the Senate, the Committee of Ways and Means of this House, and the members of this House, except those who may happen to be upon the committee to whom the communication is made, are not advised at all in relation to these matters. The consequence will be, that hereafter it will be brought up against us that appropriations have been made by this Congress without any recommendation from any Department of the Government. If any Executive Department of the Government of the United States believes that these demands are just—that there is a just claim against us on the part of any Indian nation which ought to be provided for in the general appropriation bill, let that Executive Department say so to either branch of Congress; and then each branch of Congress will have an opportunity of forming an opinion on that matter; but I object to these back-door estimates—for I can call them nothing else—being placed secretly in the hands of a committee, that a member of that committee may move amendments to a general appropriation bill, of which the committee that has charge of the bill has no knowledge whatever. I know nothing in relation to the justice of this claim, but I presume, from the remarks of the gentleman from Arkansas, that the agent of the Government has become a defaulter, and that money belonging to the Indians has been lost. I desire to pay every just demand which this Government owes to any Indians, but I object to this mode of burdening down appropriation bills with items for which we have no estimates, and when the Executive Departments have been afraid to say, through their estimates, how much money will be wanted for the purpose of carrying on the Government. I think it is time to put a stop to this practice. As the Representatives of the people, we have a right to have better information in relation to these matters than that which is given by gentlemen in five-minute speeches in favor of amendments. I am not censuring the Committee on Indian Affairs. I am only speaking of the course pursued by the Executive Departments of the Government. There is where the censure is justly due for sending in their estimates in this irregular manner.

Mr. JOHNSON, of Arkansas. The Committee of Ways and Means want everything in this House.

Mr. PHELPS. I would be willing that these estimates should be referred to the Committee on Indian Affairs, and that they should take charge of this bill, because they have more time to devote to the examination of these matters, and also because it is to be presumed that they are better versed in the affairs of the Indians than any other committee of this House can be.

Mr. MEADE. I move to strike out "five hundred."

Mr. JOHNSON, of Arkansas. As the gentleman from Virginia does not wish to make any remarks, I desire to speak in opposition to striking out any part of the amendment, and I wish to do it for the purpose of replying to the very extraordinary argument which has been introduced here by the gentleman from Missouri. Sir, it shows that another member of the Committee of Ways and Means knows nothing about the matter of which he talks. [Laughter.] Sir, we owe a debt to these Indians. The money was in our Treasury—in our hands—and it is gone. Your Treasury Department, your Indian Department, your Secretary of the Interior, all acknowledge it, and why shall we not pay it? Why, because the Committee of Ways and Means have not been informed of it. Justice cannot be done to these people because the Committee of Ways and Means have not been informed of the debt. Sir, one committee of this House is to be discredited because another committee has not been made the channel through which information is communicated; and not only that, but every Department of this Government must kneel humbly to the Committee of Ways and Means, and explain everything to them, before right and justice can be done to anybody. Why, sir, I will not stand here and see this slight put upon the committee of which I have the honor to be a member, unless the House says that I am wrong in this matter. If they say so, I will submit, and these amendments may all go. I ask that justice shall be done to these people, and I am met by being told that the Department had no right to send the information to me, and that I have no right to ask it in the discharge of my duty as a member of a committee. Yes, sir, justice must not be done because this amendment does not come through that hallowed channel—the Committee of Ways and Means—that identical committee which reported their Collins line appropriation. I tell you that this money is proved by the record to be due to these Indians; they claim it; the Committee on Indian Affairs report that the claim is a just one; and it is not to be allowed. Why? For any reason that goes to the merits of the case? No, sir; but for the reason that it did not go to the Committee of Ways and Means. Sir, I call the attention of this committee to the fact that there has not been one session out of the six that I have been in Congress, at which the Committee on Indian Affairs have not contended upon this floor against the right of the Committee of Ways and Means to take charge of this appropriation bill at all. The bill contains nothing but what relates to Indian Affairs. At this session I persuaded our committee not to make a movement to take the bill from the Committee of Ways and Means, but to let it go to them; and then offer our amendments when it came into the House. It has been otherwise in all time past, and yet now the gentleman from Missouri speaks of the recent practice which has sprung up on the part of the Departments of sending estimates to some other quarter than to the almighty Committee of Ways and Means. [Laughter.] Sir, I will not stand it, and if the House wants me to stand it, let them say so, and I will pitch amendments, books, papers and all, to that committee. I hope the House will not take the ground that the Committee on Indian Affairs cannot be the channel of communication with a single Department—not even with the Indian Department—for the purpose of getting justice done, because it is protested against by the Committee of Ways and Means.

Sir, I pledge myself again that if this thing were to be gone over again, from the course pursued several times, I would move to take away the bill from the Ways and Means, and confide it to its legitimate committee—the Indian Committee. I believe the motion would have been sustained heretofore by the House. I believe it would be now sanctioned by it. But I will say more, it is no recent practice that the Committee on Indian Affairs have been called upon to appropriate for objects connected with our Indian relations; on the contrary, it was the practice of the committee, previous to my being connected with it—as I have the testimony of the chairman of the Committee on Indian Affairs previous to myself, [Mr. Jacob Thompson, of Mississippi]—always to fight the Committee of Ways and Means for that bill. It was not legitimate action to refer it to the Committee of Ways and Means at all. It should have been always referred to the Committee on Indian Affairs. That is my view of the matter.

Now, I will give you the evidence of the Interior Department, the Treasury, the Second Auditor, and of the Indian Bureau, all going to show that the money is not in the Treasury. It was there once; but it was paid into the hands of the agent. That agent never paid it over. He became a defaulter; and the money is yet due to the Indians. This appropriation is demanded by the Government to adjust the accounts with those Indians. Shall we not pay it? The gentleman says we are not to pay it because the Ways and Means have not had before them the evidence of the existence of the debt. Sir, I am not, as a member of the Indian Committee, bound to go before the Committee of Ways and Means and ask their approval of a just debt connected with our Indian affairs before it can be presented to the House for its consideration. It is none of their business. [Laughter.] It is the business of the committee to which are referred legitimately all Indian concerns—the Committee on Indian Affairs.

Mr. MEADE. Mr. Chairman, the gentleman from Arkansas has convinced me. If it be in order, I will withdraw my amendment.

There was no objection, and the amendment was withdrawn.

Mr. PHELPS moved pro forma to reduce the appropriation one dollar.

Mr. P. said: The gentleman from Arkansas has endeavored to make a false issue between him and myself. I found no fault with the Committee on Indian Affairs taking charge of the matters which appropriately belong to them. I find no fault with any committee of the House taking charge of the matters that are appropriately referred to it by the House. Nor did I, in my remarks, cast any censure, except upon the practice of the executive department of the Government. Since I have been upon the Ways and Means I have found much fault with the executive departments of the Government sending communications directly to the Committee of Ways and Means. I thought they should be sent to one House or the other—that each member of this House was as much entitled to know what the executive department recommended as any one committee of this House. That is the point I make. I have, as a member of the Committee of Ways and Means, refused to receive a communication from an executive department recommending appropriations to be made, unless that executive officer would also send a similar copy of the same communication to the House of which I was a member, or to the Senate. I desire that this information should go to you, Mr. Chairman, and to every member of this House, and not merely that there should be bestowed upon a few persons constituting a standing committee of this House, information appertaining to the finances of this Government, which will come before this House as the representatives of the people, and to be doled out to us by that committee. That is the point which I make; and had this communication from the Secretary of the Interior been sent directly to this House, I would not have objected to the Committee on Indian Affairs taking charge of it. I would not have interfered. But we would have had this information printed, and each member of this committee and of the House could have examined it for himself, and have satisfied himself as to the justness of the claim. I speak in this matter from the experience I have had since I have been a member of this House. I recollect well when the Committee of Ways and Means came in here with their amendments to the general appropriation bills, and when nobody but the members of that committee knew anything of the necessity of making the appropriations which they proposed in their amendments. When those amendments were proposed, it would be stated that the Secretary of State, or the Secretary of War, or the Secretary of the Treasury, said the appropriation was necessary, and the House fairly had to take them upon trust, without examination. That is the point I wish to present. I cast no censure upon the gentleman from Arkansas, nor upon any gentleman in this committee. What I want is, that these communications shall come into the House through the proper channel. I meant that they should come directly to the House, and be presented through the Speaker of the House. Let them be printed, and let them go through the public papers, so that the people of the country may know what the Departments have recommended, and what they have not. The remarks which I saw fit to make in relation to this amendment arose from the fact that this information had not come in a manner by which the members of this House could obtain it. By the specified rules which govern this body, the Committee of Ways and Means are to report your general appropriation bills and the Indian bill as one of them. Then, sir, it may be construed into a censure upon the Committee of Ways and Means, because they have not examined the estimates upon which the Committee on Indian Affairs ask for these appropriations when they have no more information upon the subject than one of the Indians themselves, living upon the broad and extensive prairies west of our frontiers. They have never seen anything of it.

Now, I ask the gentleman from Arkansas [Mr. JOHNSON] whether a single public document has been printed at this session of Congress which gives any explanation whatever in relation to the appropriation which he now asks?

Mr. JOHNSON. That shows how much my honorable friend knows about this business. Here is a letter, dated 14th of July—

Mr. PHELPS. Has this been presented to the House?

Mr. JOHNSON. It has; and read.

Mr. PHELPS. Has it been printed?

Mr. JOHNSON. Certainly not.

Mr. PHELPS. Then it is not a communication addressed to the House. It is not addressed to the Speaker of the House. So no information has been presented to the House at all, in relation to this matter.

Mr. JOHNSON, of Arkansas. I rise in opposition to the amendment. The gentleman wants this information to go to the Committee of Ways and Means. You cannot take cognizance of anything unless first inspected by this Committee of Ways and Means. This House would be in a beautiful condition.

Mr. HOUSTON. I ask the gentleman to allow me to say one word in relation to this matter.

Mr. PHELPS. I did not say it should go to the Ways and Means. I say each member of this House is entitled to the same information as any member of any committee. I do not ask that it should go to their committee or my committee. But why should it be sent there?

Mr. JOHNSON. I should like to know what makes their committee any more creditable or any more honorable than mine, before the House?

A MEMBER. Oh, they are all honorable.

Mr. TAYLOR. I will ask the gentleman from Arkansas, as the gentleman from Missouri seems to cast censure upon the executive officers of the Government to whom these letters were addressed? I ask merely for the purpose of information.

Mr. JOHNSON. I will tell the gentleman. Here is a letter from the Secretary of the Interior, addressed to myself, as chairman of the Committee on Indian Affairs.

Mr. TAYLOR. I think this is very proper information, very properly called for by the chairman of the Committee on Indian Affairs.

Mr. JOHNSON. Certainly. Here it is in the accomplished manner in which the Secretary of the Interior presents official information connected with this matter. It is transmitted for the consideration of the Committee on Indian Affairs.

But there is another little matter to which I wish to allude. The honorable gentleman from Missouri says, if I understood him aright, that within his recollection, the time was when the Committee of Ways and Means reported the whole of the appropriation bills, and that nobody knew anything about them, or their amendments, but that committee.

Mr. PHELPS. I did not say that. I said I—

Mr. JOHNSON. Oh! the gentleman now says he did not say it. That is well. But I was going to remark, what a beautifully blindfold condition these two hundred and odd sensible men, who know nothing about this business, must have been in. Nobody could know anything about it but the Committee of Ways and Means. Sir, we have a full right to any information we can get. This information comes through the proper channel now, and we have a full right to it; and we can satisfy ourselves whether the appropriation is a just one. We have every evidence here of truth that can be given under official oath, or that can be given under a high personal individual honor. That is here, and what does it speak of? It speaks of a duty to a race of people, humble and beneath us, whom you are not obliged to pay. To him to whom it may be a consolation to say, "we will not pay where we can help it," I would respond; "that we are not obliged to pay." All we have to do is to say, "Shut the doors of your Treasury against the just demands of these Indians, and they cannot help themselves." If the gentleman says we will not pay it, because these communications did not come through the proper channel, I will say that that consideration does not affect me. That of which he speaks has never been the channel for such communications. There was no time for these communications to be printed. There was no time for the Committee of Ways and Means to act upon these estimates, because they were not received until that committee had voted upon their estimates, and reported the bill. These communications from the Departments will always continue to come to the committee which has, expressly, the charge of the subject-matter involved. This claim is due, and this House has to pay it. It will be paid by them some time. It is provided for by treaty, and you will be compelled to pay, should you let it run on interest for five hundred years, if the public records can be preserved.

Mr. MOREHEAD. I will ask the gentleman to indulge me a moment. Do I understand that this money was paid over to an agent employed by the Government?

Mr. JOHNSON. It was.

Mr. MOREHEAD. Was that gentleman an agent both of the Indians and of the Government?

Mr. JOHNSON. No, sir. He was the regular disbursing agent, and an officer of the Army. It was Captain R. D. C. Collins. I knew him well in my lifetime. [Laughter.]

Mr. HOUSTON. How long have you been dead?

Mr. JOHNSON. I have been dead ever since I came in contact with the Committee of Ways and Means. [Laughter.]

Mr. PHELPS. If the committee will permit me, I will withdraw my amendment.

There was no objection, and the amendment was withdrawn.

The question recurring upon the original amendment offered by Mr. JOHNSON, of Arkansas; it was put, and the amendment was agreed to.

Mr. JOHNSON, of Georgia. I move to amend the amendment, by reducing the appropriation to $50.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair stated to the House that the original amendment offered by the gentleman from Arkansas [Mr. JOHNSON] was agreed to.

Mr. JOHNSON. I understood, if the Chair please, that the vote taken was upon an amendment to the amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. That amendment was withdrawn.

Mr. TAYLOR. I do not understand whether the amendment of the gentleman from Arkansas was adopted or not.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair will again state, that he announced to the House that the amendment to the amendment, offered by the gentleman from Missouri, [Mr. PHELPS,] was withdrawn, and that the question recurring upon the original amendment, as offered by the gentleman from Arkansas, [Mr. JOHNSON,] The Chair put that question to the House, and it was decided in the affirmative, and the amendment was agreed to. The decision having been made, there is nothing now pending before the House except the bill.

Mr. FITCH. I have another amendment to offer to this Chickasaw section of the bill, to which I am sure there will be no objection. I am instructed by the Committee on Indian Affairs to offer it. As the papers are elaborate, I will give a statement of it as briefly as possible.

The amendment is this. Add to the clause—

For the payment of $2,842 38 to Hiram H. Pitchlyn, in his own right, and as the sole heir-at-law and legal representative of his brother, John Pitchlyn, deceased; that being the amount of the proceeds of the sales of two quarter sections of land granted to, and located in the names of, the said Hiram H. Pitchlyn and John Pitchlyn, under and by virtue of the eighth article of the treaty with the Chickasaw Indians, made at the city of Washington, on the 24th day of May, in the year 1834, and which quarter sections of land were sold, and the proceeds thereof invested in the stock of the State of Arkansas, in pursuance of the provisions of the article aforesaid.

Mr. HOUSTON. I ask the Chair if that amendment is in order? From the reading of it, it seems to me to be an amendment to bring in the private claim of an individual Indian. I present the point of order to the Chair.

Mr. FITCH. I would like the gentleman to be a little less captious in his exceptions. It is a treaty stipulation I desire to have fulfilled, although it happens to relate to one individual. I do not see the propriety of the point of order.

Mr. HOUSTON. Does the Chair decide that the amendment is in order?

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair decides that the amendment is in order.

Mr. FITCH. The facts of this case are simply these: By the eighth article of the treaty with the Chickasaw Indians, made in the city of Washington, on the 24th day of May, 1834, the lands held by certain minors were permitted to be sold, and the proceeds invested for their benefit. When they should become of age, and upon its being certified by certain chiefs that they were of age, and that it was for the benefit of those individuals that these moneys, thus invested, should be paid to them, it was to be paid to them. This Pitchlyn was one of those minors. His brother is deceased, and he is the sole heir of the deceased. He has become of age, and it is so certified by the chiefs; and it is further certified that it is for his benefit that this money should be paid to him. That certificate is indorsed by the agent of the Chickasaws.

The amendment is recommended by the Secretary of the Interior and the Commissioner of the General Land Office. This money, which we have in our possession, for their benefit, was invested in stock which is below par. They consequently recommend that the money should be appropriated out of the Treasury rather than sell the stock at a sacrifice, when there is every probability of its soon being worth its par value. This is simply a concise statement of the facts. Unless these letters are called for, I do not propose to say any more.

Mr. HOUSTON. I should like to read them. Send them up to the Clerk.

Mr. FITCH. The treaty is cited in the amendment I have offered. This Pitchlyn was one of the minors provided for by the treaty. The land was selected; it was sold, and the proceeds invested in accordance with the terms of the treaty; and in accordance with the terms of the treaty, this Indian, having become of age, the proper Department now recommends that the money shall be paid to him. The interest has been paid every year upon this investment.

Mr. HOUSTON. Under any circumstances, it seems to me, there is an objection to the phraseology of that amendment. The facts which the gentleman has stated, have not been communicated to the House until now; but it seems to me a point presents itself there that may hereafter involve us in some difficulty. The character of the proposition is, that we shall pay to A B, as the heir of C D, a certain annuity. Now, there is a question there which ought to be decided, it seems to me, by the Department; and if the amendment is to be adopted at all, it had better be adopted in such phraseology as will authorize the proper Department to determine upon such testimony as may be satisfactory to them—whether this heirship is correct, or whether some other person may not really be the party interested.

Mr. FITCH. I am sorry I have not had time to enlighten my friend upon the subject. I stated to the committee, what I supposed would be satisfactory, that I had this proof; and of course the Department would not have recommended this amendment in favor of this one man unless they had been satisfied.

Mr. HOUSTON. Without touching the merits of the case, I suggested that, as a matter of caution, we had better so change the phraseology as to give the discretion to the proper Department to pay the money to the heir of the Indian upon presentation of such testimony as will satisfy them that he is the person entitled.

Mr. FITCH. To that I have no objection at all.

Mr. WILLIAMS. I move that the committee rise.

The question was taken, and the motion was agreed to.

The committee accordingly rose, and the Speaker having resumed the chair, the Chairman of the committee reported that the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union had, according to order, had the state of the Union generally under consideration, and especially House bill No. 43, making appropriations for the current and contingent expenses of the Indian department, and for fulfilling treaty stipulations with various Indian tribes for the year ending 30th June, 1853, had made progress, but had come to no conclusion thereon.

Mr. CARTTER. I desire to make a report that involves no legislation whatever, in order that it be laid upon the table and ordered to be printed. It is a report adverse to the extension of the Woodworth patent.

No objection was made; so the report was received, laid upon the table, and ordered to be printed.

Mr. COBB. I have here a Senate bill, No. 152. It provides for the payment to a widow and seven children money due to them. It was reported from the Committee on Claims unanimously. I ask that I may be permitted to report it, and that it be referred to the Committee of the Whole House.

No objection was made, and the order was entered accordingly.

On motion by Mr. FLORENCE,

The House then adjourned until Monday morning at eleven o'clock, a. m.

IN SENATE.

Monday, July 19, 1852.

Prayer by the Rev. LITTLETON F. MORGAN.

Mr. HAMLIN presented a memorial, very numerous signed, of citizens of Portland, Maine, praying that the bill now pending before Congress, known as the land distribution bill, may become a law; which was referred to the Committee on Public Lands.

Also, the memorial of Israel Rodgers, representing that he has been defrauded of the bounty land to which he was entitled for services during the late war with Mexico, and praying other land; which was referred to the Committee on Public Lands.

Mr. BRODHEAD. Mr. President, I present the petition of Colonel William F. Small, of Philadelphia, who represents that he is authorized to offer to the Government the services of a regiment, composed of ten companies, of active, intelligent young men, of the city and county of Philadelphia, for the purpose of protecting emigrants on the frontier and in California. He represents that the object of those composing this regiment is, to form permanent settlements on the eastern frontier of California, and to give protection to settlers, emigrants, and miners. I am well acquainted with Colonel Small. He served with great credit to himself in Mexico, and he is a gentleman well calculated to take command of such a regiment. I move that the petition be referred to the Committee on Military Affairs.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. BRODHEAD also presented a petition, numerous signed, by highly respectable gentlemen of the city and county of Philadelphia, representing that they desire to have an act or joint resolution of Congress passed, authorizing that among the paintings selected to adorn the Capitol there may be some illustrative of the victories which constitute the naval glory of the country, and recommending W. A. K. Martin, of Philadelphia, as competent to design and execute such picture or pictures; which was referred to the Committee on the Library.

Mr. DAWSON presented the memorial of James L. Collins, praying indemnity for property lost in the Mexican war, and for services as secret and confidential agent of the United States rendered during said war; which was referred to the Committee on Claims.

Also, the memorial of Harriet O. Read, executrix of the late Lieutenant Colonel A. C. W. Fanning, of the United States Army, praying compensation for extra services of Colonel Fanning; which was referred to the Committee on Military Affairs.

Mr. BRIGHT presented a resolution of the Legislature of Indiana in favor of granting bounty land and extra pay to surgeons and assistant surgeons in the last war with Mexico, who were not duly commissioned; which was referred to the Committee on Military Affairs, and ordered to be printed.

Mr. CASS. I present a memorial of citizens of Philadelphia, praying that an appropriation be made for the construction of a ship canal around the falls of the river St. Mary. As the subject has already been brought before Congress by the Committee on Public Lands, I move that the memorial be laid on the table; and, at the same time, I give notice that during the week I intend to call up the bill reported by the Committee on Public Lands in relation to that subject.

The memorial was ordered to lie on the table.

Mr. GWIN presented the petition of J. W. Osborne, praying to be released from the payment of duty bonds on goods destroyed by fire while in the Government warehouse at San Francisco, California; which was referred to the Committee on Finance.

Mr. SUMNER. I have in my hands an important petition concerning American literature, signed by names universally honored in this country. The petition is short, and I will read it:

To the honorable Representatives of the people of the United States in Congress assembled:

The undersigned, authors, publishers, book-sellers, printers, editors, and paper dealers, citizens of the United States, respectfully ask that your honorable body will enact a law for the benefit of American literature, which shall give to British authors and publishers the same right to the control of their literary property in the United States that the law of England offers reciprocally to the authors and publishers of this country.

I have also a second petition to the same effect. These petitions were prepared some time ago, but only now have been placed in my hands. Among the illustrious petitioners are James Fenimore Cooper, on whose signature is now the sacred seal of death, Jonathan N. Wainwright, Hermann Melville, William C. Bryant, George P. Putnam, Washington Irving, Rev. Dr. Francis L. Hawks, Dr. Edward Robinson, Rufus W. Griswold, Bayard Taylor, and John Jay. Uniting with these petitioners in their prayer, and cordially desiring some action of Congress on this subject, if not this session, yet speedily, so soon as it practically can be done, I move that these petitions be referred to the Committee on the Library.

The motion was agreed to.

REPORTS FROM STANDING COMMITTEES.

Mr. JAMES, from the Committee on Revolutionary Claims, to which was referred the petition of Abigail Stafford, submitted a report, accompanied by a bill for her relief; which was read and passed to the second reading. The report was ordered to be printed.

Mr. SEBASTIAN, from the Committee on Indian Affairs, to which were referred the documents relating to the claim of William Senna Factor, submitted a report, accompanied by a bill for his relief; which was read and passed to the second reading. The report was ordered to be printed.

Mr. HAMLIN, from the Committee on Printing, to which was referred a motion to print the report of the Second Auditor, transmitting copies of the accounts rendered for disbursements of money, goods, and effects for the benefit of the Indians during the year ending June 30th, 1851, reported against printing the same, as entirely unnecessary.

The report was agreed to.

LANDS OF FRANCIS GARDERE.

Mr. DAVIS. I am requested by the Committee on Private Land Claims, to which was referred the petition of Francis Gardere, to report a bill authorizing the purchase of certain lands belonging to Francis Gardere. I am also requested by the committee to ask its consideration at this time.

The bill was read a first time, and ordered to a second reading.

There being no objection, it was read a second time, and considered as in Committee of the Whole. It proposes to authorize the Secretary of War, if satisfied that the title thereto is undoubted, to purchase of Francis Gardere a certain tract of land, consisting of about three acres, which adjoins lands of the United States at Baton Rouge, in Louisiana, if he shall be of opinion that the same is necessary to the United States, and that it can be obtained with an undoubted title, for a sum not exceeding $1,500.

Mr. DAVIS. I will state for the information of the Senate, that Mr. Gardere claims a narrow strip of land which adjoins the lands occupied by the United States for an arsenal, at Baton Rouge. It is so situated that it divides those lands to a certain extent; and, in fact, part of it is now occupied by the United States. This matter has been some time in controversy; and this gentleman, not being satisfied with the existing state of things, wishes his claim settled. Since the papers in the case have been before Congress, I have had some correspondence with the Secretary of War, and he has had further correspondence with the officers at Baton Rouge on this subject. Three disinterested gentlemen were appointed to appraise the value of this land. They appraised it at $1,500, including the whole of the land. Mr. Gardere is unwilling to sell that part which is convenient to the United States without selling the whole. This bill proposes that the Secretary of War shall, if he is satisfied that the title is undoubted, purchase it for a sum not exceeding $1,500. I suppose that will be the easiest and speediest mode of settling the controversy.

Mr. SHIELDS. I am not sure that there is any additional land wanted at Baton Rouge by the Government.

Mr. DAVIS. I would state to the Senator that this strip of land is about forty feet wide. It runs right into the lands occupied by the United States, dividing them for some three or four or five hundred feet—I do not know how far—perhaps more than that—some thirty or forty rods. This strip of land runs right in, like a high-way, between the lands occupied by the United States. They can get along without it; but it would be very convenient to have it.

Mr. SHIELDS. The reason for my remarks was, that there has been an application this winter to have a portion of the land attached to the arsenal at Baton Rouge set apart for a burial ground. I applied to the Department to ascertain whether the amount of land held by the United States at Baton Rouge was sufficient to enable the Government to give away a portion of it; and I found that, so far from wanting additional land, we would be able to give away some portion of that which we already have, without any detriment to the public service. I know nothing, however, of this particular case. I think it is rather unusual to pass a bill to authorize the Secretary of War to purchase land from a particular individual, designating his name in the bill.

Mr. DAVIS. The bill only authorizes the Secretary of War to purchase on condition that he is satisfied that Francis Gardère has an undoubted title to the land. Now, that may be true, which is stated by the honorable Senator from Illinois; but the condition of things there is this: This narrow strip of land runs directly into the land of the United States, dividing, it perhaps, into very nearly equal parts, and they cannot very well go from one part of the land to the other without passing over this strip, unless they take a wide circuit. This tract is only about forty feet wide, I believe.

Mr. SHIELDS. I think it would be better to refer the bill to the Committee on Military Affairs. We can report the bill as soon as we ascertain the facts in relation to it.

Mr. DAVIS. The Committee on Private Land Claims has gone through a very careful investigation of this matter. We had before us all the maps and all the plats. The Secretary of War has caused the matter to be investigated, and the land to be examined from one end to the other. There are maps showing the precise condition of things there. The title, I suppose, without doubt, is in this man. The United States now occupy the land; and they ought either to surrender it or buy it. I think nothing new will come to light by referring the bill to the Committee on Military Affairs. There are all the papers; they state just the story which I state to the Senate. They show just the state of things which I exhibit here. There is the map; there are the plans, the surveys, and the correspondence.

Mr. SHIELDS. I withdraw my opposition to the bill. I know that the honorable Senator from Massachusetts never presents a subject without investigating it very thoroughly, and I have great confidence in his opinion after investigating a subject of this kind. My only wish was to ascertain all the facts—whether the land was needed by the Government; and if needed, whether the price proposed was the proper price.

Mr. DAVIS. All that is settled by the correspondence which was before the Committee on Private Land Claims.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, and ordered to be engrossed for a third reading.

PORT OF DELIVERY AT ALTON.

Mr. HAMLIN. The Committee on Commerce, to which was referred the memorial of the Mayor and Common Council of the city of Alton, Illinois, praying that that city may be made a port of entry, has directed me to report a bill to constitute Alton, in the State of Illinois, a port of delivery.

The bill was read a first time, and ordered to a second reading.

Mr. SHIELDS. I presume there will be no objection whatsoever to the bill; and as I wish to have it passed before the adjournment of Congress, I ask that it may now have its second reading.

The PRESIDENT. It requires unanimous consent to read the bill a second time now.

Mr. CLEMENS. We have had two or three bills of this sort reported against by the Committee on Commerce, and I should like to know what is the difference between those cases and this. I believe the committee have reported against the passage of similar bills.

Mr. HAMLIN. The Senator from Alabama is mistaken. I do not think he listened correctly to the title of the bill. This bill is precisely of the character which was agreed to by the committee in the case alluded to, I suppose, by him—constituting a port of delivery, and not a port of entry. The Senator from Alabama presented a memorial for the erection of a port of entry at a point which I do not now recollect. It was submitted to the Treasury Department, and they recommended that a port of delivery only be established, in conformity to the usage of the Government from its foundation. I submitted the papers to my friend from Alabama, and I understood him to say that he did not desire a port of delivery alone, consequently there was no report made in the case. This bill is in accordance with the usage of the Government, which is to establish ports of delivery where they are needed on waters above ports of entry. This bill is recommended by the Department, and I apprehend there can be no objection to it.

The PRESIDENT. If there is no objection, the bill will now have its second reading.

Mr. CLEMENS. Let it lie over. I think the Senator from Maine is mistaken as to the facts in the other case. I wish to examine the matter.

The PRESIDENT. Objection being made, the bill cannot now be read a second time.

FOREIGN COMMERCIAL REGULATIONS.

Mr. HAMLIN, from the Committee on Commerce, submitted the following resolution; which was considered by unanimous consent, and agreed to:

Resolved, That the Secretary of State be requested to prepare and communicate to the Senate, at the next session of Congress, abstracts or selections of such portions of the diplomatic and consular correspondence in the Department, within the last four years, as respects new commercial regulations adopted in the several nations with which we have intercourse, and such other information as may, in his opinion, promote the commercial interests of the United States.

ISTHMUS OF TEHUANTEPEC.

Mr. MASON. Mr. President, I ask leave to submit the following resolution:

Resolved, That the President of the United States be requested to communicate to the Senate, (if not, in his opinion, incompatible with the public interest,) the correspondence between the Governments of the United States and Mexico, in regard to a right of way across the Isthmus of Tehuantepec, granted by Mexico to a Mexican citizen, and which grant, by subsequent assignments, was transferred to a citizen or citizens of the United States; embracing all information in the possession of the Executive concerning the alleged abrogation of such grant by Mexico, the discontinuance of the work, and expulsion of those engaged in it; together with all documents connected therewith.

And that, under like limitation, he be requested to communicate to the Senate the correspondence between the two Governments, with the accompanying documents, in relation to any proposed conventions between them regarding such grant of the right of way.

Mr. President, it is my purpose to ask the Senate to consider the resolution at this time. We are all aware that since the acquisition of the important territorial possessions which have accrued to the United States under the treaty of peace with Mexico, the attention of the whole American people has been strongly directed to those modes of access the most convenient certainly, and probably, also, the most speedy, to those possessions across the continent of Southern America. As we are aware, under grants that have been obtained from the Government of New Granada, there is now in the course of construction, and nearly completed, a railroad extending across the narrowest point of the Isthmus, which connects North and South America, at Panama. We are also aware that there is now in course of construction, or said to be, a communication intended to be a ship canal across a point in Central America, between the two Republics of Nicaragua and Costa Rica. But this proposed communication, which is referred to in the resolution, which lies within the limits of Mexico, is believed, by a large portion of the American people, to be that which will be found of greatest interest to the United States, because it lies, probably by a thousand miles, nearer to their territory, and because it offers, in the estimation of a number of those whose attention has been turned to it, the most certain means of constructing a railroad.

Be this as it may, we are aware that the grant was made by the Government of Mexico, in 1846, to a citizen of Mexico, conveying to him important advantages and immunities, and holding out inducements for the construction of a way of some kind, probably a railroad, across that Isthmus. That grant, by subsequent assignments, which were authorized and legalized by the terms of the original grant, passed through English hands into the possession of citizens of the United States, where it now remains. It is alleged on their part, that they have complied with all the terms of the original grant. It is very certain that citizens holding that franchise have expended a very large sum of money in making the necessary surveys, and in preliminary arrangements to commence the work. It is equally certain that the Government of Mexico, by one of those acts which, perhaps, national courtesy will not permit me to characterize in this place, has forcibly expelled those who were engaged in the work under the authority of the Government of Mexico itself.

Now, sir, what I want particularly to call to the attention of the members of the Senate as the representatives of the United States of America, is the probability that for half a century to come we shall not have, if we ever can have, the same immediate and certain communication across the continent of South America with our possessions on the Pacific which we will have and now have through the territories of the Republics which border on us at the South.

I wish to call the attention of the Senate and of the American people to the further fact, as I hold it, that happen what may, the necessities of the United States never can permit the exclusive control of any right of way across the continent to pass from States through which the way lies, into the hands of any foreign Power.

It is one remarkable fact connected with this right of way across the Isthmus of Tehuantepec, that whilst it remained in the hands of a Mexican citizen every facility and encouragement was given to him to prosecute the work, and whilst it remained in the hands of English subjects, to whom it was passed by that Mexican citizen, the same encouragement and facility was given to them. It has recently passed into the hands of citizens of the United States, and it has been followed by the expulsion of the grantee, with the whole party engaged on the works of the company.

Sir, I have been made aware that this subject has been a matter of negotiation between the two Governments, at one time it was believed, with a probability of a favorable issue. But in the mutations which are constantly taking place in the Government of Mexico, a final disposition of the subject has recently been made by the Mexican authorities—so far as rights existed under that grant—Mexico holds that they are ended, and all negotiation has ended with them. In this state of things, there is a propriety, in my judgment, that all the matters connected with the subject, with the conduct of the Mexican Government in regard to this grant since it passed into the hands of American citizens, should be made known to the Senate, and through the Senate to the American people; that the Congress of the United States, in its wisdom, may determine whether any, and if any, what measures shall be taken on its part to see that the rights of the citizens of America are properly regarded by every foreign Power; and further, if necessary, to take care that the essential interests of this country in reference to any and every right of way across the continent shall never come under the exclusive control of any foreign Power. It is for this purpose that I have offered the resolution, that we may have all the documents connected with the subject before us.

Mr. GWIN. Mr. President, I agree, perhaps, with everything the Senator from Virginia has said, with one exception. He has said that there is no probability that, for a quarter of a century to come, there will be any other route connecting the possessions of the United States across the continent, from the Atlantic to the Pacific, except through Central America, or across the Isthmus of Tehuantepec. Now, sir, entertaining the opinion that, long before that time expires, we shall have a railroad connecting the possessions of the United States through their own territory, I give notice here that I shall never assent to the opinion of the Senator, that it will be a quarter of a century before that event. In half that time I hope we may have a railroad communication across the continent through our own territory. I hope the resolution will be adopted. I agree with everything the Senator has said in relation to the Tehuantepec grant.

Mr. MASON. Mr. President, whenever the State of California, and the States bordering upon the Mississippi, and any States or Territories that may be intervening between them, are strong enough, or are prepared to make this railroad, I shall agree with the Senator that a quarter of a century will not elapse before the communication to which he refers will be completed. The General Government, perhaps, might make that communication within a quarter of a century, or an eighth of a century; and, I presume, that it is to this Government reference is made, when a speedy execution of it is anticipated. It is to exclude any such inference, so far as I am concerned, that I look to so long a period for its completion.

Mr. GWIN. I wish to say for my own State, that if the General Government will give to that State what Mr. Whitney asks, thirty miles on each side of the road, we will guaranty to make a road seven hundred miles long to the mouth of the Gila, or to the northern boundary of our State, within five years.

The resolution was adopted.

NOTICES OF BILLS.

Mr. ATCHISON gave notice of his intention to ask leave to introduce a bill to amend an act entitled "An act to provide for the payment for horses and other property lost or destroyed in the military service of the United States," approved 3d of March, 1849.

Mr. JAMES gave notice of his intention to ask leave to introduce a bill, relating to the appraisement of merchandise, and to prevent frauds in the valuation of dutiable imports, and for other purposes.

BILLS PASSED.

The following engrossed bills were severally read a third time and passed:

Bill for the relief of John Devlin;
Bill for the relief of Samuel W. Chilson;
Bill for the relief of Nathan Weston, jun., late additional paymaster in the United States Army;
Bill for the relief of Richard M. Bouton, George Wright, and the widow of Marvin W. Fisher;
Bill for the relief of Gideon Hotchkiss;
Bill for the relief of W. R. Nevins; and a Bill for the relief of John McAvoy.

PHILO SMITH.

A message was received from the House of Representatives, by the hands of Mr. P. B. HAYES, Chief Clerk, announcing that it had passed a bill for the relief of Philo Smith; which was read a first and second time by its title, and referred to the Committee on Claims.

PROTECTION OF NEW MEXICO, ETC.

The bill from the House of Representatives to provide for the protection of the Territories of New Mexico, Oregon, and the States of Texas and California, was read a third time as amended, and the amendments being concurred in, it was passed.

LIEUTENANT TEMPLE'S MEMOIR.

Mr. BELL. Some time ago a resolution which I introduced was laid upon the table, and since that time resolutions have not been taken up in their order. I hope that resolution will now be taken up and acted upon by the Senate. It is not regarded as a political matter. When it was last before the Senate, some suggestions were thrown out by Senators on the other side of the House, that perhaps it was a political question, but I believe that that will probably be withdrawn. I move that the resolution be taken up.

The motion was agreed to, and the resolution was read, as follows:

Resolved, That the Secretary of the Navy be requested to furnish the Senate with a copy of the Memoir of the landing of the United States Troops at Vera Cruz, in 1847, by Lieutenant William Grenville Temple, with an Appendix, containing the written Orders of General Scott and Commodore Conner, on file in the Navy Department.

Mr. WALKER. I believe that that is a book which some time ago it was proposed to publish. When the question was last under consideration, there was a good deal of discussion in regard to it; and, if my memory serves me rightly, not a little feeling too. I must confess, however, that I have almost forgotten what light was thrown upon the question by that discussion, and I think we had better have it repeated. I believe it was then pretty generally conceded that this was a kind of pamphlet gotten up by some individual no doubt sufficiently competent to write a memoir on this subject; but, so far as my recollection goes, it was then deemed useless and unnecessary, and there was a disinclination to publish it. I cannot see why it should be regarded as more necessary to publish it now than it was then. For one I should like to have the information brought before us again, so that our memories may be refreshed.

Mr. BELL. The gentleman from Wisconsin is mistaken. These general orders never have been published.

Mr. WALKER. Will the gentleman from Tennessee excuse me. I did not say that they had been published. I said that when the question was up before, it was proposed to publish this pamphlet, or, rather, that the object of the resolution seemed to contemplate its publication, and that on that account the resolution was laid upon the table.

Mr. BELL. The proposition is simply stated in the resolution itself, which is to furnish the Senate with a copy of this memoir. The substance of the memoir is principally professional. It is in relation to a matter of public interest connected with one of the most splendid achievements of the late war, and, indeed, it is one of the most interesting memoirs in our history since the foundation of our Government. The public have no means of getting a connected account of that transaction, and can only learn its history by searching a voluminous mass of papers bearing upon the subject. My object in asking to have the papers sent to us, was that the information might be presented in one report, so that the public curiosity might be gratified. But the main object was that the professional instruction which the memoir contains might be rendered more available for the benefit of military and naval officers, as it may be to some extent. I believe that the Senate have scarcely ever refused to pass such a resolution when it has been offered.

The Senator from Wisconsin [Mr. WALKER] says that there was an objection to printing this memoir when the resolution was first presented; and that there was a general disposition not to meddle with it. I do not know upon what authority the Senator says that. Two or three gentlemen then objected on the ground that the passage of the resolution was laying the foundation for the publication of a book. In reply to that I said that the memoir was so brief that it could be scarcely called a book, even if printed as such. I understood that the whole of it would not contain more than about forty pages in manuscript. It would be unjust to call it a book. I know that the Senator from Maine [Mr. HAMLIN] objected strongly, upon the ground that he was opposed to publishing books of any size. I stated that, whenever the Senate chose to lay down a rule that they would publish no reports of any kind, no Patent Office reports except those relating to business before us, and no reports connected with the military or naval affairs of the country, or commercial or agricultural reports except relating to business here, I would agree to it. Had such been the general understanding of the Senate, that no such reports were to be published by order of the Senate, I would not have offered this resolution.

Again, what is asked now, is not to print it, but it is merely that we should see that memoir, and see those general orders. As I have stated before, we cannot find them without wading through some fifteen hundred or two thousand pages of the general operations of the Mexican war, in order to find them. The question of printing is a subsequent one, and, I hope, though the Senator from Arkansas [Mr. BORLAND] is looking so much interested in this matter, and so earnestly, that he is not going to pounce upon it, as he is not now a member of the Committee on Printing; and I hope he will not make any objection in advance.

It is, really, a very small matter. Some gentlemen supposed, when the resolution was first presented, that it was designed to have some political bearing, and to operate in favor of General Scott, who commanded the land forces on that occasion. I suppose those who objected forgot the part which Commodore Conner took. I have not seen the orders to which the resolution refers; and, whether they will redound too much to the credit of the commanding officer or not, I do not know. I believe that the skill of the commanding general, in the management of the land forces, is admitted by all. Commodore Conner may be entitled to great credit also; but those things did not enter into my mind when I offered the resolution. My object was to have possession of an interesting portion of history, which gave a condensed view of that landing, which I have heard lauded highly by persons who were present, and who understand these subjects better than I do. It has been stated by them to have been one of the most skillful and successful operations ever effected under similar circumstances. I hope that the Senate will agree to the resolution, so that we may see the memoir; and when the question of printing comes up, we can decide whether it is worthy of being printed or not.

Mr. BORLAND. I really did not intend to say anything on this subject, for I do not attach much importance to it; but as the Senator from Tennessee seems to think that I am very much interested in the motion, because I looked at him earnestly when he was speaking, I must be permitted to say a word.

The Senator is mistaken in supposing that I feel any great interest in the question, because I looked at him earnestly; the fact is, that I felt very much interested in the eloquent manner in which the Senator presented the subject to the Senate; and it was on that account I looked at the Senator so earnestly.

Mr. BELL. It was a mistake on my part, I assure the Senator.

Mr. BORLAND. I take occasion to say, that everything relative to the subject of this memoir, so far as the general orders are concerned, must be already published and on record, and of course, accessible to any one desirous of looking into that record.

The only thing that can be said on this question is, that this memoir, or treatise, was written by a young officer of the Army or Navy—I do not know which—for the purpose of giving his views relative to the capture of Vera Cruz. I know nothing about it myself. I apprehend that it is all that the Senator from Tennessee [Mr. BELL] says it is—very beautiful, and ably and eloquently written; but I suppose that there have been a hundred, ay, possibly five hundred, beautiful articles published on the same subject. Many of the newspapers have contained very able articles, and articles of great interest, on that subject. Nobody, certainly, admires the great achievement of the American arms at Vera Cruz more than I do; and can there be any necessity for the Senate now to adopt this memoir, and publish it as part of the official proceedings, simply because a young gentleman is rather ambitious to figure in print! If the Senate should take this course, it will open the door to every young gentleman who is seized with a like ambition, and who may be anxious to procure the imprimatur of this body. I, at least, do not feel disposed to attach so much importance to the lucubrations of the author of this memoir, or to any others of a similar class.

As to the question of printing, I have nothing to say—that will be a question for the Senate to determine after the document is sent here in compliance with the resolution of the Senator from Tennessee; but I will observe that in these electioneering times, when everything that can affect the fortunes, or the character, of an aspirant for a high public office, is brought forward, and when we see, not merely accounts of the battles in Mexico in print, but also pictorial representations of those battles flooding the country, I do think that it would not be expecting, or requiring too much, to give such applicants to understand that they must themselves be at the expense of printing and publishing their treatises.

Mr. DOUGLAS. If there is anything new in this memoir which has not hitherto been published, I desire that it should be brought to light. I think the whole country feel a general interest—but particularly at this time—in relation to everything connected with the late Mexican war. I have understood that there are many things which have not yet been published, both between the land forces and the War Department, and the Navy and the Navy Department, which I should like to see printed and spread before the country. Correspondence relating to trials, and to armistices, and to various other matters connected with the land forces in Mexico, which I have no doubt it would be gratifying to the public to have laid before them.

I hope that there will be no impediment thrown in the way of the passage of this resolution. It calls for information; let it come; and if that information, when it does come, confers credit upon any party, let those who are entitled to the credit have all the honor. I trust, that so far from any objection being thrown in the way of this resolution, we may have a series of resolutions, or this one so enlarged, as to bring out all other information, so that all those who were engaged in the Mexican war may have all the credit to which they are entitled. I am proud of their exploits.

I wish to have all their gallant deeds thrown before the country—that we may have published all the secret history of that war, so that we may know exactly who is entitled to credit, and how much there is of it.

Mr. MASON. I would inquire of the Senator from Tennessee, whether this memoir is in the form of an official communication made by an officer of the Navy to the Navy Department? If it be in that form, I shall have pleasure in having it published, but if it be in the form of a private memoir, with the reluctance which I have of appearing to countenance this publication of books or pamphlets by the Senate, I should have no hesitation in voting against the motion.

Mr. BELL. I presume cannot have the character of an official communication, because in such case it would be made by the Commander-in-Chief of the Army, or of the Navy, as the case might be, to the War or Navy Department. But this is a connected narrative of facts, and not one of historic or private comment, as the Senator from Arkansas [Mr. BORLAND] seems to suppose; and only connects the several instances and subjects of the transaction. No official report of an officer of the Army, or Navy, would go into a narrative of these incidents. For this purpose, as it is desirable that a continuous and brief narrative of this important operation should be published, and as it is impossible that any person can now obtain any knowledge of it, except by wading through some two thousand pages of official dispatches, this memoir has been drawn up. That is its sole object, and of course, therefore, it cannot be looked on as an official communication.

Mr. MASON. I take it for granted that this is a private paper which this gentleman has lodged in the Navy Department, as he might lodge it anywhere else, entirely subject to his own control, and which might be published by himself or any one else. Now, my objection to the resolution arises not from the nature of the subject at all, but from the fact of this memoir being a private paper; for this reason, I think the Senate ought not to be called on to publish it, or any papers of a similar character.

Mr. BORLAND. I will simply remark, as to the nature of the resolution, that I do not know that it is intended to have any ulterior effect on the election of a President; but, as the Senator from Tennessee thinks it so very important that we should have some publication relative to the war in Mexico, I will suggest to him the propriety of appointing a historiographer of that war, and let him prepare and present a condensed history, not of the capture of Vera Cruz alone, but of the whole war.

The Senator says, that the documents already published containing this information are too voluminous, and that the great merit of this memoir consists in the fact of its being a continuous narrative! Well, let the historiographer condense these documents and give a continuous narrative, including all the leading events of the war; and such a work will be infinitely superior to the memoir which the Senator proposes that we should publish.

We know that it has been said that the operations from Vera Cruz to the city of Mexico, all constituted parts of one series of operations; all belonged to one plan; and I will again suggest to the Senator that, if his object is to give a condensed view of one of those operations in that series, it cannot be understood properly, except we have it in its connection, as a part of the whole; and therefore we ought to provide for the publication of the whole. If he deems that object to be sufficiently important, and will modify his resolution, so as to provide for the appointment of a gentleman competent to write the history of the whole war, I will vote with him.

Mr. BELL. The Senator knows very well that I have no such object in view, and I doubt now whether the honorable Senator would really vote for such a proposition if presented. This is an isolated transaction in part—one not calculated to attract public attention as other brilliant achievements might do. There was no encounter with the enemy on that occasion. Nevertheless, I have heard the landing of the troops at Vera Cruz, under the circumstances, spoken of as an achievement which was and is considered by professional military men as an achievement worthy of special and separate notice; and it was this opinion, expressed by several gentlemen who had seen the memoir, that induced me to offer this resolution to the consideration of the Senate. I had never dreamed that any gentleman would suppose it to have any political object or purpose whatever. The resolution is such as I thought I had a right to suppose, from the general feeling and spirit of this body, would meet with favor here. I thought, when a suggestion was made to bring to notice a particular transaction, of which there was no narrative before the country, which was so brief as this, and not containing sentiments or opinions, but simply giving a connected history of the orders and the circumstances attending the landing; that not only the officers of the Army and of the Navy, but the whole country, would like to see the history of that achievement. I supposed there was a feeling of patriotism strong enough in the Senate to like to see it, and I did not think of rousing any feeling of political jealousy, or that the matter would redound to the particular advantage of General Scott or of Commodore Conner. I thought that when we had expended many thousands of dollars for publications as little authorized by the Constitution and as little connected with our duties here as this paper, there could be no objection to seeing it. Sir, I think it is very likely that gentlemen of sufficient industry, and those who take interest enough in the matter to do it, may glean from the voluminous documents which contain the details of that war the several incidents connected with the landing, but they are not to be found in the condensed form in which they appear in the memoir of Mr. Temple.

Mr. BORLAND. I am not aware that the Senate has ordered public reports to be brought before them, except those connected with some of the public offices.

Mr. BELL. I do not know whether any of precisely this description have been made; but reports of public utility are frequently called for and published. We have compendiums of laws, and for various purposes, and we had a proposition this morning for a compendium of laws connected with our commercial regulations, and which might be said to be of some practical use. But this resolution does not relate to a matter of sufficient importance, that I should stand here and urge the propriety or impropriety of publishing these forty pages of a condensed narrative, relating to the landing at Vera Cruz. I merely ask that the vote may be taken, and if Senators think it ought not to be published, let them say so. I will merely say, that it is a paper filed in the Navy Department, one which those who have examined it think should be published; that it is a narrative artistic and professional in its nature, and one which might be useful to our Army and Navy hereafter; and in view of the public interest generally, it is just as important as those other compendiums to which I have referred, which have been published.

Mr. HUNTER. I was about to ask to take up the deficiency bill, which has come back from the House with a disagreement to one of our amendments.

Mr. BELL. I hope the vote may be taken on this resolution.

Mr. HUNTER. If the Senate are prepared to vote, I have no objection.

Mr. GWIN. I move to lay it on the table, with a view to go into Executive session.

Mr. BELL. I hope it may be postponed, and come up in its order as unfinished business.

Mr. GWIN. I will move, then, to postpone the consideration of this resolution till to-morrow, for the purpose of proceeding to the consideration of Executive business.

The motion to postpone was agreed to.

DEFICIENCY BILL.

The message before alluded to had been received from the House of Representatives, by the hands of Mr. P. B. HAYES, its Chief Clerk, announcing that the House had receded from so much of its amendment to the twelfth amendment of the Senate to the bill to supply deficiencies in the appropriations for the service of the fiscal year ending the 30th of June, 1852, as had been disagreed to by the Senate; that it had receded from its amendment to the fourteenth amendment of the Senate; that it had receded from its disagreement to the Senate's eighteenth amendment; that it had agreed to the first amendment of the Senate to the amendment of the House to the Senate's twenty-fifth amendment; and that it had disagreed to the Senate's second amendment to the amendment of the House to the Senate's twenty-fifth amendment to the said bill.

The only remaining amendment in controversy was in these words, which the Senate proceeded to consider:

“For per diem compensation and mileage of Senators, Members of the House of Representatives, and Delegates, $50,000.”

Mr. HUNTER. I move that the Senate insist on its amendment. And if the Senate concur in that motion, I shall ask for a committee of conference. Before the question is taken, however, on that motion I hope I shall be indulged in a word or two of explanation. I am convinced that the House of Representatives disagreed to the Senate's amendment because they did not understand it. It was supposed that this amendment was designed to cover the money taken for mileage at the last called session of the Senate. It was also supposed that by voting down this amendment they could defeat the practice which has hitherto prevailed of claiming and receiving mileage in such cases. The House of Representatives, however, is mistaken to some extent as to the first supposition, and, I think, entirely as to the second.

This amendment is for $50,000 to cover a deficiency; and the whole amount of mileage taken for the last called session, to which reference has been made, will not exceed $40,000 or $41,000. The deficiency therefore was not caused entirely by the mileage of that session. I presume that the House of Representatives designed to deprive the Senate of mileage for that session; but if that were the design they would utterly fail by this means to accomplish their object. The money was taken more than a year ago. It was taken according to law; it was taken according to the decision of those appointed by the law to decide on that matter; it was taken according to the opinion of the Attorney General; and the accounts of the disbursing agent who paid it have passed the proper accounting department. The money, then, which was thus taken is legally vested in those who have taken it. There is no action which the Senate or House of Representatives could take, or which the whole Government could take, which could divest those Senators of their property in that amount.

But, sir, apart from that, the effect of defeating this appropriation would be, to deprive Senators of their per diem allowance; and if the House intend to insist on what they have done, the effect will be to deprive us hereafter of that allowance; because if the Senate is to be deprived of pay and mileage until this money is restored, they can never receive either, for it is impossible by any action which they could take, either on this amendment or any other bill, that they can deprive Senators of property which the law has vested in them. Again, sir, this deficiency arises not from that source alone, but from other causes. It is well known that several Senators have come here to supply vacancies, and that they, of course, are entitled to their mileage.

These have been the causes which have created this deficiency; and unless this amendment is agreed to there will be no money to pay to Senators their per diem allowance; for I understand that the money in the hands of the Secretary for that purpose is nearly exhausted. The effect, then, of refusing this amendment will not be to deprive Senators of the mileage for the called session, but to stop their daily compensation for services which they are now rendering, and to refuse the mileage of those who have been recently appointed. I think, therefore, when the House comes to understand the matter fully, they will probably recede from their amendment.

I will further take occasion to say here, that I think it would be dangerous for either House to interfere with the personal conduct of members of the other. Suppose, sir, that we were disposed to carry on such a war, could we not retaliate? There is a law, I believe, which forbids any member from receiving his pay except on those days on which he is actually in attendance. We know very well that this rule is not observed; and suppose that, with this knowledge, we were to move to cut down the appropriation for their pay, upon the plea that much of it was for time when they were absent from duty, and therefore not entitled under the law, would they not have cause to complain of us as having violated that courtesy which is due from one branch of the Government to another? Surely they would think such a course of procedure on our part very unbecoming.

Each House, therefore, must be allowed to judge of the propriety of its own action in relation to matters concerning that House only; and if they are guilty of any misconduct they are responsible, not each House to the other, but to the country; and throughout the country there will always be found critics enough to expose such misconduct on the part of either branch of the Legislature. I hope, sir, that it may be long before the two Houses engage in so unworthy a contest, or seek to hold up each other to public reprobation. I trust, then, that the Senate will insist on its amendment, and propose a committee of conference in relation to it; for I am sure that such a committee would not be long in adjusting this matter of difference between the two Houses.

The question being taken, the Senate insisted, and agreed to appoint a committee of conference; and Messrs. HUNTER, JAMES, and UPHAM were appointed.

EXECUTIVE SESSION.

The Senate, on motion by Mr. GWIN, proceeded to the consideration of Executive business, and, after some time spent therein, the doors were reopened, and the Senate adjourned.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

MONDAY, July 19, 1852.

The House met at eleven o'clock, a. m. Prayer by the Rev. L. F. MORGAN.

The Journal of Saturday was read and approved.

The SPEAKER. The first business in order is the motion to lay upon the table a motion to reconsider the vote by which the Florida land bill was defeated.

RELIEF OF PHILO SMITH.

Mr. HENDRICKS. Before the commencement of the business of the morning hour, I ask the consent of the House to introduce a small bill. I will say to the House that it is a matter of interest to but one of my constituents, and it proposes to secure him the payment of the sum of $19 96, the sum due him as one of the ordinary seamen on board the Macedonian, as the share awarded to him as captors of certain Algerine vessels, under Commodore Decatur. I do not know whether a bill for the payment of a sum of that size would be entertained here. Such is the character of the bill I desire to introduce.

The bill was then read by its title, as follows:

"A bill for the relief of Philo Smith."

Mr. HOUSTON. If it is introduced, I must have it taken out of the morning hour. There is no time to spare from the public business. If it is not taken out of the morning hour I must object.

Mr. OLDS. I shall be compelled to object if it be taken out of the morning hour.

Mr. HENDRICKS. I ask that the bill may be read for information, and I know the gentleman will not object.

The bill was then read through by the Clerk.

Mr. HENDRICKS. This is a matter of so small importance that it is hardly worth while to occupy the attention of the House at another time. The evidence in support of this claim is as clear as could be. I ask that a letter from the Treasury Department be read, and I ask that the rule which requires that it should be considered in Committee of the Whole, be suspended, and that it be acted upon now.

The letter alluded to was then read, as follows:

THE SPEAKER. It is in order.

Sir: Your letter of the 23d instant, to the Secretary of the Navy, having been referred to me, in reply I have to inform you that there is a small sum of $19 96 due to Philo Smith, formerly an ordinary seaman on board the Macedonian, as his share of the amount awarded to the captors of certain Algerine vessels, under Commodore Decatur. Those unclaimed balances having long since been carried to the credit of the "surplus fund," they cannot now be paid, until Congress shall reappropriate money for that purpose. I am, &c., your obedient servant,

A. O. DAYTON.

JOSEPH A. LEWIS, Esq.

No further objection being made, the bill was then ordered to be engrossed and read a third time; and having been engrossed, it was read the third time and passed.

Mr. MOLONY. There is a bill upon your table that has come from the Senate. It passed that body unanimously, so free was it from objection. It is simply this: It asks nothing out of the National Treasury, but asks the privilege for the city of Chicago, at our own expense,—which will not be less than one hundred thousand dollars,—to improve her harbor by widening the river. Why she asks this privilege of Congress is, that such improvement cannot take place without a slight excavation of an old military reserve, but no longer held for that purpose. I ask the consent of the House, so great and urgent are the necessities of the commerce of that port, that it may be taken up and passed. It has already passed the Senate.

The bill was then read a first and second time by its title, as follows:

"An act to authorize the Mayor and Common Council of Chicago, Illinois, to excavate a portion of the public reservation at that place with a view to the improvement of the navigation of the Chicago river."

The bill was then read through.

Mr. STANLY. I would be glad to know whether there is any provision in the general river and harbor bill for the improvement of the Chicago river?

Mr. MOLONY. Not for this improvement.

Mr. STANLY. Is there anything in the bill for it?

Mr. MOLONY. There is in the bill to which the gentleman alludes a provision for the completion of piers there which have already been commenced. The bill now under consideration is for the widening of the river, which is imperiously demanded for letting commerce get in and out.

The bill was then ordered to be read a third time.

Mr. DUNCAN. I wish to inquire, Mr. Speaker, whether the bill has ever been before any committee?

Mr. MOLONY. It was before a Senate committee, which reported in its favor. The report lies upon the Speaker's table. The Senate have unanimously passed the bill.

[Cries of "Question!" "Question!"]

The bill was then read the third time and passed.

Mr. MOLONY. I move that the vote by which the bill was passed be reconsidered, and that the motion to reconsider be laid upon the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

Mr. HOUSTON. Is it in order for me to submit the motion that the rules be suspended, and that the House resolve itself into the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union?

The SPEAKER. Not now.

Mr. HOUSTON. Why is it not in order now?

The SPEAKER. Because of the special order of the House setting apart the morning hour for the consideration of the morning business.

Mr. HOUSTON. I call for the regular order of business, then.

FLORIDA AND ALABAMA RAILROAD.

The SPEAKER. The business first in order is House bill No. 271, granting the right of way and a portion of the public lands to the States of Florida and Alabama, for the construction of certain railroads in said States. The pending question is the motion of the gentleman from New York [Mr. JENKINS] to lay upon the table the motion to reconsider the vote by which the bill was rejected.

Mr. JENKINS. The gentleman from Florida, [Mr. CABELL,] who feels a deep interest in this bill, has been called from the city on account of sickness, and I therefore move that its further consideration be postponed until to-morrow.

Mr. STANLY. If it be in order, I move that its further consideration be postponed till to-morrow week.

The SPEAKER. It is in order.

Mr. JENKINS. The question, I believe, will be first taken upon my motion.

The SPEAKER. According to the rules of the House, the question must be first put upon the longest number.

The question was then taken on the motion of Mr. STANLY, and it was agreed to; and the further consideration of the bill was postponed till Tuesday week.

RIGHT OF WAY TO RAIL AND PLANK ROADS.

The SPEAKER. The question next in order is the engrossment of House bill No. 284, to grant the right of way to all rail and plank roads passing through public lands belonging to the United States.

Mr. COBB. It is not my intention to consume further time in the discussion of this bill. I shall, however, submit for the action of the House several amendments which have been suggested to me as being proper.

Mr. HUNTER. With the gentleman's permission, I will give notice that at the proper time I will offer the following amendment:

Provided further, That when a location for either of said railroads, or plank roads, or sites for depôts on the line of such road or roads shall be selected, the proper officers of such road or roads shall transmit to the Commissioner of the General Land Office a correct plat of the survey of said road or roads, together with the survey of sites for depôts before such selection shall become operative.

Mr. COBB. I have no objection to that amendment. I trust I may have the attention of the House to the few suggestions I shall throw out. The bill now provides that all plank and railroad companies shall be entitled to five acres every ten miles, if there be public land there, for the purpose of constructing thereon depôts, &c. The suggestion has been made to me, that that quantity of land is too great. I have no preferences whatever in relation to the matter. It is for the House to determine whether we shall grant to rail and plank companies five, or a less number of acres, for establishing work-shops, depôts, &c. That the question may be submitted for its action, I move to insert in lieu of "five," "one," so that it will read "one acre" instead of "five."

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. COBB. It is also suggested, that in the thirteenth line of the third section, after the words "the road shall be begun within five years," I should move to insert the words "from and after the passage of this act." The amendment, if adopted, will not affect the bill one way or the other.

Mr. HENN. I do not see the necessity for the limitation. Why not let the roads be commenced whenever it is thought proper?

Mr. COBB. I have no choice. The amendment is intended to guard the Treasury as much as possible. It is for the House to say whether the words I have proposed shall or shall not be inserted.

Mr. ABERCROMBIE. Is there any time proposed in which the roads shall be completed?

Mr. COBB. The bill provides that all such roads shall be commenced within five years, and completed within fifteen years.

Mr. SMART. Will the gentleman from Alabama [Mr. COBB] indulge me for a moment? I noticed in the reading of the bill, which I have not noticed before, that it is very loosely drawn. I see that it authorizes the company to take wood, stone, and earth from the vicinity of the railroads at all times, for building and repairing the road, and carrying it to any point. It strikes me that this is a most extraordinary grant. It is a grant to this company to go to any portion of the public lands and take wood, earth, and stone, however valuable, for the repairs of railroads. I trust that no such grant will be made by this House. What will you have left, suppose you make this grant? Suppose you wish to sell lands to a citizen, what will you have to sell? You will be obliged to sell this land with this reservation.

Mr. COBB. If the gentleman has any doubt about this matter I can obviate it in a moment. I will state to the House that they have given in several railroad bills the right of way to different States. If the gentleman from Maine [Mr. SMART] has any difficulty about this matter, I would suggest an amendment like this: "So long as they remain public," so the land which is disposed of will carry with it a revocation of the right of the road to use stone and timber from the particular land which may be sold.

Mr. SMART. If the gentleman will permit me, I will say to him that I am opposed to that grant. It is a grant that has no limit, and people may, in their discretion, take as much wood and timber on the particular road as they please. I am not for making such a grant here, and I trust that the project will be laid upon the table.

Mr. COBB. To obviate the gentleman's objection, I am perfectly willing that there should be an amendment inserted there in the words, "so long as said lands remain public belonging to the United States," or any other words which the gentleman may choose.

Mr. JENKINS. Will the gentleman allow me to ask him a question?

Mr. COBB. I will hear any question.

Mr. JENKINS. If I understand the bill aright it grants two hundred rods of land—one hundred on each side of the road.

Mr. COBB. One hundred feet on each side.

Mr. JENKINS. That is twelve rods. Why do you want a road twelve rods wide for a plank road? It is wide enough for three or four tracks, and here are two hundred feet granted.

Mr. STUART. Will the gentleman allow me a moment? The gentleman from Maine [Mr. SMART] objects to the bill, because it fixes an incumbrance upon land that shall have been purchased by individuals. No such construction can be given this bill, because it purports to give the right of way through Government land, and this right exists while it is Government land; but the moment those lands are sold to an individual the right to take timber, stone, or earth ceases; the right of way merely remains, and nothing but that. As to the suggestion made by the gentleman from New York, [Mr. JENKINS,] in regard to the width of the road, the bill does not propose to give this number of feet along the whole line of the road. It purports to give this number of feet for the purpose of depot stations, building, &c.

Mr. JENKINS. The gentleman is mistaken. It gives a width of one hundred feet along the whole line, on each side of the road.

Mr. STUART. It only gives the additional width at different points where stations and other buildings are necessary.

Mr. COBB. One hundred feet on each side.

Mr. STUART. Roads which are laid out in the western States are at least one hundred and fifty feet in width. There is no reason why they should not be two hundred feet. It is for the purpose of a railroad track.

Mr. JENKINS. Will the gentleman allow me to ask, should there be a reason why it should be two hundred feet before the grant is made?

Mr. STUART. Certainly there should be. Whether it is one hundred or two hundred feet, it is a matter of no possible consequence except so far as regards the interests and convenience of the road. When you get on a double track why two hundred feet will not prove too much room.

Mr. COBB. I desire to call the attention of the gentleman from New York [Mr. JENKINS] to what I am about to say. I was of the same way of thinking with the gentleman, but I consulted a gentleman of this House, who is a practical engineer, [Mr. EVANS,] and he objects to the bill, because it did not give land enough. He said that it is utterly impossible to construct a road of this width through many sections of the country, where considerable excavations have to be made.

Mr. JENKINS. Will not sixty feet be wide enough for three tracks?

Mr. COBB. Two hundred feet will not be enough in many instances, especially through low ground, and they would have to beg for more. The House has the bill before it. I have no more interest in it than any member of the House, and I trust that they will take charge of it and make such disposition of it as they see fit. I am requested to call the previous question.

Mr. ABERCROMBIE. I hope my friend will withdraw the demand for the previous question for a moment. I hope the bill will not be laid upon the table. The House will recollect that a bill was defeated the other day granting the right of way and a donation of public lands to aid in the construction of a railroad from Girard to Mobile Bay. That road is now in progress, and the farmers of that section of country are now at work upon it. I suppose that there are not less than five hundred hands at work upon it at this time. It is, as I have said before, entirely in the hands of the farming community, who are making an effort to get a market where they can carry, in a cheap and speedy way, their produce for shipping. Forty miles of the road are under contract, and it passes through some three or four half sections of public lands in that distance. Reject this bill and all the work, and all the money which has been expended upon it, will be lost to that community.

Mr. JENKINS. It would be better for the gentleman to introduce a bill applicable to his case, instead of urging the passage of a general bill of this character.

Mr. ABERCROMBIE. I cannot conceive of any bill for my case that would not be the best bill for the whole country, and for other roads. Will the Government become so narrow and contracted in its disposition as not to allow improvements of this important character to be made through every part of the country? I could not suppose that there would be such illiberality in this House. I do not think there is, and I cannot believe, for a moment, that the motion will be entertained by the House. I desire to bring this matter to the serious consideration of the House. It is a matter of no small importance to the part of the country which I have the honor to represent. They have spent a great deal of money already, and there is but a small portion of the public lands through which the road, now under contract, passes—probably not more than three or four half sections. Are we to be deprived from carrying on this road upon this account? As the road progresses, it reaches larger bodies of public lands—lands which are poor and valueless, but which will be made valuable by this improvement. Is it possible, in view of the considerations I have presented, that this House can refuse to grant the right of way to the company who are building this road? I hope that the good sense of this House will determine against the motion made by the gentleman on my left, [Mr. JENKINS.]

Mr. HAVEN. I have no desire to take up the time of the House before the vote is taken upon this bill. I desire to submit two amendments for the consideration of the House. It will be seen by reference to the bill that it authorizes the running of these roads through the public lands. I submit to the House that that may be an authority to run through these lands upon which the Government have forts, arsenals, navy-yards, dock-yards, and works of public improvement, and I propose to offer a limitation restricting the use of such property. Then I am in hopes that the bill will be so acceptable to the House, that they will take it with another amendment which I propose to offer, and which is to incorporate substantially upon the bill the resolution I offered the other day, authorizing a company in my own State to run their track through a work of the kind I have described. With these amendments, I am in hopes that the bill will pass. I would have this proviso added to the end of the third section:

Provided still further, That none of the foregoing provisions of this act shall apply to, or authorize any rights in any lands of the United States, other than such as are held for private entry and sale at the minimum price and such as are unsurveyed and not held for public use by erections or improvements thereon.

The SPEAKER. The amendment proposed by the gentleman from New York [Mr. HAVEN] will not be in order unless proposed as an amendment to the amendment of the gentleman from Ohio, [Mr. HUNTER,] unless by unanimous consent it be received and considered at the proper time.

Mr. COBB. I object to that amendment, and therefore the gentleman cannot offer it. I will hear the other amendment read, for I think it is right.

Mr. HAVEN. I was not aware that the amendment offered by the gentleman from Ohio was to the end of the third section. If that comes in at the end of the third section, then I propose this amendment as an amendment to his, which will be in order.

The SPEAKER. As an amendment to an amendment, it would be in order if the gentleman had the floor, or if he could offer it by the consent of the gentleman from Alabama, [Mr. COBB.]

Mr. HAVEN. That is precisely what I stated.

Mr. COBB. Let it go. I have no particular objection to it.

Mr. HAVEN. I propose now to offer an amendment as a fourth section of the bill.

Mr. COBB. I think that ought to be ingrafted for New York's especial benefit.

Mr. STUART. I wish to make a suggestion in regard to that first amendment. It is that the gentleman should strike out the words "minimum price," because you cannot cross a railroad track where alternate sections have been reserved.

Mr. HAVEN. Very well; I have no objection to that. Strike out those words.

The amendment was so modified.

Mr. HAVEN. I desire now to offer the following, to come in at the end of the bill as a fourth section:

And be it further enacted, That the right of way through the public lands of the United States, lying in Black Rock, in the county of Erie, in the State of New York, be and the same is hereby granted to the Lockport and Buffalo Railroad Company: Provided, That in the opinion of the President of the United States such grant be not injurious to public interests, and that the location shall be approved by the President as to the position and width of the said railroad: Provided further, That if the said railroad shall not be completed within two years, or if at any time after its completion the said railway be discontinued or abandoned, this grant shall cease and determine.

The SPEAKER. At this moment that amendment can only be entertained by unanimous consent. Another amendment being pending, it is not in order until that is disposed of.

Mr. COBB. My object is, that everybody shall be satisfied, if possible.

Mr. SACKETT. I wish to make a suggestion, with the permission of the gentleman from Alabama, [Mr. COBB,] if it is in order. I think the first section of the bill is imperfect. I am for the principle of the bill. I think it is a good bill, and ought to be passed; but there are two or three manifest defects in the first section. One is, that there is no provision authorizing surveys for the purpose of roads, unless it is upon a given track of road to be adopted, or that has been adopted by the company. In other words, there is no authority to run surveys with a view to ascertain a track.

Another thing which is common at this day is, that railroad charters are granted by different States, running through different States, and dependent upon the legislation of different States. There is no provision in this bill except for railroads, the charters of which are granted by a given State. Now, I propose a substitute for the first section containing the same principle, but which relieves it from those two defects.

Mr. COBB. I will consent to the amendment being read.

The proposed substitute was then read, as follows:

Be it enacted, That a right of way of one hundred feet in width, for a railroad, be and is hereby granted through any of the public lands belonging to the United States, to all railroad and plank road companies authorized by the legislative authority of any one or more of the States, and any such company shall have a right to take possession of, hold and use for the purpose of this grant so much of the land hereby granted as may be required for a railroad, stations, depots, and watering places of the company, but to no greater width and extent than is herein provided; and the engineer, officers, and agents of any such company shall have the right to enter upon any of the public lands belonging to the United States for the purpose of surveying, locating, laying out, and fencing upon any such road its stations, watering places, and depots.

Mr. COBB. I cannot accept that amendment. In the first place it proposes only one hundred feet, and an able engineer here tells me that it is impossible to establish a road of that width. The second proposition of the gentleman may bring the different States into conflict, and I have no disposition on a bill like this to do that. I therefore object to the amendment.

Mr. STEVENS, of Pennsylvania. Will the gentleman allow me to trouble him for a moment?

Mr. COBB. I cannot refuse any gentleman of the House this courtesy.

Mr. STEVENS. Mr. Speaker, there is one provision in this bill which I do not like, and I suggest it to the gentleman. As the bill now stands, a company running their road through one township of public lands, although they may run it for forty miles through other lands, will be entitled under the second section of this bill to take materials for building, and for the perpetual repair of the road, from the public lands alone, forever. Now, I suppose it is only intended to give the right to take for repairs and building through the lands of the United States; but as the bill now reads, it gives them the right to take it for the whole road off the public lands. What I propose is this, sir: that the company shall have the right to take materials off the public lands for building a road through the public lands, and for repairing it through the public lands, but not for the building and repair of the whole length of the road. I suggest to the gentleman to propose as an amendment to the end of the second section the words "through said land." It will then give the right to build it from the public materials through the public lands, and to repair it from materials through the public lands. But it will not give the company the right to build their road at the public expense, with the timber of the public for fifty or one hundred miles, although they may run but ten miles through the public lands. It will then read:

"That the said company or companies shall have the right to take from the public lands in the vicinity of said road or roads, all such materials of earth, stone, and wood, as may be necessary or convenient, from time to time, for the actual construction or repair of the said road or roads, or any part thereof, through said lands."

That confines the application of the public materials to the road through the public lands. I understood the gentleman from Alabama, [Mr. ABERCROMBIE,] to say that his road runs through several sections of the public lands, but that most of it runs through land that is not public. I am willing that he should take the materials off the public lands for that portion of the road which runs through the public lands.

Mr. COBB. I have no objection to the amendment suggested by the gentleman from Pennsylvania, [Mr. STEVENS.] My object is to make the bill perfectly satisfactory to the House and to the country.

The SPEAKER. It is not within the power of the gentleman from Alabama to accept that amendment, the bill being a report from the committee, as the Chair understands it.

Mr. COBB. If the gentleman will send his amendment to me, I will offer it.

Mr. RISSELL. I feel some interest in this bill, but no more than every gentleman in this House ought to feel, because it is a measure which relates to the public interest. As I was about to say, though it may not be very flattering to us, yet it is amusing to consider, for a moment, how very inconsistently we have acted. Now, during the last Congress, a bill passed this House, giving, for a certain railroad, all that is asked in this bill, and fifty feet in width more, as a right of way, and, in addition to that, two millions and a half acres of the public lands. This very session another bill has been passed by the votes of members who surround me, giving to a company, or to a State—which is the same thing—first, all that is asked, every single thing asked in this bill, and fifty feet in width more; and then, in addition to that, one million seven hundred thousand acres of land besides. Then comes up a simple proposition to give to all similar companies the right of way merely, and the right of taking earth, and other suitable materials for constructing the roads, just exactly as was provided in those other bills alluded to, save that in this bill there is fifty feet less given and no land—not millions of acres, not one acre—and here we are, higgling and haggling, and quarreling, as to whether that bill shall pass, because it authorizes the taking up of too much road, or gives twenty-five feet too much land. Now, I ask if this is not an inconsistency which should shame legislation? I ask if it is not a trivial objection that is raised against this bill, which is of a general character—not partial—but uniform and equal, and extending to all companies alike certain, necessary, indispensable privileges? Is it not a trivial objection that there are ten feet too much, when, in one case, you have given away two and a half millions of acres of land, besides two hundred and fifty feet right of way?

Mr. COBB. Is the gentleman through? I am afraid he will get up a discussion.

Mr. RISSELL. I am not through, but I do not care about saying anything more. I want merely to add that this bill ought to pass without a single moment's more discussion. It is harmless and a simple bill, necessary and indispensable if you will have railroads. If you want to save the time, labor, and expense, of legislating upon every local measure,—and they are legion,—you must pass this bill.

Mr. COBB. I hope the gentleman will let us act upon the bill.

Mr. RISSELL. Call the previous question, then.

Mr. CARTTER. I want to make an inquiry in connection with this bill, with the gentleman's permission. If I am not allowed to do so, I hope the previous question will be voted down.

Mr. COBB. I intend to test the sense of the House whether they want any further discussion upon this matter or not.

Mr. ABERCROMBIE. I desire to make an explanation.

Mr. COBB. I hope my colleague will not insist, because he belongs to the State of Alabama, and I have been charged with yielding the floor to the friends of the bill, although really more enemies have had the floor than friends. I propose, as an additional amendment, to come in as a fourth section, the one which the gentleman from New York [Mr. HAYEN] proposed.

The SPEAKER. It can only be done by unanimous consent.

Mr. COBB. I hope the House will not object to it.

The SPEAKER. If it is the pleasure of the House the proposition will be received and considered in its turn.

No objection was made, so the amendment was received.

Mr. COBB. Then the gentleman from Pennsylvania, [Mr. STEVENS,] who charges this bill with not being perfectly guarded in relation to taking stone and materials, asks the unanimous consent of the House to offer his amendment, to be considered at the proper place and time.

There being no objection, the amendment was received.

Mr. COBB. If the House is willing to sustain the previous question, I now call for it.

Mr. ABERCROMBIE. The gentleman from Pennsylvania, [Mr. STEVENS,] when he was upon the floor a few moments since, said that he understood me to say that the road I had been advocating in this House passed through very little of the public lands.

The SPEAKER. The Chair must interpose, and remind the gentleman that debate is not in order.

Mr. ABERCROMBIE. I only wish to give an explanation. I want to set the gentleman right.

The SPEAKER. Is it the unanimous consent of the House that the gentleman be allowed to proceed?

[Loud cries of "Object!"]

Mr. SMART. I move to lay the bill upon the table; and upon that motion I demand the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

The question was then taken, and it was decided in the negative—yeas 70, nays 91; as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Allison, Ashe, Averett, Barrere, Bartlett, Beal, Bibbighaus, Bowne, Breckinridge, George H. Brown, Buell, Burt, Joseph Cable, Caldwell, Carter, Chapman, Chastain, Daniel, George T. Davis, Dean, Dimmick, Edmundson, Floyd, Fowler, Gaylord, Giddings, Goodenow, Hamilton, Isham G. Harris, Hebard, Hillyer, Holladay, Horsford, John W. Howe, Thomas M. Howe, Ives, Jackson, Jenkins, George G. King, Preston King, Kuhns, Kurtz, Letcher, Mann, Martin, McLanahan, McMullin, McNair, Morehead, Murray, Newton, Peaslee, Perkins, Powell, Reed, Robbins, Robie, Ross, Russell, Schermerhorn, David L. Seymour, Skelton, Smart, Stanley, Thaddeus Stevens, Sutherland, Thurston, Wallace, Wildrick, and Williams—70.

NAYS—Messrs. Abercrombie, Willis Allen, David J. Bailey, Thomas H. Bayly, Bell, Bissell, John H. Boyd, Bragg, Brenton, Briggs, Albert G. Brown, Burrows, Busby, Lewis D. Campbell, Thompson Campbell, Churchill, Clingman, Cobb, Conger, Curtis, John G. Davis, Dawson, Disney, Doty, Duncan, Durkee, Eastman, Picklin, Fitch, Florence, Freeman, Gamble, Gentry, Gorman, Grey, Harper, Sampson W. Harris, Haws, Haven, Hendricks, Henn, Houston, Hunter, Andrew Johnson, James Johnson, John Johnson, Robert W. Johnson, George W. Jones, Landry, Lockhart, Humphrey Marshall, Mason, Meade, Miller, Miner, Molony, John Moore, Murphy, Nabers, Olds, Orr, Andrew Parker, Samuel W. Parker, Penn, Phelps, Polk, Porter, Richardson, Riddle, Robinson, Savage, Scudder, Scurry, Smith, Benjamin Stanton, Frederick P. Stanton, Richard H. Stanton, Abraham P. Stephens, St. Martin, Strother, Stuart, Taylor, Townshend, Tuck, Venable, Walbridge, Ward, Watkins, Welch, Alexander White, and Yates—91.

So the House refused to lay the bill upon the table.

Mr. HOUSTON. Has the morning hour expired?

The SPEAKER. It has.

Mr. COBB. I ask my colleague to allow me to submit a motion to recommit the bill to the Committee on Public Lands, with a view to keep it before the House.

Mr. HOUSTON. I am perfectly willing that the gentleman should submit that motion.

Mr. COBB. Then I make that motion.

EVENING SESSIONS.

Mr. HOUSTON. I ask the unanimous consent of the House to offer the following resolution:

Resolved, That until otherwise ordered, this House will hold an evening session on each day, commencing at five o'clock p. m., which shall be devoted exclusively to discussion in the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union.

Mr. WARD. I object.

Mr. HOUSTON. Gentlemen around me insist that I shall move to suspend the rules, so as to enable me to offer that resolution. It would be a great saving of time, and if the evening sessions did not work well, we could give them up. I therefore move to suspend the rules.

Mr. VENABLE. I ask for tellers on the suspension of the rules.

Mr. HOUSTON. I will modify my resolution so as to make it read "six o'clock p. m.," instead of "five o'clock p. m."

Tellers were ordered, and Messrs. JOHNSON of Arkansas and CHANDLER were appointed.

The question was then put, and the tellers reported—yeas 76, nays 64.

Mr. CARTTER demanded the yeas and nays; and they were ordered.

Mr. BURT. I suggest to the honorable chairman of the Committee of Ways and Means to strike out the latter part of the resolution which specifies that the sessions shall be devoted to speech-making.

Mr. CARTTER. Oh, no, that is the very thing for which we want the evening sessions.

Mr. JOHNSON, of Arkansas. I suggest to the gentleman from Alabama to insert in his resolution, after the word "discussion," these words, "of those general appropriation bills upon which debate has not been closed."

Mr. HOUSTON. I have no objection to that modification.

Mr. CARTTER. I hope the gentleman will not modify it in that way.

The SPEAKER. In the opinion of the Chair, that modification cannot now be made.

Mr. RICHARDSON. I desire to know from the chairman of the Committee of Ways and Means, what necessity there is for the passage of such a resolution as this? Why cannot the House order an evening session on any day when the public necessities require it? I can see no necessity for the passage of such a resolution as this.

Mr. HOUSTON. In reply to the gentleman from Illinois, I will say that the necessity is apparent. We are near the end of the eighth month of the session, and nothing has been done. The Senate is calling upon us daily for business, and there is a resolution from that body now upon the Speaker's table, saying that they will not receive business from us within ten days of the day of adjournment. The gentleman must see the difficulties in the way, and my object is to have these evening sessions that gentlemen who want to make general speeches on promiscuous subjects may meet here and discuss. If it proves ineffectual, if it proves a bad rule, we can repeal it. There can be no harm in the experiment for the purpose of expediting the public business. There is a great necessity for it.

The SPEAKER. This discussion, as gentlemen are aware, is out of order, unless by unanimous consent.

Mr. CARTTER. I object, and call the gentleman to order.

The question was then taken upon Mr. Houston's motion, and there were—yeas 101, nays 68; as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Willis Allen, Allison, William Appleton, Averett, Barrere, Beale, Bell, Bibbighaus, Briggs, Buell, Burt, Carter, Chandler, Chastain, Churchill, Clingman, Cobb, Conger, Curtis, John G. Davis, Dean, Dimmick, Doty, Duncan, Durkee, Eastman, Edmundson, Faulkner, Picklin, Fitch, Freeman, Gamble, Gaylord, Gentry, Giddings, Hamilton, Harper, Isham G. Harris, Haws, Haven, Hebard, Hendricks, Henn, Hillyer, Horsford, Houston, Howard, John W. Howe, Thomas M. Howe, Hunter, Ives, Jackson, Andrew Johnson, Robert W. Johnson, J. Glancy Jones, George G. King, Preston King, Kurtz, Letcher, Lockhart, Mann, Martin, Mason, McLanahan, McNair, Milson, Murphy, Murray, Nabers, Newton, Olds, Orr, Samuel W. Parker, Peaslee, Penn, Perkins, Phelps, Powell, Rantoul, Reed, Robbins, Robie, Robinson, Schermerhorn, Scudder, Scurry, David L. Seymour, Skelton, Smith, Benjamin Stanton, Abraham P. Stephens, Thaddeus Stevens, Stone, Sutherland, Taylor, Venable, Walbridge, Wallace, Washburn, Welch, and Yates—101.

NAYS—Messrs. Abercrombie, Aiken, Ashe, David J. Bailey, Thomas H. Bayly, Bartlett, Bissell, Bowie, John H. Boyd, Bragg, Brenton, Albert G. Brown, George H. Brown, Burrows, Busby, Joseph Cable, Caldwell, Lewis D. Campbell, Thompson Campbell, Chapman, Daniel, George T. Davis, Dawson, Disney, Florence, Floyd, Fowler, Goodenow, Grey, Sampson W. Harris, Holladay, Jenkins, James Johnson, John Johnson, Daniel T. Jones, George W. Jones, Kuhns, Landry, Humphrey Marshall, McMullin, McQueen, Meade, Miner, John Moore, Morehead, Andrew Parker, Penniman, Polk, Porter, Richardson, Riddle, Ross, Russell, Savage, Smart, Stanly, Frederick P. Stanton, Richard H. Stanton, St. Martin, Strother, Thurston, Townshend, Ward, Watkins, Alexander White, Wilcox, Wildrick, and Williams—68.

So (two thirds not voting in the affirmative) the rules were not suspended.

Mr. HOUSTON. I move that the rules be suspended, and that the House resolve itself into the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union.

Mr. STANLY. I ask the gentleman from Alabama to withdraw that motion, to permit me to make a motion to suspend the rules to take up from the Speaker's table the bill for the relief of the indigent insane, in order that we may fix a day for its consideration.

Mr. HOUSTON. I cannot. I must press the consideration of the public business as much as I can.

Mr. GENTRY. Will not the gentleman from Alabama allow the resolution from the Senate proposing to arm these little pages and other boys to be taken up?

Mr. HOUSTON. I cannot. I must insist on my motion.

The question was then taken on Mr. Houston's motion, and it was agreed to—ayes 83, noes 40.

So the rules were suspended, and the House resolved itself into the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union, (Mr. Disney in the chair.)

INDIAN APPROPRIATION BILL.

The CHAIRMAN stated, as the business before the committee, the consideration of House bill No. 43, "making appropriation for the current and contingent expenses of the Indian department, and for fulfilling treaty stipulations with various Indian tribes, for the year ending June 30th, 1853," and that the pending question was on the amendment of the gentleman from Indiana, [Mr. Fitch.]

Mr. FITCH. I have modified my amendment so as to read:

For the payment of $2,842 36 to Hiram R. Pitchlynn, in his own right and as sole heir-at-law and legal representative of his brother, John Pitchlynn, deceased; that being the amount of the proceeds of the sales of two quarter sections of land, granted to, and located in the name of, the said Hiram R. Pitchlynn and John Pitchlynn, under and by virtue of the eighth article of the treaty with the Chickasaw Indians, made in the city of Washington, on the 24th day of May, in the year 1834, and which quarter sections of land were sold, and the proceeds thereof invested in the stock of the State of Arkansas, in pursuance of the provisions of the article aforesaid: Provided, Said Hiram R. Pitchlynn shall establish his identity, and that he is John Pitchlynn's sole heir, to the satisfaction of the Secretary of the Interior.

Mr. HOUSTON. I have no objection to that amendment in its modified form.

Mr. FITCH. Very well, sir; then I will not trouble the committee with the reading of documentary evidence in support of the claim.

The question was then taken on the amendment, and it was agreed to.

Mr. HOUSTON. I desire to propose to the committee that we shall not read the bill regularly through, but that we shall pass through it regularly, stopping at each point where an amendment is proposed to be made. These amendments are all paid under treaties, and must be provided for. I have got a bill marked with the points at which amendments are intended to be proposed, and we shall save a great deal of time by skipping from one of those points to another.

Mr. BRENTON. If the chairman of the Committee of Ways and Means will furnish us all with bills marked at the points where amendments have to be offered, I will not object to the plan he proposes.

Mr. HOUSTON. If the gentleman has no amendments of his own to offer, of course it can make no difference to him. However, let the bill be read through.

Mr. GIDDINGS. I propose, for the purpose of asking for a little information, to diminish this appropriation five dollars.

The CHAIRMAN. There is no amendment pending.

Mr. GIDDINGS. I desire to obtain some information from the chairman of the Committee of Ways and Means, if he possesses it. This whole Chickasaw grant is appropriated according to the act of 1799.

Mr. HOUSTON. What is the amendment proposed?

Mr. GIDDINGS. To diminish the amount of the appropriation.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair again states to the gentleman from Ohio that there is no amendment pending. This provision has been agreed to, together with the various amendments which have been offered to it, which cannot now be altered. If, however, the gentleman proposes to offer an additional provision by way of amendment, he has a right to do so.

Mr. GIDDINGS. Then I offer the following as an amendment:

Provided, That no portion of this amount be paid until the original contract between this Government and the Chickasaws shall be ascertained.

I offer that amendment merely for the purpose of inquiring whether the chairman of the Committee of Ways and Means, or the chairman of the Committee on Indian Affairs, can give us any information as to this original contract with the Chickasaws. It is well known that this grant is paid under the act of 1799. That act was predicated upon an agreement with the Chickasaw Indians, entered into in 1799, and that agreement is what I want to ascertain. It was made at Philadelphia, and the grant was to continue while that agreement was in force. I called upon the Department years since to ascertain when that agreement would expire. The agreement was not to be found at that time, and I now want to know of the chairman of the Committee on Indian Affairs, and of the chairman of the Committee of Ways and Means, if that agreement or contract is within their knowledge, or if they have anything to show when that contract will expire?

Mr. JOHNSON, of Arkansas. I will ask that the proposed amendment of the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. Giddings] may be read. I cannot determine what he desires, as I cannot hear him.

Mr. GIDDINGS. My amendment is that no portion of this amount shall be paid until that contract shall be ascertained to be in force.

Mr. JOHNSON. What contract is it?

Mr. GIDDINGS. The contract made at Philadelphia in 1794, and referred to in the act of 1799, under which this appropriation is made. I want to know when that amendment will expire?

Mr. JOHNSON. I can at once give to the gentleman all I have to say in regard to it. He is now referring to a matter which has been adjudicated entirely by the Committee of Ways and Means—a matter which has not been before the Committee on Indian Affairs—and a matter about which I know nothing upon the face of the earth. It has never been before us, and I know nothing in regard to it. The Committee of Ways and Means can answer, perhaps; I cannot.

Mr. GIDDINGS. Can the chairman of the Committee of Ways and Means inform me?—for we are paying money, and no one knows under what authority we are paying it. We can only say we have paid it heretofore, and we agreed to pay it so long as the contract remains in force. Now, whether that contract has expired, or whether it yet remains in force is a matter which I desire to understand.

Mr. HOUSTON. I will send up the law, and the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. Giddings] can hear it read.

Mr. GIDDINGS. I have the law.

Mr. PHELPS. I will further state, if the gentleman from Ohio will give his attention, that I have the impression that the agreement referred to in the act of Congress to which the gentleman refers, is not contained in any of the statutes of the United States, but is contained in a volume of treaties, compiled many years since, under the direction of the Secretary of War. I think it was during the last Congress that my attention was called to some treaties and agreements made with the Indians; and if I mistake not, one was with the Chickasaw Indians. I cannot now state the terms of that agreement, but my impression is, that it was a permanent annuity which was to be paid to them. The agreement is contained in an old volume of Indian treaties, but I was informed by a clerk in the Indian Office that he knew of but one volume of the publication in existence, and that was the one which they had in the office of the Commissioner of Indian Affairs.

Mr. GIDDINGS. I want those gentlemen to bring forward at the next session a knowledge of that contract. I do not want to detain the House.

If they are not prepared to show the contract now, I hope they will be the next session.

Mr. PHELPS. I am not, for one, prepared at this time.

Mr. GIDDINGS. I withdraw my amendment.

Mr. HOUSTON. I am instructed by the Committee of Ways and Means to amend the clause appropriating $400 for the purchase of tobacco for the Chickasaws, by striking out $400 and inserting $500. The insertion of $400 in the printed bill was a typographical error.

The question was put, and the amendment was agreed to.

Mr. HOUSTON. I propose, under the instructions of the Committee, to amend the clause appropriating $1,000 for two carpenters for the Chickasaws on Lake Superior, by striking out "$1,000," and inserting "$1,200."

The question was put, and the amendment was agreed to.

The following clause of the bill was read:

"For sixth of forty-six installments to be paid to the Chickasaws of Mississippi, stipulated in the third article of the treaty of the 2d of August, 1847, $1,000."

Mr. HOUSTON. I am instructed by the Committee of Ways and Means to propose an amendment to the above clause. After the word "for" insert the word "three," and after the word "sixth" insert "seventh, eighth, ninth, and tenth;" and in the one hundred and fifty-second line, strike out the word "one" and insert in lieu thereof the word "five." The object of this amendment is to make to this tribe of Indians, the advance which was struck out of the deficiency bill a few days ago—to advance the five installments to enable them to open their farms and carry on the cultivation of them. The subject was discussed a few days ago.

The question was put, and the amendment was agreed to.

Mr. FITCH. I now offer an amendment, of which I gave notice some days since, to come in at the end of the clause in relation to the Creek Indians, at the end of line two hundred and fifteen.

The amendment was then read, as follows:

For liquidating the balance found due to the Creek Indians for losses sustained during the last war with Great Britain, by that portion of the tribe that was friendly to, and cooperated with the United States, in accordance with the promise of the Government, $110,417 90, to be paid by the United States agent for the Creek Indians, to those individuals living, and the legal representatives of those deceased, who are entitled to receive the same.

Mr. FITCH. It will, perhaps, be scarcely necessary to allude any further to this matter. It has been estimated for; it has been recommended by the proper Department; it is in proof that these Indians aided us in our war against the hostile Creeks; and it is in proof that they suffered damages at the hands of those hostile Creeks, for which they have not been compensated, at least only in part. This amendment provides for the payment to them of the balance of the amount found due to them, under an investigation gone into by the express direction of the Government. The claim has been recognized by the Government, and they ask that this additional appropriation should be made, in order to enable them to pay it. With this simple synopsis of its history, I will submit it without further remarks, unless objection be made.

The question was then taken on the adoption of the amendment, and it was agreed to.

Mr. CONGER. I have an amendment to propose to the bill, if it is in order.

The CHAIRMAN. An amendment is in order.

Mr. CONGER. I offer the amendment which I send to the table.

The amendment was read, as follows:

To pay the claim, as adjusted by the accounting officer of the United States Treasury, in favor of David Taylor, under the latter clause of the thirteenth article of the Cherokee treaty, concluded at New Echota, December 29, 1835, and approved by the Senate, $12,650; to be paid out of the balance of the appropriation of July 2, 1835, under an act entitled "An act making further appropriations for carrying into effect certain Indian treaties."

Mr. CONGER. That claim arises under the treaty of 1835, made with the Cherokees. For carrying that treaty into effect, appropriations were made on the second day of July, 1836. It has been the practice to pay these claims out of those appropriations. When this claim was under investigation, the First Comptroller entertained doubts whether any of these appropriations were applicable to the payment of this particular class of claims. Having examined the matter, he furnished me with a written statement, in which he says he is unable to come to a conclusion that he has the right, by law, to pay it. There is no difficulty about the amount. That has already been ascertained by the accounting officer of the Government. There is a balance of this appropriation that is not wanted for any other purpose. It is necessary, however, to confer upon the controlling officer authority to pay this claim out of the balance remaining. That is all there is of this matter, and here is a written statement from the Comptroller stating these facts.

Mr. JONES, of Tennessee. I do not know that I am acquainted with the fact, but I understand that this claim has been allowed, and that the Secretary of the Interior has made a requisition upon the Treasury for the payment of it to some claims agents of this city, who have been endeavoring to get the claim allowed, and who have filed a caveat against the payment of it to David Taylor, until he pays his agent. Are these the facts?

Mr. CONGER. The gentleman is mistaken. So far as I can learn the facts from the Comptroller, a requisition was made upon the Secretary of the Interior; but when the claim came before Mr. Whittlesey, the First Comptroller, he stated that upon an examination of the law making the appropriation, he entertained doubts whether he could pass the claim, because this class of claims had not been appropriated for. That is the point. A communication from Mr. Whittlesey, which I will in a moment send to the Clerk's desk to be read, I think will satisfy the gentleman this amendment should be passed. Mr. Whittlesey, a few evenings since, called at my room expressly to recommend my attention to this subject. If there is any agent of claims concerned about it, I know nothing of the fact. I will ask the Clerk to read the communication I send to his desk.

The Clerk read as follows:

THE COMPTROLLER'S OFFICE, July 15th, 1882.

MY DEAR SIR: I have not been able to see David Taylor this morning, and do not know what disposal he made of my decision. It is too long to copy now, and I am afraid I shall not have time to make his case known to you intelligibly.

David Taylor married a Cherokee female. The State of Tennessee, (I think that was the State,) by legislation compelled an abandonment of her right to a reservation. By the last clause of the thirteenth article of the Cherokee treaty of the 29th of December, 1835, the United States agreed to pay this class of claimants.—(Vol. 7, Indian Treaties, 484.) On the 2d day of July, 1836, Congress made eleven appropriations to carry the Cherokee treaties into effect. They amount to $690,367.—(Vol. 5, pages 72-4.) Neither appropriation is for this class of claims. It was the practice, however, until 1846, to pay this class of claims out of the appropriations mentioned. The Indians complained, and when the treaty of August 6, 1846, was concluded, the United States agreed to refund to the Cherokees what had been thus improperly charged. Albion K. Parris, Second Comptroller, was one of the commissioners, and after the treaty of 1846, he refused to sign any requisition, charging upon the appropriations of July 2d, 1836, the payment of any claim of the class of David Taylor's claim. Betsy McIntosh had a claim of the same kind of David Taylor's, and by a joint resolution of March 14th, 1848, Congress directed it to be paid out of the balance of the appropriation of July 2d, 1836.

This is a legislative construction given by Congress. I labored much in the investigation of these treaties and laws, with the desire to come to the conclusion that David Taylor might, without further legislation, be paid out of the balance of the said appropriations; but I am convinced he cannot be so paid, without violating the Constitution and the laws, unless Congress shall so direct. The balance is not wanted for the purpose for which it was originally appropriated, as other provisions were made under the treaty of 1846. David Taylor has been here a long time, and if you can contribute towards a speedy payment of his claims, you will advance the cause of justice.

I submit the form of an amendment.

Most sincerely, yours,

ELISHA WHITTLESEY.

HON. JAMES L. CONGER,
House of Representatives.

Mr. CONGER. It will be observed that he only doubts as to whether he can pay the claim out of any of the appropriations which were formerly supposed to include everything provided for in the treaty. Upon an examination of the law and treaty referred to, I fully concur with the Comptroller in his construction, that although the claim is embraced in the treaty, that class of claims are not provided for by any one of the specified appropriations. Among the laws of the Twentieth Congress is the case of Betsy Mackintosh, one similar to this. In that case, a resolution was passed authorizing the payment of the amount claimed out of this fund. This is what Mr. Whit-tesey refers to as a legislative construction of the act. There is no doubt with reference to the amount of the claim. He doubts whether he could pay the amount out of these appropriations, and for that reason asks the passage of the amendment I have offered.

The question was taken, and the amendment was agreed to.

Mr. FITCH. I am instructed by the Committee on Indian Affairs to offer the following amendment, to come in after line three hundred and twenty-eight, on page fifteen:

Provided, That all money appropriated by the three foregoing clauses, together with all similar appropriations in 1850 and 1851 for the Eel river Miamies, heretofore withheld from payment, shall be paid to said Eel river Miamies only, and to no other band whatever, or individuals; and that all annuities heretofore due and appropriated to the Eel river Miamies, but erroneously or otherwise paid to the Miami nation, shall be paid to the Eel river Miamies, out of money appropriated in 1851-'52 for payment of annuities to said Miami nation; or, if the Commissioner of Indian Affairs deem it more expedient and just to the Indians, shall be paid, and is hereby appropriated out of the Treasury of the United States, to be repaid to the United States by being withheld from the Miami annuities, in such installments as the Commissioner may deem expedient.

Mr. F. The Eel river Miamies are a small band, and gentlemen of the last Congress will recollect that the existence of the band was questioned by myself. They are in my own vicinity. I then moved a proviso, that the money should not be paid unless to the Eel river Miamies themselves, if such band existed. It was afterwards ascertained that the band was in existence, but that the money due them had been paid for several years to another band of Indians by mistake. The annuities were paid to the Miami nation proper, and not to the Eel river band, to which they were due.

The existence of the band having been satisfactorily ascertained, it is provided by the amendment that the annuities which have hitherto been withheld of 1850 and 1851, shall be paid to that band, and that band only; and further, that the annuities heretofore erroneously paid to the Miamies shall be repaid to the Eel Rivers, either out of the annuities of the Miamies or out of the Treasury, which is subsequently to be reimbursed in installments out of the annuities of the Miamies. The latter course is the one, probably, which the Secretary of the Interior and the Commissioner of Indian Affairs will adopt, because they state—and I have their statement before me, which is somewhat voluminous—that justice to the Eel Rivers demand this money should be paid now, and that if the amount, some $13,000, were to be taken out of one or two annuities of the Miamies, they would be reduced to a sum which would scarcely meet their wants. Hence it is they propose to pay it out of the Treasury, which is to be reimbursed in small installments out of the annuities of the Miamies. The papers in the case are two voluminous to be read under the five minutes, and it is sufficient to say that the matter has been before the Indian Committee two or three times—the present and the last two years, and that in every instance it has met with its approbation. I do not think there can be a shadow of a doubt of the correctness of the amendment.

Mr. HOUSTON. I understand the gentleman to state that the money which ought to have gone to the Eel Rivers has been paid to the Miamies, who were not entitled to it, and that the proposition now is to pay out of the annuities of the Miamies proper, enough to refund what had been taken from the Eel Rivers.

Mr. JOHNSON, of Arkansas. Yes, sir; it is simply to say that not a cent shall come from the Treasury of the United States. It is merely a settlement between a tribe of Indians and a band of that tribe.

The question was then taken, and the amendment was agreed to.

Mr. FITCH. I am instructed by the Committee on Indian Affairs to offer the following amendment, to come in after line three hundred and thirty-seven:

For additional compensation for the sale of their lands in the State of Wisconsin, by treaty of October 18th, 1843, $321,840; the same to be paid in such sums and at such times, with the approbation of such nation, as the President may think most conducive to their prosperity and happiness.

That, the committee will perceive, is the amendment in regard to the Menomonees of which I gave notice some days since. The facts in the case I have already fully set forth to the committee, and if I know anything of the matter—and I have investigated it with some deliberation—set forth correctly. No matter whether it was a mistake or whether it was intentional, they were made to sell five million acres of land for the price of less than two million acres by the terms under which the commissioner was instructed to purchase the land. They were dissatisfied with the terms of the treaty, and they remonstrated against it at the time, and they have continued their remonstrance till this time. The amendment has the recommendation of not only the Indian Bureau and the Secretary of the Interior, but it has the indorsement of the President. It therefore comes before us in a shape which I really think the committee can scarcely question.

Mr. CARTTER. How much money does the amendment involve?

Mr. FITCH. Two hundred and twenty-one thousand eight hundred and forty dollars, the balance due them for the difference between one million and three million twenty-three thousand acres of land.

Mr. HOUSTON. What amount of land does the gentleman propose to pay for by his amendment?

Mr. FITCH. I will state that the map, and the opinion of the Attorney General, which was based upon the map and treaties, gave the Department reason to believe that the Menomonees were possessed of three millions and twenty-three thousand acres of land. That was the amount which the Commissioner was instructed to purchase on certain terms, and which the present Commissioner of Indian Affairs and the Secretary of the Interior think ought to be paid for now. With that amount the Indians will probably be satisfied.

Mr. HOUSTON. Was there any specific amount in the treaty?

Mr. FITCH. There was not.

Mr. HOUSTON. What amount did they suppose they ceded?

Mr. FITCH. They ceded upwards of five millions.

Mr. HOUSTON. What amount did they suppose they were ceding?

Mr. FITCH. They supposed they were ceding 5,000,000 to 7,000,000 acres. Our Government supposed they were buying 3,023,000 acres. The land is not surveyed. I noticed that my friend from Arkansas [Mr. JOHNSON] fell into an error in stating the amount was found to be 5,000,000 acres on being surveyed. It is now being surveyed. The General Land Office, upon a correct estimate, have ascertained the amount to be at least 5,000,000 acres. The Indians have ceded all their land, of whatever amount, but it is thought they will be satisfied if we pay them for what we supposed they were possessed of at the time of the treaty, viz: 3,023,000 acres. We have paid them by the treaty for 1,600,000 acres of it. The balance of the 3,023,800 acres is what we contemplate paying them now.

Mr. HOUSTON. Then I understand we are paying for the difference between 3,023,000 acres and 1,600,000 acres.

Mr. FITCH. Exactly; that is what is asked.

The question then being on Mr. FITCH's amendment—

Mr. KING, of New York, demanded tellers; which were ordered; and Messrs. BRIGGS and MOLONY were appointed.

The question was then taken, and there were—ayes 83, noes 42.

So the amendment was agreed to.

[A message from the Senate, by Mr. MACHEN, its Chief Clerk, was here received, informing the House that the Senate had passed bills of the following titles, viz:

48. An act for the relief of John Devlin;
325. An act for the relief of Samuel W. Chilson;

WEDNESDAY, JULY 21, 1852.

NEW SERIES...No. 116.

House, (No. 207,) "to supply deficiencies in the appropriations for the service of the fiscal year ending June 30, 1852," and ask a conference on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses thereon.]

Mr. JOHNSON, of Arkansas. At the end of line three hundred and sixty-nine, I wish to offer the following amendment:

To defray the expenses of a certain party of Omahas who visited the city of Washington during the months of February and March during the year 1852, the sum of $3,000, or so much thereof as may be necessary to be expended under the direction of the Secretary of the Interior.

The House will recollect, upon my calling their attention to it, that in March last, while these Indians were in this city, a bill was introduced, at the instance of the Indian Bureau and the Secretary of the Interior, on the authority of the Commissioner of Indian Affairs, to defray their expenses. That bill was before the House, and it ought to have passed at once without any dispute; but my friend from Georgia, [Mr. STEPHENS,] not now in his seat, protested, upon a mere formal point, that the bill ought to be printed. I then told him, if he contended for that printing, that there would be nothing to pay the expenses of these Indians, and they would be kept waiting here a month or more longer than was necessary, and at great expense. The House ordered the bill to be laid over for printing, and it did not come back to us in a month. To save the Government from the necessity of the expense that would have resulted from the delay, the Bureau of Indian Affairs put themselves to the great trouble of obtaining time to pay those parties who had claims for the expenses of these Indians while in the city, under the assurance that Congress would assuredly, with its universal practice and precedent heretofore, make the necessary appropriation for the defraying all these expenses. I am instructed by the Committee on Indian Affairs to offer the amendment I have instead of offering a separate bill, as we intended last March. It has been the policy of this Government, from time immemorial, to bring some of the tribes here, that they might attain to some appreciation of the power of the Government, the necessity of their holding themselves in subordination to its laws, and that they might have an idea of their own helplessness if they choose to come in hostile contact with the powers of the Government. Hence it is that the expenses of many of these wild Indians have been paid by the Government, that in making these visits they might see something of the people to whom they were compelled to submit. I will read a precedent which occurred in 1849 to show the difference between that instance and this. It is a joint resolution of the two Houses: "that the sum of $6,000 be and the same is hereby appropriated out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, for the purpose of defraying the expenses of a certain delegation of the Chippewa Indians and their interpreter," &c.

In this case the sum of $6,000 was appropriated for about six or seven who comprised this Indian delegation. But in the case before us, there were nineteen in all, and they were here for weeks, and all the appropriation we have recommended for paying their expenses is the sum of $3,000.

This, sir, it strikes me, makes the amendment itself perfectly clear, and concerning which the House cannot have one momentary doubt.

Mr. HENN. I desire to ask the gentleman from Arkansas, whether there is any objection to paying the expenses of the Indians to this place as well as home again?

Mr. JOHNSON. The gentleman asks me whether there is any objection to paying the expenses of the Indians to this place, as well as while they are here, and home again. I do not feel disposed to say anything in relation to that. But I will say to the House that the party of white men who brought the Indians here, did it without the authority of the Department, and not in accordance with their instructions or the policy of the Government in that particular instance, and therefore it was that they refused to recommend any appropriation at all, by which the expenses of these Indians were to be paid on their way to this place. But when they found that these men would not agree to bear their expenses any further, and that the Indians were to be left in a hopeless condition, the Department recommended this sum to be appropriated to pay their expenses while here, and to enable them to return.

Mr. HENN. I would ask if the same gentlemen who brought them here were not authorized to conduct them home again?

Mr. JOHNSON. The same persons who brought them here did conduct them back again, but with this understanding on the part of the Department, that they would not recommend the appropriation of one cent to defray their expenses while coming here; their expenses while they were here, and for their return home, were all the Department recommended to be appropriated for.

Mr. HENN. At the request of the gentleman from New York, [Mr. How,] who is now absent, and whose constituents have contributed to pay the expenses of these Indians through New York, and for the purpose of paying a just debt due to the conductors for their own services, and for their expenses from the Indian country to this city, I offer this amendment, as a substitute to that offered by the Committee on Indian Affairs:

That a sum not exceeding $7,000 be, and the same is hereby, appropriated for the expenses of the Omaha Indians, and their conductors on their journey to, from, and at the city of Washington, during the past winter, and that the Secretary of the Interior be directed to cause to be audited and paid out of the sum hereby appropriated such sum of money as may be due for such expenses.

I wish to remark that this does not cover the whole sum claimed, but I believe it will cover all that is justly due and ought to be paid them.

Mr. JOHNSON. I ask what is the amount asked for by the amendment to the amendment?

Mr. HENN. Seven thousand dollars.

Mr. JOHNSON. Then it is to increase the appropriation from $3,000 to $7,000. Well, sir, the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. HENN] has stated the grounds upon which he offers this amendment. It is for the House to decide whether they will pass it. I have stated that it is not recommended by the Department. If the House choose to adopt the amendment, I have no objection. But I wish it understood that it is not at my instance.

Mr. CAMPBELL, of Illinois. I am opposed to this amendment. I am opposed to the policy, if there is a policy about it, of bringing these Indians here at all, whether by individuals or by the Commissioner, or whether the Department order them here. It is to no purpose. They derive no benefit from it. It is a matter of speculation, wholly and entirely. The idea of giving the Indians a knowledge of the power of this Government by bringing them here is fallacious in the extreme. To illustrate it, a gentleman told me that after the Indians had been here for some time, and had an opportunity to examine into the power of this Government, he asked one of them what he thought of it. The reply was, that they had a medicine man at home who could kill the whole of them. This is the kind of knowledge they receive of the power of this Government.

I desire to know what authority this party of men had to bring these Indians here? The gentleman from Arkansas has just told us that the Department gave them no such authority. Upon what authority, then, do they come here and claim compensation for bringing these Indians here? Has any set of men the right to bring a party of Indians here to dance and whoop around the city, and then receive pay from the Government for it? I protest against claims of that character. Upon the ground stated by the gentleman from Arkansas—that they were brought here, and were about to be abandoned—it was the duty of the Government then, as an act of humanity, to pay their expenses and return them home; but I will not give the persons who brought them here a premium for doing an unauthorized act.

Mr. HENN. I wish to inquire of the gentleman from Arkansas whether the Government did not find, on consultation with these Indians, that they had violated their treaty with the Indians; and therefore the Indians had just cause to come here and enter their claims against the Government for that violation?

Mr. JOHNSON. I have never examined into the matter of which the gentleman speaks, particularly. There may have been grounds of complaint upon the part of these Indians, or a portion, of the action of the Government towards them, but that does not clear up this matter so as to make it an authorized proceeding upon the part of these white persons who brought them here, as the Department alleges, upon their own hook—to speak in the ordinary language. It was not in accordance with the desire or policy or instructions of the Government at that time that they should be brought here; but it was in accordance with humanity and right that, after they had been brought here, and had no means of living here, nor of returning home, that they should be enabled to return home, and that the Government should bear their expenses.

The question was then taken, and the amendment to the amendment was not agreed to.

Mr. JOHNSON. I now ask that the question may be taken upon my amendment to pay their expenses while here, and to enable them to return home.

The question was taken, and the amendment was agreed to.

Mr. JOHNSON. To the section of the bill referring to the Shawnees, I offer, under the instructions of the Committee on Indian Affairs, the following amendment:

For payment to the Shawnees of moneys due them under and by the treaties of the 7th of November, 1825, and the 8th of August, 1831, between the United States and the two divisions of said tribe of Indians, the same being the net balance received into the Treasury for the sale of their lands in Ohio, $66,246 33: Provided, however, That said tribe of Indians shall first express their assent that the payment of the above sum shall be made equally to the whole tribe rather than to either division thereof.

That is an amendment which restores to the whole tribe what is due to them under a very strange and extraordinary state of case. The Government of the United States bought out one half of the tribe of its lands, for which it stipulated to furnish lands for the whole tribe, and give them a fee-simple title for the same. The Government then bought out the lands of the second portion of the tribe, amounting to some ninety-odd thousand acres, for which they were to give the Indians one hundred thousand acres of the land they had already sold to the first portion of the tribe, and which was already theirs by absolute treaty stipulations with a fee-simple title and a patent therefor. So the consideration for which the sale was made by the second portion of the tribe—those who lived in Ohio—was lands which the United States had previously sold, and to which they were consequently unable to give any title at all. That is the amendment, and it stands as one of the clearest of cases. I offer it with the proviso, because if the money is paid to the first division of the tribe—those from Missouri, who furnished the original consideration for the land—it would create a distinction in the tribe who are now living together like a band of brothers. The committee, therefore, came to the conclusion that it should be given to the whole tribe alike.

I have explained this case without going into minutiae, because I gave a full and distinct explanation of it in my remarks on this bill before the debate was closed. Every one then expressed entire satisfaction as to the matter, and a conviction that it was but simple justice. Under the instructions of the Committee on Indian Affairs, I have so drawn the amendment that the money shall not be paid to either branch of the tribe, but to the whole tribe. It is quite clear, and beyond dispute, from all the facts of the case, that we owe this given amount. The only question is, to whom we owe it? Singularly enough, we owe it equitably to one half the tribe, and legally to the other. But as they are a band of people among the first of the Indian tribes in point of intelligence and civilization, and as the two branches of the tribe have intermarried and live together like brothers, supporting themselves by agriculture, so that they will have no disposition to dispute among themselves, the committee have instructed me to put in a provision that the money shall be paid to the whole tribe, and that it shall not be paid at all until they assent to its being paid in that way. If we pay it to one branch of the tribe or to the other, we shall have to pay it over again; and as we owe but one debt, we want to pay but one. The object of the proviso to the amendment is to prevent our ever being called upon to pay the debt again.

Mr. CARTTER. This amendment proposes to pay a given amount of money, does it not?

Mr. JOHNSON. Yes, sir, $66,246 33, or seventy-one cents an acre for the land.

Mr. CARTTER. And this is in lieu of one hundred thousand acres of land?

Mr. JOHNSON. Yes, sir, land which we proposed to sell them, but which had been sold before; and they claim to have this money refunded, deducting the cost of surveys and improvements, and everything in our favor, and leaving the amount of only seventy-one cents an acre. We owe them this money by every law, equitable or legal, that was ever brought to bear on a civilized community.

The question was then taken on the amendment, and it was agreed to.

Mr. JOHNSON, of Arkansas, moved to amend the clause in reference to the Winnebagoes, by adding thereto the following:

For the payment of reasonable compensation for traveling, transportation, and subsistence of A. M. Mitchell and posse of citizens, of Minnesota Territory, summoned by him, when marshal of said Territory, and engaged in the suppression of Indian disturbances in said Territory, about the 30th of June, 1850, their accounts to be settled and payment made under the orders and direction of the Secretary of the Interior, $1,600.

Mr. J. said: I will state that this amendment was offered by me, under instructions from the Committee on Indian Affairs, to the Indian appropriation bill of the last session of Congress.

Mr. HOUSTON. And was ruled out of order. Mr. JOHNSON. No, sir; it was not ruled out of order; and I will mention the peculiar circumstances under which this amendment failed to become a portion of the regular Indian appropriation bill of the last session of Congress, for it may be of some interest to new members to know how entirely a dead failure can be brought upon them at an unexpected moment. I offered this amendment in Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union; and, as the chairman of the Ways and Means, the gentleman from Virginia, [Mr. BAYLY,] was very anxious that we should get on with the bill, and as they had commenced reading the bill for the purpose of reporting it back to the House, says he, "Just wait, Johnson; I'll offer that amendment myself as soon as we get into the House; and, if I offer it, it will certainly pass." Says I, "Certainly, sir; I'll do so;" and I withdrew the amendment. Well, as soon as we got into the House, up jumps the chairman and calls the previous question on the bill. I remonstrated, and said I did not think it fair. Says he, "I take 'back the call for the previous question, and I now offer this amendment for the gentleman from Arkansas, and ask that it may be put in the bill and 'passed.'" Just at this point another gentleman got up, "I rise to a point of order." "The SPEAKER. The gentleman will state his point of order." Says he: "I make this point of order: 'That no section can pass making an appropriation of money without being first considered in Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union.'" The Chair sustains the point of order; Mr. Johnson must take his seat; and the chairman of the Ways and Means calls the previous question on the bill. That is the way my amendment went down. It ought to have been passed at that time. It was one of those nice little interludes in which a man thinks he has a head on his shoulders, but finds, when he comes to look at himself, that he has none at all. I now ask, as an explanation to the committee of the circumstances out of which this claim grew, that the Clerk will read the statement from the Bureau of Indian Affairs.

Several MEMBERS. It is not necessary.

Mr. JOHNSON. Very well, sir; if the committee is satisfied, I will not have it read.

The question was then taken on the amendment, and it was agreed to.

Mr. JOHNSON offered the following amendment, to come in at the end of the bill:

For payment to the heirs of Cyrus Choiche, the balance due for services rendered by him as acting Indian agent in New Mexico, from the 9th of December, 1849, to the 14th of September, 1850, at the rate of $1,550 per annum $1,137 76.

The Clerk read a letter from the Secretary of the Interior, explaining and recommending the appropriation.

The question was then taken on the amendment, and it was agreed to.

Mr. JOHNSON. I now offer the following amendment, to come in at the end of the bill:

For payment to Presha Bedwell, (formerly Presha Foreman,) being the amount of an award by the Cherokee commissioners in her favor, which was erroneously paid by a former Cherokee agent to some one who personated the proper claimant, the sum of $464.

It is satisfactorily established that a former agent of the Cherokees made the payment to another person, and that this amount of $464 due to Presha Bedwell never has been paid. It is included in the regular estimates, and was presented by me under the instruction of the Committee on Indian Affairs, as an amendment to the deficiency bill. A point of order was made upon it, and overruled; but at the same time the House—many members not voting at all—voted down the amendment, on the ground which was taken in contesting it—that the deficiency bill was not the right place for it, and that it ought to go into this bill. I am now instructed by the committee to offer it as an amendment to this bill. This item, and two other small items which I shall offer when this is disposed of, are thus referred to in the estimates of the Department: "The several sums are required to correct errors committed by the United States Cherokee commissioners in their awards, and by the Indian agent in his payment under those awards." I hope the amendment will be adopted.

The question was then taken on the amendment, and it was agreed to.

Mr. JOHNSON. I offer the following amendment, which I send to the Clerk's table:

The amendment was read as follows:

For payment to Horseyly, being the amount of an award by the first board of Cherokee commissioners (less the sum of six dollars allowed as fee to the attorney) for an improvement belonging to Tianey, the deceased wife of Horseyly, improperly valued and paid for to Tawney, of the same town, in the country east, the sum of $54.

Mr. BELL. I rise, not under the name of opposing this amendment, but to make an inquiry of the Committee of Ways and Means. Most of us who vote here, or at least many of us, vote without understanding whether these amendments are right or wrong. I take it for granted, however, that these amendments are all right, otherwise the chairman of the committee, as well as other members of the committee, who must necessarily understand the application of these amendments, would inform us.

Mr. HOUSTON. The amendments which have been offered, with one exception, before these small ones, which are now up, as was stated by the gentleman from Missouri, [Mr. PHELPS,] on yesterday, were wholly new to the Committee of Ways and Means, as they are new to every member of this House. Nothing touching or relating to them, in any way, has ever been referred to us, with probably one exception, or to any committee. It is impossible for me, then, to know anything more about them than the gentleman from Ohio, [Mr. BELL,] or any other gentleman. That is the reason why nothing was said in regard to these claims passing this morning. It would be impossible for us to investigate them, unless communications had been made to us, or made public, so as to reach the Committee of Ways and Means, either by reference, or by being amongst the public documents. There are one or two exceptions, as I have stated.

These claims now being proposed involve, as the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. BELL] must see, issues of fact. They depend upon the truth of the statement, as set forth by the Commissioner of the Indian Bureau, that the parties were personified, and the money paid to wrong persons. Those facts are such as have never been acted upon by the Committee of Ways and Means. They were excluded from the deficiency bill upon grounds stated by the gentleman from Arkansas, [Mr. JOHNSON.] These cases, in my opinion, should not go into this bill, not because they have no merits, for that I have not examined into, but because I regard them as private claims, which ought to have been examined into and reported, either for or against, by the Committee on Indian Affairs. I do not think it proper, however, to make that point of order in reference to them, as I do not know the claims to be unjust, and since, taking as correct the statement of the gentleman who has examined them, the Commissioner of Indian Affairs, the facts are in favor of the claimants.

Mr. BELL. I have but a word, then, to say. Without any hostility to the merits of these claims, as I do not know what merits they may possess, I shall be under the necessity of voting against them, from the fact that they have not been presented to a committee, as they properly should have been.

Mr. HOUSTON. The gentleman from Ohio is mistaken about these claims. They were presented to a committee, and were before the Committee of Ways and Means, as he will find by document No. 30. I will read the language of it:

"For payment to Presha Bedwell, (formerly Presha Foreman,) being the amount of an award by the Cherokee commissioners in her favor, which was erroneously paid by a former Cherokee agent to some one who personated the proper claimant, $464.

"For payment to Horseyly, being the amount of an award by the first board of Cherokee commissioners (less the sum of six dollars allowed as fee to the attorney) for an improvement belonging to Tianey, the deceased wife of Horseyly, improperly valued and paid for to Tawney, of the same town, in the country east, $54.

"For payment to Se-ka-wee, a Cherokee, only heir of Woo-te-ti-eh, deceased, for an improvement in Turkeytown valley, Alabama, which was improperly valued and paid for to Rachael Bright, a white woman, the said Woo-te-ti-eh, deceased, being the rightful owner, $166 50."

These are the amendments now proposed, and the explanations of them is found in the same document, two or three pages further on, and is in these words:

"Nos. 3, 4, and 5. As expressed in the items, the several sums are required to correct errors committed by the United States Cherokee commissioners in their awards, and by the Indian agent in his payments under those awards."

Mr. BELL. I understand all these claims have been paid once.

Mr. HOUSTON. They have, by the Government.

Mr. BELL. And now we are asked to pay them a second time. I hold that such an application should be made through a proper committee, and—

Mr. JOHNSON, of Arkansas. They have never been paid; I dispute it; they have never been paid. Why, sir, if the Government has paid the money to parties not entitled to it, do you call that payment? And will you refuse the just debts of the Government because they have once paid it in their own wrong?—because they have made a false payment?

Mr. BELL. I understand that. Money from the Treasury of the United States has been paid out, and by the agents of this Government. They may have paid it to improper persons. I do not doubt the view the gentleman takes of it, but I want the application to come through the proper channel—through a committee who can examine it in their room.

Mr. JOHNSON. I will ask the gentleman from Ohio, if he will allow me to interrupt him, whether or not the Committee on Indian Affairs, to whom it was specially referred, and by them examined and reported upon, is not a proper channel of communication?

Mr. BELL. I do not doubt that.

The question was then taken on the amendment, and it was agreed to.

Mr. JOHNSON. I offer another amendment. It is for money mispaid, or in other words never paid at all.

The amendment was then read, as follows:

For payment to Se-ka-wee, a Cherokee, only heir of Woo-te-ti-eh, deceased, for an improvement in Turkeytown valley, Alabama, which was improperly valued and paid for to Rachael Bright, a white woman, the said Woo-te-ti-eh, deceased, being the rightful owner, $166 50.

The question was then taken on the amendment, and it was agreed to.

Mr. HOUSTON. I move that the committee rise and report the bill to the House, with the amendments.

The question was taken, and the motion was agreed to.

The committee accordingly rose, and the Speaker having resumed the chair, the chairman of the committee reported, that the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union had, according to order, had the state of the Union generally under consideration, and particularly the bill of the House (No. 43) "making appropriation for the current and contingent expenses of the Indian Department, and for fulfilling treaty stipulations with various Indian tribes, for the year ending June 30th, 1853," and had directed him to report the same back with sundry amendments.

Mr. HOUSTON. I call for the previous question upon the bill and amendments.

The previous question received a second, and the main question was ordered to be put.

Mr. HOUSTON. I suppose the House do not care about having all the amendments read. If no one calls for the reading of them, let us take a vote upon them altogether, except those singled out, and upon which a separate vote is desired.

The SPEAKER. According to the usual practice, unless objected to, the Clerk will read the amendments. If any gentleman desires a separate vote upon any one of them he will signify it.

Exception was taken to but two amendments.

The question was then taken upon all the amendments reported from the committee, except the eighth and eleventh, and they were concurred in.

Amendment No. 8, upon which a separate vote was asked, was read as follows:

"For liquidating the balance found due to the Creek Indians for losses sustained during the last war with Great Britain by that portion of the tribe that was friendly to and co-operated with the United States, in accordance with the promise of the Government, $110,417 90, to be paid by the United States agent for the Creek Indians to individuals now living, and the legal representatives of those deceased who are entitled to receive the same."

Mr. DANIEL. I call for the yeas and nays upon that amendment, and also demand tellers upon the yeas and nays.

Tellers upon the yeas and nays, and also the yeas and nays were refused.

The question was then taken upon the adoption of the amendment, and there were upon a division—ayes 74, noes 36; no quorum voting.

Mr. HAMILTON. I ask for tellers on the amendment.

Tellers were ordered, and Messrs. HAMILTON and CHANDLER were appointed.

The question was then taken on the amendment, and the tellers reported—ayes 85, noes 39.

So the amendment was adopted.

The next amendment which was reported as an addition to the clause making appropriation for the Menomonee Indians, and upon which a separate vote was requested, was then read as follows:

"For additional compensation for the sale of their lands in the State of Arkansas by the treaty of October 18, 1846, $221,840; the same to be paid in such sums and at such times, with the approbation of said nation, as the President may think most conducive to their prosperity and happiness."

Mr. KING, of New York. I ask for the yeas and nays upon that amendment.

The yeas and nays were not ordered.

The question was then taken, and the amendment was agreed to.

The bill was then ordered to be engrossed and read a third time.

The SPEAKER. When is it the pleasure of the House to have the bill read a third time?

[Cries all over the Hall of "Now!" "Now!"]

The bill was then read a third time.

Mr. HOUSTON. I call for the previous question upon the passage of the bill.

The call for the previous question was seconded, and the main question was ordered to be put.

The question was then taken, and the bill was passed.

DEFICIENCY BILL.

Mr. JONES, of Tennessee. I ask that the House bill, by unanimous consent, permit the deficiency bill, which has been returned to us from the Senate with a disagreeing vote between the two Houses upon a solitary item, to be taken up, that the House will insist upon its non-concurrence with the amendment of the Senate, and that a committee of conference be appointed, as asked for on their part.

There was no objection, and the bill was taken up.

Mr. JONES. I move that the House insist upon its non-concurrence in the amendment of the Senate, and that a committee of conference be appointed by the Speaker.

Mr. STANLY. I hope the House will recede from their disagreement.

Mr. JONES. If the gentleman will permit me I will state, that his motion to recede will take precedence of the one to ask for a committee of conference.

Mr. STANLY. I want to get the House out of a difficulty, which I think they have got into by accident. I am satisfied the House acted under a mistake in voting against that appropriation the other day. There was some discussion about the constructive mileage after the adjournment of last Congress, and many members thought they were voting upon that. That is not the fact, but if it were so, it would not alter my opinion. This is an appropriation of $50,000, to supply an existing deficiency—to pay the mileage and per diem of members of the Senate and the House.

Now, if the Senate have done anything which this body does not approve, this is not the place for us to arraign them, and I hope we will not set an example of finding fault with any conduct of theirs. If we do so, we will injure ourselves in the public estimation, and confer no great honor upon republican government itself. The question whether that honorable body has done anything wrong, I do not intend to discuss, whatever my individual opinions may be. Leave them to the tribunal of public opinion. That is the bar before which they are to be tried, as well as ourselves; and I ask the House—I implore them—not to get into a contest with the Senate about their application of their fund in whatever way they may choose to.

Mr. JOHNSON, of Tennessee. For the purpose of being informed correctly upon the subject, and for the purpose of the country being correctly informed upon the subject, I wish to ask the gentleman from North Carolina whether some $40,000 or $41,000 of the $50,000 appropriation is not to pay constructive mileage of the Senate? It makes no difference what we may do hereafter, the facts ought to be known to the country, and for what this $50,000 is to be paid. Is not this appropriation to supply a deficiency created by the payment of that constructive mileage?

Mr. STANLY. I do not know, but I understand not. I heard so from some incidental debate in the Senate; but whether it is so or not the constructive mileage has been taken by those who thought they were entitled to it.

Mr. HOUSTON. With the permission of the gentleman, I will state that this is for the regular per diem and mileage. The constructive mileage has been paid long since.

Mr. JONES, of Tennessee. If I understand this question at all it is this: At the last session of Congress we appropriated, upon the estimate of the Secretary of the Senate, $186,000, and upon the estimate of the Sergeant-at-Arms of this House, a sum sufficient to make that up to $835,040. Out of that the Secretary of the Senate drew from the Treasury $190,040, and he had an unexpended balance of appropriation in his hands of $12,000, making $202,000 in round numbers. The last Executive session was convened on the 4th of March, 1851, and lasted some ten days. For that session most of the Senators took constructive mileage, for which no estimate had ever been made or appropriation passed by Congress; but the appropriation having been made for the fiscal year which commenced upon the first day of July, 1851, they took the necessary amount to pay constructive mileage out of the appropriation of that year, and, consequently, left a large deficiency—not this entire $50,000, but somewhere over $40,000. The entire constructive mileage of all the Senators, if taken at that extra session, would, according to a statement of the Secretary of the Senate, be a little over $48,000. There is between $6,000 and $7,000, which, I understand, has not been drawn by Senators, and which it is probable will not be drawn, which would make some $41,000 paid out that session for constructive mileage. Then, sir, the payment of that amount out of the appropriation leaves a deficiency at the present session of the Senate, in the fund for the pay of the mileage and per diem of Senators, which was originally estimated for by the Secretary of the Senate and appropriated by Congress.

Mr. HOUSTON. With the permission of the gentleman, I will correct him in his statement. It must be remembered—and I know the gentleman will so soon as I allude to it—that a good many of the Senators were new Senators, who were entitled to their mileage. They took their seats at that session for the first time. I do not know the particular number, but there were certainly some three or four.

A VOICE. Some six or seven.

Mr. HOUSTON. I am informed by a gentleman near me there were six or seven. Their mileage will make a considerable portion of this amount.

Mr. JONES. That may be all right. I do not know how many there were, but the difference between the constructive mileage and the $50,000 is made up by the difference of mileage voted to the California Senators and other new Senators which have come in.

Mr. CLINGMAN. I want to see whether I understand the gentleman's point correctly. This appropriation is to pay the regular per diem and mileage of the present Senators; but I understand if some money had not been applied in a different way, it might have been unnecessary; but it seems to me, taking it to be true that the Senate wasted money at a former session, there is no reason why they should not have the money that is due to these individuals—perhaps a different set of individuals. We cannot, upon the ground they have misapplied money formerly, refuse the usual and proper appropriation now.

Mr. JONES. The facts are before the House. I cannot myself vote for the appropriation.

Mr. FITCH. With the gentleman's permission. No matter what our opposition to this constructive mileage may be, Mr. Speaker—and past action has shown mine to be earnest—our refusal to concur in the amendment of the Senate to this deficiency bill will not reach the point. They have the money, and we have no power to make them give it up, had we the disposition to do so. The deficiency is not in the Senate mileage and per diem simply. It is in a fund for mileage and per diem of Senate and House both. The appropriation for that purpose will be exhausted early in August; and surely the House cannot intend, by its present action, to say it will refuse to make the necessary appropriation for the purpose of supplying a deficiency for its own pay and mileage.

Mr. JONES, of Tennessee. There is not one dollar estimated for by this House.

Mr. FITCH. The Sergeant-at-Arms assured me, that early in August the fund will expire, and I presume he did it with the data before him. Some time in August, then, there will be no fund for the payment of the per diem and mileage of members of the House, and merely for the purpose of showing our hostility to an act of the Senate, which we have not the power to go behind or remedy, we propose a course of action which, if we are consistent, must lead us to refuse an appropriation for our own pay. If the Senate has misapplied their funds, they alone are responsible, not the House. We find only before us the fact that a deficiency in a joint fund exists. Those who now vote against supplying it, would probably be the first to complain, if, in August, when the Sergeant-at-Arms has no money to pay them, the Senate should refuse to supply the deficiency for that purpose.

Mr. STANLY. I trust we will pursue the course that we will be satisfied with on calm reflection. One reason why we should avoid a collision with the Senate, was suggested by a gentleman near me, one of the first members of the House in intelligence, character, and length of service. Suppose the Senate should object to any appropriation to us for books, or for anything else. We would be brought into collision with that body, which would tend to our mutual discredit before the American people. If they have done anything wrong, let them be amenable to public opinion, and let us take care of our own conduct. Our only right course is, to act as gentlemen, and as members of the House. I move that the House recede from its disagreement to the Senate's amendment, and upon that question call for the previous question.

The previous question was seconded, and the main question ordered.

Mr. JONES, of Tennessee, demanded the yeas and nays.

Mr. CHANDLER demanded tellers on the yeas and nays; which were ordered.

The House was then divided, Messrs. HAMILTON and CHANDLER acting as tellers, and there were—ayes 32, noes not counted.

So the yeas and nays were ordered.

The question was then taken, and there were—yeas 70, nays 50; as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Abercrombie, Willis Allen, Allison, W. Appleton, Babcock, Barre, Bissell, Bowie, Briggs, G. H. Brown, Burt, Caldwell, L. D. Campbell, T. Campbell, Carter, Chandler, Chapman, Clingman, Cobb, Conger, George T. Davis, Dawson, Doty, Duncan, Fitch, Florence, Fowler, Gamble, Goodrich, Gorman, Harper, Haws, Hendricks, Holladay, Horsford, Houston, Howard, Thomas M. Howe, Jackson, John Johnson, Robert W. Johnson, George G. King, Landry, Lockhart, Martin, Meade, Miller, Millson, Miner, John Moore, Nabers, Orr, Samuel W. Parker, Peaslee, Phelps, Porter, Rantoul, Reed, Schermerhorn, David L. Seymour, Stanley, Frederick P. Stanton, St. Martin, Strother, Sutherland, Taylor, Thurston, Ward, Welch, and Williams—70.

NAYS—Messrs. Aiken, Averett, Bell, Bibbhaugh, Brenton, Buell, Joseph Cable, Chastain, Churchwell, Daniel, John G. Davis, Dean, Dinwiddie, Eastman, Ficklin, Floyd, Gaylord, Giddings, Jenkins, Andrew Johnson, Daniel T. Jones, George W. Jones, Preston King, Mace, Mann, Humphrey Marshall, McLanahan, McMullin, McNair, Molony, Murphy, Murray, Newton, Andrew Parker, Perkins, Robbins, Robie, Skelton, Smart, Benjamin Stanton, Townshend, Walbridge, Watkins, and Wildrick—50.

So the House agreed to recede from their amendment.

Mr. FOWLER. I ask the unanimous consent of the House to offer the following resolution. I presume that no objection will be made:

Resolved, That the Clerk of the House of Representatives furnish and deliver to each of the members and Delegates of the House of the present Congress, who have not already received them, and pay for the same out of the contingent funds of the House, such books as have been furnished to the members of the Twenty-eighth, Twenty-ninth, Thirtieth, and Thirty-first Congresses: Provided, That this shall not authorize the reprinting of any of said books: And provided further, That no work thus authorized to be furnished shall be obtained or delivered by the Clerk, unless he shall be able to procure a sufficient number of copies thereof to furnish a complete set to each member and Delegate entitled thereto.

Several MEMBERS. I object. I object. I object.

Mr. FOWLER. I move a suspension of the rules. It is the usual resolution, and designed to furnish the new members of the House with the same books that the old members have already received.

Mr. JOHNSON, of Tennessee. I move an adjournment.

Mr. FOWLER. If we adjourn now will this be the first business next Monday?

The SPEAKER. It will come up first in order after the morning hour.

The question being upon the suspension of the rules,

Mr. KING, of New York, demanded the yeas and nays; which were not ordered.

Mr. ORR. I understood the Chair to say that this question would come up first in order next Monday.

The SPEAKER. The Chair decides that it will be first in order after the morning hour next Monday.

Mr. ORR. The yeas and nays having been refused, I move that the House adjourn.

The question was then taken upon Mr. ORR's motion, and there were—ayes 43, noes not counted.

Mr. ORR. Before the result is announced I withdraw my motion.

The question was then taken upon Mr. FOWLER's motion, and there were—ayes 75, noes 18; no quorum voting.

Upon motion by Mr. JOHNSON, of Tennessee, the House then adjourned till to-morrow at eleven o'clock, a. m.

PETITIONS, &c.

The following petitions, memorials, &c., were presented under the rule, and referred to the appropriate committees:

By Mr. BAILEY, of Georgia: The petition of Elizabeth Bankstone, for pension due her deceased husband for revolutionary services.

By Mr. BROWN, of Mississippi: The petition of A. E. Lewis and others, praying for an appropriation of $50,000 to remove obstructions from the mouth of the Pascagoula river, in the State of Mississippi.

By Mr. TAYLOR: The petition of the Mayor and City Council of the city of Chillicothe, in the county of Ross, in the State of Ohio, praying Congress to donate to the said city all the land formerly occupied by the old channel of the Scioto river, now vacant, and adjoining that city.

Also, the petition of Abner Wesson and 85 others, citizens of Ross county and the vicinity, in the State of Ohio, praying Congress to pass the bill introduced in the House of Representatives by the Hon. EDWARD STANLEY, entitled "A bill to authorize the Secretary of the Treasury to deposit with the several States the fourth installment of the deposits of the public money, directed to be made with said States, by the act approved June 23, 1836."

By Mr. FLORENCE: Memorial from Colonel William F. Small, of Philadelphia, tendering the service of a regiment of volunteers for the defense of the eastern frontier of California.

By Mr. MILLER: The petition from sundry citizens of Missouri, praying for the establishment of a mail route from Bloomington to Brunswick, Missouri.

By Mr. CHANDLER: Memorial of A. Groves, jun., George Cadwalader, and many other citizens of Philadelphia, concerned in steam navigation, remonstrating against an early passage of Senate bill No. 223.

IN SENATE.

TUESDAY, July 20, 1852.

Prayer by the Rev. LITTLETON F. MORGAN.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore laid before the Senate a petition of citizens of Green county, Alabama, praying that the bill now pending before Congress, known as the "homestead bill," may become a law; which was referred to the Committee on Public Lands.

Mr. CLARKE presented a memorial of underwriters, merchants, and others, citizens of Providence, Rhode Island, praying that the salary of the United States district judge for the southern district of Florida may be increased; which was referred to the Committee on the Judiciary.

Mr. RUSK presented the memorial of Francis Bouyng, praying an appropriation to enable him to introduce into, and cultivate in, the United States, the tea, indigo, coffee, and other tropical plants and fruits; which was referred to the Committee on Agriculture.

Mr. WELLER presented the petition of Elias Waldon, praying remuneration for expenses incurred in relieving destitute emigrants on the route to California; which was referred to the Committee on Claims.

Mr. FISH presented two petitions of citizens of the State of New York, praying that the bill now pending before Congress, known as the "homestead bill," may become a law; which were referred to the Committee on Public Lands.

Also, a memorial of the Common Council of the city of Brooklyn, New York, in favor of the establishment of the line of steamers between that city and Gluckstadt, in Holstein, proposed by Christian Hansen; which was referred to the Committee on the Post Office and Post Roads.

Also, a memorial of merchants of New York and Boston, asking for the recognition of the independence of Hayti by the Government of the United States; which was referred to the Committee on Foreign Relations.

Mr. TOUCEY presented a memorial of underwriters, merchants, and others, citizens of Connecticut, praying that the salary of the United States district judge for the southern district of Florida may be increased; which was ordered to lie on the table.

Mr. MORTON presented the petition of Buckingham Smith, late Secretary of Legation of the United States in Mexico, praying compensation as Chargé d'Affaires during the time he acted in that capacity; which was referred to the Committee on Foreign Relations.

Mr. ATCHISON presented the memorial of M. M. Marnaduke and others, praying indemnity for depredations by the Indians; which was referred to the Committee on Indian Affairs.

Mr. SEWARD presented the petition of H. H. Jones, and other citizens of New York; the petition of A. R. Plumley and other citizens of New York; the petition of John D. McGregor, and other citizens of New York; the petition of Joseph G. Carman and others, citizens of New York; the petition of Samuel Smith, and other citizens of New York; the petition of J. B. McCawley, and other citizens of New York; the petition of George L. Fox, and other citizens of New York; the petition of Thomas William Wood, and other citizens of New York; the petition of William Adams, and other citizens of New York; the petition of Charles J. Miller, and other citizens of New York; and the petition of Judge Meigs, Comptroller, the Mayor, and other citizens of New York city, in favor of extending Uri Emmons's patent for a planing machine, dated April 25, 1829; which were referred to the Committee on Patents and the Patent Office.

Mr. CASS presented the petition of John Hamm and other inhabitants of Muskingum county, Ohio, praying Congress to establish the bridges of the Wheeling and Belmont Bridge Company as post routes, and that the company have and retain all the powers, rights, and privileges granted to them by the Legislatures of Virginia and Ohio; which was referred to the Committee on the Judiciary.

REPORTS FROM STANDING COMMITTEES.

Mr. MASON, from the Committee on Foreign Relations, to which was referred a message from the President of the United States, with papers in relation to the claim of Samuel A. Belden & Co., against the Government of Mexico, asked to be discharged from the further consideration thereof; which was agreed to.

Mr. MASON submitted a report on the subject; which was ordered to be printed.

Mr. WALKER, from the Committee on Revolutionary Claims, to which was referred the memorial of William Reily, deceased, late a captain in the fourth Maryland regiment of the revolutionary army, submitted a report accompanied by a bill for the relief of the widow of the late Captain Reily. The bill was read and passed to the second reading. The report was ordered to be printed.

Mr. DOWNS. I am directed by the Committee on Private Land Claims, to which was referred the memorial of James H. Rhinehart and others, to ask to be discharged from its further consideration. In presenting this report, I have a brief explanation which I wish to make. The memorial, among other things, remonstrates against a certain bill which the memorialists represent has passed the Senate, which Mr. Rhinehart and the other memorialists contend does injustice to them. I wish to state that the memorialists are entirely mistaken. These parties are claimants to lands situated on the Maison Rouge grant. Richard King, for whose relief a bill has been passed, which bill, it is alleged, does injustice to Mr. Rhinehart, presented a memorial early in the session, asking that he be allowed to enter, by way of preemption, certain lands in the Maison Rouge grant, which he had not cultivated or inhabited, and the same which is claimed by the memorialists. In the same petition he requested to be confirmed in another tract of land, which was ceded to him by the person to whom it was granted, for making a road through the Maison Rouge claim. The Committee on Private Land Claims reported distinctly and emphatically against his first claim. They could not allow him a preemption for land which he had never cultivated, because that was not contemplated, and it would do injustice to other settlers. The committee did report a bill in his favor, confirming his title to two hundred and forty arpents of land for making the road. These parties seem to have misunderstood the object of that bill. They have supposed that it confirms Mr. King's claim to land which he had never cultivated, and which interfered with them. To remove all doubt on the subject, I will read the report which was made by the committee on the subject, which refers to the identical land, section thirteen, township nineteen, referred to in this memorial. In February last, I made the following report:

"The petitioner had two objects, distinct and unconnected, and differing in their nature. First, the petitioner prays that he may be allowed to enter, by way of preemption, a certain tract of land adjoining his plantation in the Maison Rouge grant, though his case does not come within the provisions of the act of 1841, granting preemption to certain purchasers and settlers on said grant; this the committee are of opinion ought not to be granted, because other persons claim the same land by right of settlement, and also by State location, and it would be incompetent and unusual, and improper for Congress to interfere in such cases, and accordingly recommend the rejection of this part of the petition.

"Secondly, the petitioner prays that his title may be confirmed to a tract of land conveyed to one B. Bailly in 1818, for cutting through the Maison Rouge grant a public road, by the person who then claimed the said grant. In Louisiana, by the laws in existence under the former as well as the present State government, owners of land fronting on navigable streams were required to make and keep in repair a public road along the bank of the river. In compliance with this law, the claimant of this grant, which extended some forty miles on both banks of the Ouachita river, employed a man to cut the road, and gave him in payment two tracts of land in this grant, one on each side of the river, of two hundred and forty arpents each, of which the land here claimed was one. The road there cut through a new, unsettled, and heavily-timbered country, ever since mail routes were established in that quarter of the country. The committee are of opinion that under the circumstances the petitioner has an equitable claim to have this small tract confirmed to him, and report a bill accordingly and recommend its passage."

Here is the bill which was passed by the Senate sometime ago:

"Be it enacted by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled, That Richard King be, and he is hereby, confirmed in his title to two hundred and forty arpents of land on the eastern bank of the Ouachita river, in the parish of Caldwell, State of Louisiana, which was conveyed by the claimant of the Maison Rouge grant to Bagwell Bailly in eighteen hundred and eighteen, for cutting a road through said grant, and has remained in the possession of, and in cultivation by, said Bailly and his successors to the present time, and is now a part of the plantation of said King, on which he has resided for many years; and that a patent issue to him for it after a legal survey is made and returned under the direction of the surveyor general: Provided, That this act shall amount only to a relinquishment of title on the part of the United States."

I think it is necessary to make this explanation, because, although a copy of the memorial was sent to me some time since, and I made an explanation to the parties concerned; yet, not remembering the facts, or from inadvertence, the same memorial has since been presented by my colleague.

Subsequently to the report of the committee against part of the memorial of Mr. King, another memorial was presented by my colleague from Mr. Hynes, and King, and other persons, praying a similar grant as that for which the first petition of Mr. King prayed, and was reported against; also, that they might be allowed to enter by way of preemption, lands which they had neither inhabited nor cultivated, as the law in such cases provides. That subject was under the consideration of the Committee on Private Land Claims, and that committee had come to the conclusion to report against it, and would have reported against it before now, but for the fact that my colleague requested that the petition should be further considered.

I wish here to state my position distinctly. It is this: I shall do everything I can, as I have done on all occasions heretofore, to protect the settler in his rights. But I am opposed in this case, as I have been in every other, to the granting of preemption rights to large purchasers, where the same reasons do not exist. The applicant, Richard King, is an old acquaintance and friend of mine; and he is incensed against me because I reported against a portion of his memorial. It is very hard, when this is the case, that I should also be censured on the other side; and hence I have thought it necessary to make this explanation to show the circumstances as they actually exist. I do not think there is any equity or justice in granting preemption rights to those persons who purchase large tracts of land, and who do not occupy and cultivate them, particularly when they come in conflict with bona fide settlers who might be disturbed by them. There is the less reason, as this memorial very properly represents, that Mr. King should ask the privilege of entering lands, and of obtaining preemption rights to lands which he has not occupied or cultivated, because, under the bill already passed in 1851, he is entitled to enter, by way of preemption, certain lands purchased of Cox in the grant, which he did cultivate and occupy. Hence, it seems unreasonable that he should ask the right to enter in this manner lands situated in another place, which others claim, and which he has not occupied or cultivated. Under the direction of the Committee on Private Land Claims, I move that the committee be discharged from the further consideration of the memorial of James H. Rhinehart and others.

The motion was agreed to.

CATLIN'S COLLECTION.

Mr. SEWARD. I ask the Senate now to take up the joint resolution for the purchase of George Catlin's collection of Indian Scenes and Portraits.

Mr. CLEMENS. I hope the resolution will not now be taken up. The chairman of the Committee on the Library, [Mr. PEARCE,] who has paid some attention to the subject, is not now in his seat; and I am sure that he would desire to be present when that resolution shall be under consideration. I hope, therefore, the Senate will not take it up in his absence.

Mr. SEWARD. If the Senator from Alabama knows that the Senator from Maryland desires to be present, I will, of course, waive the motion at this time; but that honorable Senator placed in my hands papers which he had, and expressed to me an earnest desire that the resolution should be taken up at as early a period as possible.

Mr. CLEMENS. I have no objection to taking up the resolution now, if the Senator from Maryland expressed a desire that it should be taken up. I knew that he had paid attention to the subject, and I thought it proper that he should be present.

Mr. SEWARD. I have consulted with him on the subject.

The motion was agreed to.

The resolution was read a second time, and considered as in Committee of the Whole. It proposes to authorize the President of the United States to purchase the collection of Indian Scenes and Portraits, by George Catlin, for the use of the United States, on such terms, not exceeding $30,000, as he shall think proper; and to cause them to be deposited in such of the public edifices of the Government, in the city of Washington, as he shall think proper. It also authorizes the President to appoint for the purpose an agent to act under his instructions, who shall receive a compensation not exceeding his traveling expenses and eight dollars a day for sixty days.

Mr. SEWARD. Mr. President, the Select Committee to which the subject was referred, submitted a report, which has been printed. That report states all the facts and circumstances of the case, and as it is not long, perhaps it will be as convenient, for a proper understanding of the merits of the subject, to have that report read.

The report was accordingly read.

Mr. SEWARD. Mr. President, this report presents to the consideration of the Senate the facts of the case. In the first place, this collection cost the artist the sum of $10,000 in money, and many years of the best part of his life. The papers referred to in the report show the testimony of the honorable Senator from Wisconsin, [Mr. DODGE,] and the honorable Senator from Michigan, [Mr. CASS,] and various others present, that the paintings are valuable and true. The principle upon which the purchase is to be made, is explained in the report. The importance of securing, while we can, memorials of the aboriginal races of this country, is a point which has been settled heretofore by the action of the Government. The walls of the Capitol are graced with Indian scenes, and characters in sculpture and on canvas. Besides this, the Senate, a long time since, before I became a member of it, ordered a work to be prepared on that interesting subject by the first of our writers in that department—Henry R. Schoolcraft—a work which is going through the press at a vast expense, and is exceedingly creditable to the arts, as well as to the literature of the country.

I have nothing, therefore, to add on the subject of the merits of the case, but barely to submit some few facts which are proper to be stated for the purpose of engaging the attention of the Senate to the subject at this time, and a final disposition of it now.

This question was brought before us by letters from Mr. Catlin, in London, in jail, in which he informed us that he had been arrested for debt, and that this collection had been advertised to be sold in satisfaction of his debts. If, then, this question is ever to be decided at all, (and it has been before Congress many years,) a state of circumstances, has arisen which renders it essential, and due to him, and due to the country, that it should be disposed of now. Before the resolution was submitted, these facts were made known to the Senate. I have here a letter which has been addressed by Mr. Catlin to the honorable the Committee on the Library, of which the Senator from Maryland is chairman, which I will beg leave to read to the Senate, showing the situation of Mr. Catlin and of his collection:

To the Hon. Mr. PEARCE, Chairman of the Committee on the Library, United States Senate, and gentlemen of the Library Committee:

Some weeks since I addressed a letter to your honorable body on the subject of my Indian collection, having been informed that my memorial to the Congress had been referred to your consideration. I now take the liberty of addressing you again, and of inclosing to you the auctioneer's advertisement, which will show you the reason I have had for alarm for the safety of my collection, and the cause of this, my second prayer, that some step may be taken, if it has not yet been done, by your honorable body for the rescue of the works of my life, which you discover I have not the power myself of doing. By the inclosed circular, it will be seen that the collection was to have been sold on the 22d of this month, but by a hard struggle, aided by some American friends, the sale has been postponed until the 19th of July, on the grounds that there was a prospect of the Congress voting the appropriation to enable me to pay my debts, and to return the collection as the property of the Government of the United States.

The auctioneer's comments upon the interest and value of the collection are worth reading, and clearly show that there is a strong desire to obtain and preserve the collection in England, if they can get it at a sacrifice; and enough, I should think, to excite some American feeling in the breasts of those who read it.

I am ashamed that my speculations have not been better managed than these results prove, and that I should be under the necessity of asking for help to preserve my work; but my desire to see these memorials preserved and treasured up by our country is above all delicate and selfish feelings, and I again pray, gentlemen, if it be not too late, that you may lose no time in recommending to the Government, not to appropriate money for my relief, but to purchase the works of my toilsome life, which I have gathered for my country, and which I offer as justly worth the price I ask for them.

The Joint Committee on the Library in 1846 decided that my price was moderate for them, and recommended its purchase: since which time, encouraged in the belief that the Government would eventually buy them, I have added to the collection, at an expense of several thousand dollars, and continued the labors of my brush; and in my last proposals have agreed to take $15,000 less than I then required.

Confident, gentlemen, of your disposition to aid in securing these memorials to our country, I remain your obedient servant,

GEO. CATLIN.

PARIS, June 24th, 1852.

Mr. Catlin has also sent the advertisement of the auctioneer who is to sell the collection. I read:

"Catlin's Indian collection contains within itself an unique museum, fully representing the manners, customs, sports, religious ceremonies, costumes, and individuality of the interesting tribes of North American Indians, consisting of a valuable and curious display of male and female costumes, bows, quivers, spears, shields, war, eagle, and raven head-dresses, necklaces, moccasins, belts, pouches, war clubs, robes, mantles, tobacco-pouches, wampums, whistles, rattles, drums, saddles, masks for mystery dances, cradles, calumets, spears, pipes, tomahawks, scalping-knives, scalpings, and skulls; two hundred and sixteen portraits of braves, mystery men, chiefs, squaws, &c.; sixty-five landscapes, principally on the Upper Missouri river; nine spirited sporting scenes, sixty-three faithful delineations of amusements and customs; four valuable and highly-finished paintings, representing the singular religious ceremonies of the Mandan tribe; eighteen full-length figures, dressed in the costumes of their various tribes, many of them rare, curious, and valuable; a splendid Crow lodge, or wigwam, brought from the foot of the Rocky Mountains, made entirely of buffalo skins, garnished and painted, twenty-five feet high, capable of sheltering eighty or more persons; two beautiful models of the Falls of Niagara, representing them as in summer and winter; a large and splendid collection of North American quartz, a curious collection of pipes with carved red-stone bowls, besides an infinity of objects of deep and abiding interest too numerous for insertion within the limits of this particular."

By this letter of Mr. Catlin, it appears that he had in some way obtained his liberty, and that he was in Paris at the time it was written. I have not, in drawing up the resolution, adopted Mr. Catlin's calculation as to the price for this collection. Perhaps I might have done so had this letter been placed in my hands before the resolution was drawn. The sum at which the original offer of the collection was made was $65,000. I have supposed that, under the circumstances, it would be acceptable to him if the sum of $30,000 was provided for this purchase. At the same time, as no one could know the precise value of the collection now, I thought it better to provide that an agent should be sent out who could procure it at such price as would redeem the work, and therefore the resolution proposes to appropriate only $30,000, which is not one-half of the original price. If it can be procured for that sum, and if that will be satisfactory to him, then we can secure it; otherwise we shall only have made an effort to secure it which will have cost the country nothing of which any citizen can complain who thinks that such works of art ought to be procured at all.

Mr. CLEMENS. Mr. President, I am aware that it is somewhat unfashionable to resist extravagant appropriations of the public money, but this is too barefaced a case to be permitted to pass without a word of opposition. This resolution is a model in its way. There is but one man in America who could have drawn it. It is: "Resolved, &c., that the President of the United States be, and he is hereby authorized, to purchase the collection of Indian scenes and portraits of George Catlin," &c.; and then it provides, that "he may appoint for the purpose an agent." This resolution does not tell us where the pictures are. They are in London. The agent is to be paid his traveling expenses and eight dollars a day for sixty days. The resolution is entirely silent as to where these paintings are, and for anything that appears on the face of it they may be in New York. The committee have reported this resolution, knowing nothing whatever about the subject. The paintings are in London; the committee have had no opportunity to examine them. I do not know how competent they might be to judge of them, even if the paintings were here; but they have not seen them; they know nothing about them; but they propose to authorize the President of the United States to purchase of Mr. George Catlin his collection of Indian Scenes and Portraits, and to do it on the authority of certain Englishmen, who say that these are very fine paintings. Well, sir, I am not a very good judge of portraits of any sort, but I think the English are very bad judges of Indian portraits. I think we are better judges of Indian portraits than any Englishmen. Why, one of them landed here a few days ago—a man of some distinction—who fancied he could kill a buffalo within fifty miles of Washington. I do not profess to be a judge, but I have here the testimony of a man who has examined it, and who is a judge. Let it be remembered, that at the time when this resolution was reported, there was here in the Smithsonian Institution a collection of Indian portraits which the committee have entirely overlooked. It was not necessary to send an agent to London to examine them, and therefore the committee report against them. I have here the testimony of Captain Eastman, who, as everybody knows, is a competent judge. In relation to the collection of portraits now in the Smithsonian Institution, he says:

WASHINGTON, D. C., June 28, 1853.

DEAR SIR: Having been requested by you to express my opinion as to the comparative merits of yours and Mr. Catlin's paintings of the Indians of this country, it affords me pleasure to say that I consider the artistic merits of yours far superior to Mr. Catlin's, and they give a better idea of the Indian than any works in Mr. Catlin's collection.

Very respectfully, your obedient servant,

J. EASTMAN, Capt. U. S. Army.

MR. STANLEY.

There is the testimony of a man who is a judge; the testimony of a man who has examined both collections; the testimony of a man who is himself one of the best artists in the country. I would rather have a collection of portraits painted by him than by either of these gentlemen; and he tells us that here, at our own door, there is a collection of portraits far superior to any in Mr. Catlin's collection—not merely to Mr. Catlin's as a whole, but to any in Mr. Catlin's. Yet in the face of this, we are to send an agent to London, pay him eight dollars a day and his expenses, and give $30,000 for an inferior collection. As I commenced with saying, I conclude with saying, that this is too barefaced a proposition to be allowed to pass without opposition.

MR. BORLAND. Mr. President, I am very sorry to occupy a moment of the time of the Senate upon this question. I am very sorry that this subject is occupying the time of the Senate this morning. We have many measures of public importance now pressing upon the attention of the Senate. Justice to individuals has been delayed; public interests of the greatest importance have been postponed. And for what? To consider whether we shall go into the business of buying pictures. But I will not occupy the time of the Senate with any remarks upon that aspect of the question.

We have come to this old acquaintance of ours, who has been here longer than I have been. I met this proposition here four years ago, and it has followed us up ever since. We have heard every session of "Mr. Catlin and his Indian portraits," "Mr. Catlin and his Indian portraits," until it has to me become almost like a certain patent bill that we had under consideration a year or two ago, which came pretty near running everybody out of the Senate, and we at last got so sore about it that we dismissed it, and would not consider it any further.

Since it seems that we are to buy Indian portraits; since it seems that the Government is going into the picture business, although I am opposed to the whole scheme, and think that the public interests are suffering, not only by the postponement of other measures, but by the amount of money we shall have to pay for this collection, if we have got to buy, if we have got to go into this business, I am disposed to do it understandingly. If we are to pay money out of the Treasury for pictures, I am for having the best we can get. For that purpose I have prepared an amendment to the resolution, which is to strike out all after the word "resolved," and insert—

That a select committee of three be appointed by the Chair to inquire into the relative merits and value of Mr. Catlin's and Mr. Stanley's collection of Indian portraits; or whether it may not be better to employ Captain Eastman, or some other officer of the United States Army, who is a competent artist, to paint a series of Indian portraits for the Government, than to purchase the collection of either Mr. Catlin or Mr. Stanley.

Mr. President, that opens the whole field of inquiry, and will enable and require the committee that may be appointed to examine and ascertain the relative merits of the various collections of pictures that are presented to our consideration, and to determine whether either is worthy of our patronage to this extent, or whether it may not be better to employ an officer of our own Army, who is competent, to paint us a better series than either.

I have mentioned the name of Captain Eastman because he is well known to the country as an artist of very high order of talent, perhaps equal to, if not better than any who is engaged in painting Indian portraits, and whose knowledge of Indian character, and familiarity with scenes among the Indians, qualify him better than perhaps any other man to judge of what is meritorious in such paintings; and perhaps he is himself better qualified than anybody else to produce a series that will be worthy of the patronage of the Government. The advantage of employing him or some other officer is two-fold: First, that we may thereby, and in my opinion, will obtain better work for the money which we may pay; and secondly, that we shall have to pay very little money at all. He is an officer of the Army; he is competent to do the work; and he is willing to be employed, at what he now receives as an officer of the Army, to do this work, about which gentlemen seem to have so much solicitude. For these reasons I have offered the substitute.

MR. COOPER. Mr. President, from the remarks of the Senator from Arkansas, it is evident that his objection is not to the measure per se, but to the collection of paintings that it is proposed to purchase. He is not for purchasing the Indian portraits, and other paintings of Mr. Catlin, but he is for directing an inquiry which is designed to result in the employment of Captain Eastman, or in the purchase of another gallery, the work of Mr. Stanley. Now, I have nothing to say against the artistic merits of either Captain Eastman or Mr. Stanley. On the contrary, I am willing to concede to both of them a very high degree of skill in this department of the fine arts. Both of them have given striking evidence of great talent; but, according to them all the merit that is due to them, or to either of them, to say that they are but gleaners after Mr. Catlin is doing injustice to neither of them.

Sir, I have seen the paintings of all these gentlemen; and, although I do not profess to be a very critical or accurate judge of matters of this kind, yet, as far as I have any judgment, I am compelled to say that the collection of Mr. Catlin is very far superior to them, or any other, in artistic merit. He was the original in this field. When he first commenced to give to the world the series of Indian portraits which are now in London, and which have been seized in execution, that field of art was entirely unexplored. His genius opened the way, and, until to-day, I have never heard it suspected or hinted that there was not a very great display of artistic skill and talent exhibited by Mr. Catlin in the paintings which the resolution before us is designed to purchase, in order to grace this Capitol. Here, abroad, everywhere, wherever these paintings have been exhibited, no matter in contrast with what others, the highest praise has always been accorded to the artist, not only for faithfulness of delineation, but, as I have said already, for general artistic skill.

Now, sir, is it not a matter that should commend itself to American statesmen and patriots to purchase a collection as perfect as that of Mr. Catlin is? The portraits which his pencil has executed are the only remains of the chiefs and braves of those tribes who were once lords of the soil, and who have almost entirely disappeared from the world. Is it not right that we should now provide that posterity may know the forms and faces of those great aboriginal chieftains, as well as that they may learn from history their other characteristics which cannot be so well exhibited upon canvas? Soon, sir, a like opportunity of transmitting to canvas the features of these chiefs will have ceased to exist altogether; and although no doubt Mr. Stanley has employed himself with ability in this same walk of art, he has not had the same opportunities that Catlin has enjoyed, and has not produced so much that is worthy of patronage as Catlin has done. If Congress should choose, I am very willing to extend this patronage both to Mr. Stanley and to Captain Eastman. I do not think that it would be any very great stretch of public generosity to purchase the collection of Mr. Catlin, in the first place, and in the second place, the few scattering works of Captain Eastman, and finally to add to both the collection of Mr. Stanley. I do not think that it would be a great thing for a rich and powerful nation, advancing with greater rapidity to wealth, power, and intellectual preëminence than any other nation which has preceded them in the history of the world. Sir, I can conceive of nothing that would grace to a larger extent the halls which are about to be erected for the deliberations of future Congresses than a gallery containing portraits of the aborigines of this country, in order that posterity may see the faces of the race of men that occupied this soil when it was a wilderness, and previous to their time.

If there be an objection to the form of the resolution proposed by the Senator from New York, as has been suggested by the Senator from Alabama, and I apprehend that there is something objectionable in it, let us amend it; but do not let us turn our back upon the proposition merely because there is something in the resolution that gentlemen do not like. I can vote for it in its present form, though I think the employment of an agent is altogether useless. We know what the collection is; we know what it is that Mr. Catlin proposes to sell us; and a simple resolution authorizing the President to purchase and pay a sum not exceeding so much, on the delivery of the collection to an authorized person, would be all that is necessary. If somebody else will not move so to amend the resolution I will do it. I have an amendment in my hand which, in the event that no other gentleman proposes it, I shall offer. But I do trust that the proposition will commend itself to the American Senate, and that although gentlemen may sneer at it as going into the picture-dealing business, it will not deter men who have a proper regard—I will not say that, because it might cast a reflection on gentlemen, and I do not intend to do it—for these things from voting the trifling sum, in comparison with our ability, that is necessary to purchase this collection of paintings.

MR. PRATT. Mr. President, at this stage of the session, when there remains so much public business of the country requiring the attention of the Senate, I do think it will be conceded to be out of place that we should consume our time with the discussion of the relative merits of the gentlemen referred to, as portrait painters. I am opposed to the original resolution, and to the substitute offered by the Senator from Arkansas; and for the purpose of testing the sense of the Senate, I move to lay the whole subject upon the table, and I ask the yeas and nays upon that motion.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

MR. SEWARD. Will the honorable Senator indulge me in a word of reply?

MR. PRATT. My whole object was to prevent the consumption of time. If the gentleman replies, some one else will wish to reply to him. I prefer to have the sense of the Senate upon my motion.

THE PRESIDING OFFICER. (MR. NORRIS in the chair.) The question is not debatable.

The question being taken, the motion to lay the subject on the table was agreed to—yeas 26, nays 20; as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Atchison, Bayard, Borland, Butler, Charlton, Clemens, Davis, De Sansure, Douglas, Downs, Felch, Hamlin, Houston, Hunter, Jones of Iowa, Mallory, Mason, Meriwether, Morton, Norris, Pratt, Rusk, Sebastian, Toucey, Walker, and Weller—26.

NAYS—Messrs. Bell, Brodhead, Brooke, Clarke, Cooper, Dawson, Dodge of Wisconsin, Dodge of Iowa, Fish, Fout, James, Miller, Seward, Shields, Smith, Spruance, Stockton, Sumner, Upham, and Wade—20.

BILLS INTRODUCED.

MR. JAMES, agreeably to previous notice, asked and obtained leave to introduce a bill amendatory of the several acts regulating the appraisement of imported merchandise, and the more effectually to prevent frauds against the revenue, and for other purposes; which was read a first and second time by its title, referred to the Committee on Finance, and ordered to be printed.

Mr. ATCHISON, agreeably to previous notice, asked and obtained leave to introduce a bill to amend an act entitled "An act to provide for the payment for horses and other property lost or destroyed in the military service of the United States," approved March 3, 1849; which was read a first and second time by its title, and referred to the Committee on Military Affairs.

LIEUTENANT DERBY'S REPORT.

The Senate proceeded to consider the resolution submitted by Mr. GWIN the 15th instant, in relation to a reconnaissance of the Gulf of Mexico by Lieutenant Derby; and, on motion, it was ordered to be referred to the Committee on Printing.

DIFFICULTIES AT ACAPULCO.

Mr. WELLER submitted the following resolution for consideration:

Resolved, That the President of the United States be requested, if not incompatible with the public interest, to communicate to the Senate all the information in his possession relative to the recent difficulties at Acapulco, in Mexico, between the American Consul and the local authorities.

Mr. WELLER. I ask the consideration of this resolution now, as it is a matter of some immediate importance. I see, by the latest intelligence from that country, that the American Consul at Acapulco is still in prison. He was put in prison, I believe, because, as was alleged, he had interfered with some of the judicial authorities of that city. It is important that we should have all the facts in the case. When one of our agents in a foreign country is detained in a foreign prison, the honor of the Republic requires that we should investigate the matter. I ask, therefore, that the resolution be now considered.

There being no objection, the resolution was considered and agreed to.

THE DEFICIENCY BILL.

A message from the House of Representatives was received by Mr. HAYES, its Chief Clerk, announcing that it recedes from its disagreement to the second amendment of the Senate to the amendment of the House of Representatives to the twenty-fifth amendment of the Senate to the bill "to supply deficiencies in the appropriations for the service of the fiscal year ending June 30, 1852."

INDIAN APPROPRIATION BILL.

Also, that it had passed a bill making appropriations for the current and contingent expenses of the Indian Department, and for fulfilling treaty stipulations with the various Indian tribes, for the year ending June 30th, 1853; which was read a first and second time by its title, and referred to the Committee on Finance.

LANDS OF FRANCIS GARDIERE.

The engrossed bill entitled "An act authorizing the purchase of certain lands belonging to Francis Gardiere," was read a third time and passed.

RAILROAD IN LOUISIANA.

Mr. DOWNS. I move that the prior orders be passed over, with the view of taking up Senate bill No. 408. It is a bill granting to the State of Louisiana the right of way and a donation of public land for the purpose of locating and constructing a railroad from Shreveport to the Mississippi river, in said State. This bill was reported from the Committee on Public Lands with amendments.

The motion to postpone the prior orders was agreed to, and the bill was considered by the Senate as in Committee of the Whole.

The bill consists of six sections, and provides that the right of way through the public lands be granted to the State of Louisiana, for the construction of a railroad from Shreveport, in said State, to a point on the Mississippi, at Providence or opposite to Vicksburg.

The bill is in the terms of the many bills of the same character which have been passed by the Senate.

The several amendments to the bill, which were proposed by the Committee on Public Lands, were simply such as to make it conform to the Iowa, or model bill, passed by the Senate some time ago, granting lands for railroad purposes. The amendments reported by the committee were agreed to. The bill was then reported to the Senate, the amendments were concurred in, and the bill was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading.

EMIGRANT ROUTE BETWEEN THE MISSOURI RIVER AND CALIFORNIA.

Mr. DOUGLAS. I ask the Senate now to postpone all prior orders, with a view to proceed to the consideration of the bill which was postponed until to-day; I refer to the bill for the protection of the emigrant route, and a telegraph line, and for an overland mail between the Missouri river and the settlements in California and Oregon.

The motion was agreed to, and the Senate proceeded, as in Committee of the Whole, to the consideration of the bill.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. When this bill was last under consideration, the pending question was on a motion to refer the bill to the Committee on Military Affairs.

Mr. DOUGLAS. I believe that motion was not recognized by the Chair, because it was offered when the bill was before the Senate as in Committee of the Whole.

Mr. MASON. I made that motion when the bill was last under consideration, but it was objected, by the then occupant of the chair, that the motion was not in order, because the Senate was then in Committee of the Whole. In order to afford the Senator from Texas [Mr. Rusk] an opportunity to offer an amendment, which I perceive he now has ready, I withdraw that motion.

Mr. RUSK. I propose to strike out all after the enacting clause, in the bill now before the Senate, and insert what I send to the Chair. I move, also, that the further consideration of the bill be postponed until to-morrow, in order that the amendment may be printed.

Mr. GWIN. I hope that the Senator will withdraw his motion to postpone, so as to permit me to make a motion.

Mr. RUSK. I withdraw it.

Mr. GWIN. Then I move that the bill, together with the amendment offered by the Senator from Texas, be recommitted to the Committee on the Territories. This will be the better plan, and I think it is more than probable that the committee will adopt the substitute of the Senator from Texas. I think it is also probable that it will be agreed to by the Senate.

Mr. HAMLIN. I wish to inquire whether that motion can be put while the bill is under consideration as in Committee of the Whole?

Mr. GWIN. The object of the motion is to recommit the bill and amendment, and to procure the printing of the latter. Having consulted the chairman of the committee on the subject, I can assure the Senate, that it will be acted on immediately. The probabilities are that the committee will adopt the substitute.

Mr. DOUGLAS. Through the kindness of the Senator from Texas, I have been allowed to examine his amendment, and it strikes me as being worthy of consideration, whether it will or will not be adopted as a substitute for the present bill, after some modification. From the slight examination that I have had the opportunity of making, I am induced to think that the amendment requires some modification, and I am in favor of the motion of the Senator from California, for the recommitment of the whole subject to the Committee on the Territories, the more especially as we have received an assurance that it will be acted on immediately.

Mr. BRODHEAD. I also have a substitute, which I should wish to be referred with the present bill to the Committee on the Territories. I move that it be so referred and printed.

Mr. BELL. Had we not better have the amendments read for information?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Will the Senator from California [Mr. Gwin] modify his proposition so as to embrace both amendments?

Mr. GWIN. Certainly, sir.

The motion to recommit the bill, together with the amendments of Mr. Rusk and of Mr. Brodhead, was then agreed to.

Mr. DOUGLAS. I believe that does not include the motion to print. I move that the amendments be printed.

The question was taken on that motion, and it was agreed to.

NOAH HANSON.

Mr. HAMLIN. I offered a resolution a few days since in relation to pay to the widow of a deceased messenger for service rendered previous to his decease. I move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of that resolution at this time.

The motion was agreed to, and the resolution was read a second time, and considered as in Committee of the Whole.

The resolution is as follows:

Resolved, That the Secretary of the Senate be, and he is hereby, directed to pay out of the contingent fund of the Senate to Mrs. W. Maria Hanson, as administratrix of the estate of Noah Hanson, late a messenger of the Senate, the usual per diem compensation for his services from March 27, 1851, to June 1, 1851, and from October 1, to November 1, 1851, the time of his decease, and also to pay the funeral expenses of said Hanson, as heretofore paid in similar cases.

Mr. HAMLIN. I would move to refer that resolution to the Committee on Contingent Expenses of the Senate, but that on conferring with the chairman of that committee, I learned that he approved of the resolution, and did not consider it necessary to have it referred. I will state that the person referred to in the resolution performed the duties of a messenger in one of the document rooms during the time specified in the resolution. The resolution also proposes to make provision for the payment of the funeral expenses of the deceased, which is agreeable to the precedent in some cases heretofore. The expenses are very slight, not exceeding $100, and the widow of the deceased is, as I learn, in somewhat indigent circumstances.

Mr. DE SAUSSURE. I would much prefer to have that resolution referred to the Committee on Contingent Expenses. I am rather inclined to think that the payment of the funeral expenses in such a case is a new feature. It is not to the amount of that expense to which I should object; but I prefer to have the resolution referred to the committee, and therefore make that motion.

The motion was agreed to.

ADDITIONAL SECURITY ON WESTERN WATERS.

Mr. SEBASTIAN. I move that the Senate postpone all prior orders, for the purpose of proceeding to the consideration of a "joint resolution to provide additional security for the lives and property of persons navigating the western waters."

The motion was agreed to, and the resolution was read and considered as in Committee of the Whole.

It provides that it shall be the duty of the owner or master of any boat, craft, vessel, or raft, navigating any of the western navigable rivers, not propelled in whole or in part by steam, running or floating between sunset and sunrise, to carry one or more signal lights in a conspicuous place, that may be seen by other boats navigating the same waters, under the penalty of $100.

And it provides, also, that in addition to the signal lights, as before prescribed, the master or owner of such boat, craft, vessel, or raft, shall be provided with a rattle or bell, in such times as fogs may prevent said lights from being seen, and sound the same upon the known approach of other boats, under the penalty of $100.

It further provides, that the foregoing provisions shall apply to such vessel, boat, craft, or raft, not only while actually running or floating, but while lying to, cabled, or anchored, at any place other than such public places and landings as may by law or regulations of corporate cities and towns be appropriated for such purpose.

And also, that the penalties imposed by this resolution shall be recovered in the manner specified by the eleventh section of the act approved July 7, 1838, entitled "An act to provide for the better security of the lives of passengers on board of vessels propelled in whole or in part by steam."

And further, that the owners or masters of any boat, craft, vessel, or raft, as aforesaid, neglecting or violating the provisions of this resolution, shall not be entitled to recover against any other boat, raft, craft, or vessel, any damages for injuries sustained, (other than those which are willful and malicious,) by collision or otherwise.

The bill was reported back from the Committee on Commerce, with the following amendment: "To insert, after the word 'boats,' in the eighth line of the first section, the words 'or craft.'"

The question was taken on the foregoing amendment; and it was agreed to.

Mr. SEBASTIAN. I move to insert, after the word "bell," in section second, line fourth, the words "or some other contrivance."

Mr. DAVIS. I would suggest to the Senator from Arkansas the inquiry, whether he will not be likely to do away with all the good effects of the bill by such a "contrivance"—whether he will not weaken the means of giving an alarm, by leaving it to any man's own suggestion to take any contrivance which he may choose? I would suggest whether it would not be better to limit it to something that will give the alarm, in order to give ample notice. That is the object, I suppose.

Mr. SEBASTIAN. I will say to the Senator from Massachusetts, that I offer this amendment at the suggestion of gentlemen who have had much more experience in these matters than I have, and who suggested that other means were sometimes adopted of late, which in some cases were found to be more effectual than the ringing of a bell.

Mr. DAVIS. Then I would suggest the adoption of the words, "or some means equally effective," in place of those named by the Senator from Arkansas.

Mr. SEBASTIAN. I will adopt those words in lieu of my proposed amendment.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. SEBASTIAN. I propose further to amend the bill, by inserting in line sixth of the first section, after the word "steam," the words "or sails," so as to embrace all the smaller sailing craft that navigate those waters.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. SEBASTIAN. I have one more amendment, which is to insert in section fifth, at the sixth line, after the word "malicious," the words "or from want of ordinary care."

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. SEBASTIAN. I would inquire whether this is a proper time to move an amendment of the title of the bill? This is called a joint resolution, while it should be denominated a bill.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. This is not the proper time.

Mr. SEBASTIAN. I will, then, move to strike out the word "Resolved" in the first section, and to insert the words "Be it enacted;" and also to strike out the word "resolved," in each of the succeeding sections, and insert the word "enacted."

The amendments were agreed to.

The resolution was then reported to the Senate as amended.

Mr. CHARLTON. I would suggest to the Senator from Arkansas, [Mr. SEBASTIAN], that by the proposed amendment, in the fifth section, it seems to me the Senator is destroying the effect of the words within the parenthesis. It reads, "shall not be entitled to recover against any other boat, raft, craft, or vessel, any damages for injuries sustained, (other than those which are willful and 'malicious,') by collision or otherwise."

If I understand the amendment, the words "or from want of ordinary care," are added after the word "malicious." It strikes me that it should remain as it was, for the plain reason, that it appears that the boat which has received the injury has not exercised ordinary care, and therefore she ought not to recover damages from the other. They ought to be upon the same footing. The rule of common law has always been, that if there be any neglect or fault at all on the part of the boat which is injured, the party cannot recover. In admiralty the rule is to divide the loss. But I would suggest that, inasmuch as, in this case, the injured boat has not exercised the ordinary care, I do not see why the owners of that boat should recover from another boat which has exercised ordinary care. If it is a proper time to make the motion, I would move that the words, "or from want of ordinary care," be stricken out. I do not wish to embarrass the bill; but I make the motion so as to make the bill harmonize with the principles of common law.

Mr. SEBASTIAN. I would suggest to the Senator from Georgia to let the question be taken on concurring in the other amendments made in Committee of the Whole first, and then upon this particular amendment by itself.

The question was taken on concurring in the several amendments made in Committee of the Whole, with the exception of the one named by the Senator from Georgia, and they were concurred in.

The question then recurred on concurring in the amendment made by inserting the words, "or from want of ordinary care," in the fifth section.

Mr. CHARLTON. I do not wish to embarrass the bill at all, and if the Senator from Arkansas prefers the section as it is, I will not insist on my motion. It seems to me, however, that we should not concur in that amendment.

Mr. SEBASTIAN. On examining the original draft of the bill, it occurred to me that the provision as it stands was amply sufficient, because, where there is a want of ordinary care technically, an injury may be said to be done willfully and maliciously. It was thought, however, that by adding these words, it would make the matter still more specific. As to the application of the bill, I take it for granted that the Senator from Georgia is mistaken, when he says that the question applies to a boat which is injured, but which has not failed to comply with the provisions of this act.

The question was taken on concurring in the amendment, and it was not concurred in.

No further amendment being offered, the bill was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading.

PRIVATE LAND CLAIMS IN CALIFORNIA.

Mr. WELLER. I move to postpone the prior orders, for the purpose of taking up Senate bill No. 269, being a bill "to authorize the payment by the surveyor general of California for the surveys which may be executed of any claims which have been or may be presented to the board of land commissioners for adjudication under the act of Congress, approved 3d March, 1851, to ascertain and settle the private land claims in the State of California."

The motion was agreed to, and the bill was considered by the Senate as in Committee of the Whole.

It provides that in the case of any and all private land claims which have been or may be presented in good faith for adjudication to the board of land commissioners, under the act of Congress, approved 3d March, 1851, "to ascertain and settle the private land claims in the State of California," and in which the said commissioners may certify to the surveyor general of California that evidence is before them that such claim or claims have been presented to them in good faith and are docketed accordingly, it shall and may be lawful for the said surveyor general, out of the surveying funds, to pay for the survey of such claims as have been or may be executed under his supervision and direction: Provided, That upon the return to the office of the said surveyor general of the field notes and plats, he shall find that such surveys have been correctly made.

The bill was reported from the Committee on Public Lands, with amendments—namely: to add several sections, and to amend the title so as to make it read as follows: "A bill to amend an act 'entitled 'An act to ascertain and settle the private land claims in the State of California,' approved March 3d, 1851, and for other purposes.'"

The following are the additional sections proposed by the Committee on Public Lands to be added to the bill:

SEC. 2. And be it further enacted, That the authority conferred on the surveyor general by the first section of this act, for the payment of surveys executed under his supervision of claims before confirmation, shall only apply to such cases as the surveyor general, in the gradual extension of the lines of the public surveys shall find within the immediate sphere of his operations, and which he shall be satisfied ought to be respected, and actually surveyed in advance of confirmation; and in cases of this class he shall be authorized to trace out and establish the exterior lines of such private claims, closing upon their exteriors the lines of the public surveys, and according to such instructions as may be given by the Commissioner of the General Land Office; and the provisions of this act shall not be construed as conferring any authority on the surveyor general to pay for the survey of any such private land claims as may be isolated from, or disconnected with, the immediate line of his extension of the public surveys.

SEC. 3. And be it further enacted, That in every case in which the board of commissioners shall render a final decision, it shall be their duty to have two certified transcripts prepared of their proceedings and decision, and of the papers and evidence on which the same are founded, one of which transcripts shall be filed with the clerk of the proper district court, and the other shall be transmitted to the Attorney General of the United States, and the filing of such transcript with the clerk aforesaid shall, ipso facto, operate as an appeal for the party against whom the decision of the board may be rendered; and if such decision shall be against the private claimant, it shall be his duty to file a notice with the clerk aforesaid, within six months thereafter, of his intention to prosecute the appeal; and if the decision shall be against the United States, it shall be the duty of the Attorney General, within a like period, to cause a notice to be filed with the clerk aforesaid that the appeal will be prosecuted by the United States; and on a failure of either party to file such notice with the clerk aforesaid, the appeal shall be regarded as dismissed.

SEC. 4. And be it further enacted, That in any petition which may be filed by a "present claimant," under the ninth section of the said act of the 3d of March, 1851, it shall and may be optional with him either to present or not the "derangement of title" to him from the "original claimant;" and in any case in which such derangement shall not be filed, and a final decree of confirmation shall be rendered, such decree shall inure to the benefit of the claimant under the original grant or concession, his lawful assignee, or legal representatives; and any provision of the aforesaid act of the 3d of March, 1851, inconsistent with this act, be and the same is hereby repealed.

SEC. 5. And be it further enacted, That the board of commissioners for the ascertaining and settling the said private land claims, may authorize and direct the clerks of the said board to superintend the taking of depositions to be used before the said board whenever the law agent cannot attend the taking thereof; the said board, upon the application of any claimant, or of the law agent, under this act, and the act of which this is amendatory, may direct a commission to issue to take depositions before any officer authorized by the laws of California to administer oaths; in all which cases written interrogatories shall be filed before said board at least forty days before the time fixed for taking said depositions; and cross interrogatories, if desired, shall be filed before said board within twenty days after the filing of the aforesaid interrogatories. The depositions thus taken shall be carefully sealed up and transmitted, by the officer taking the same, to the secretary of the said board.

SEC. 6. And be it further enacted, That for the purpose of expediting the ascertaining and settling private land claims in California, the President of the United States shall appoint an assistant agent, learned in the law and skilled in the Spanish and English languages, whose duty it shall be to aid and assist in the discharge of all the duties imposed on the agent by the act of which this is amendatory, and his compensation shall not exceed $4,000 per annum.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on agreeing to the amendments proposed by the Committee on Public Lands.

Mr. WELLER. I move to amend the sixth section by striking out of the ninth line the word "four" and inserting the word "six," so that the compensation to be allowed to the assistant law agent shall be six thousand dollars instead of four thousand, as now proposed in the bill. The reason why I propose the amendment is this: the compensation allowed to the law agent is fixed by the act, of which this is amendatory, at six thousand dollars, and the duties to be performed by the assistant are precisely the same as those to be performed by the agent himself. It is for that reason that I move this amendment.

The amendment to the amendment was agreed to.

Mr. WELLER. It will be necessary to move an amendment to the fifth section proposed by the committee, in the seventh line. It now reads in this way:

"The said board, upon the application of any claimant, or of the law agent," &c.

I move to insert after the word "agent" the words "or assistant agent."

The amendment to the amendment was agreed to.

Mr. WELLER. I move to amend the bill by offering an additional section.

The PRESIDENT. The question must first be taken on agreeing to the amendments of the committee as amended.

The amendments of the committee as amended were agreed to.

Mr. WELLER. I now move to amend the bill by adding the following as an additional section:

SEC. 7. And be it further enacted, That so much of the thirteenth section of the act passed March 3, 1851, entitled "An act to ascertain and settle private land claims in the State of California," as limits the time for the filing of claims, be so amended as to extend the period for presenting the same two years from and after the third day of March next.

Mr. WELLER. This section is necessary because, as the law now stands, the time for the presentation of these claims will expire on the 3d of March next. It will be impossible for the board of commissioners to adjudicate on all the cases anterior to that time; and for that reason I propose to extend the time two years from the 3d of March next.

The additional section was adopted.

Mr. WELLER. I have another section to offer to this bill.

It was read, as follows:

SEC. 8. And be it further enacted, That a competent person, skilled in the English and Spanish languages, shall be appointed by the Attorney General of the United States, who shall proceed to Mexico, in order to obtain copies of
